REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1280) for the relief of J. G. Seupelt (Rept. No. 499); and

A bill (S. 3895) authorizing the granting of certain irrigation easements in the Yellowstone National Park, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 500).

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 4149) for the relief of Manda Smith, widow of Thomas Smith, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, which was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3994) validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 504) thereon.

Mr. KIRBY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2989) for the relief of Walter I. Whitty, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 503) thereon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3896) for the retirement of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond D. Day, first lieutenants in the United States Army, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 505) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 502) thereon.

NATIONAL GUARD ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4173) to amend section 69 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," and I submit a report (No. 501) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 69 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1918, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 69. Original enlistments in the National Guard shall be for a period of three years and subsequent enlistments for periods of one year each: Provided, That persons who have served in the Army for not less than six months and have been honorably discharged therefrom may, after examination and qualification as to physical fitness, enlist in the National Guard for a period of one year and reenlist for like periods."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just read. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from New York kindly give us a brief explanation of the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under section 69 of the national defense act as it now stands on the statute books the period of enlistment in the National Guard is three years' active service and three years in the reserve, a total of six years.

The period of enlistment for the National Guard was arranged at the same time the period of enlistment for the Regular Army was made three years with the colors and three years in reserve. A period of enlistment of that length makes it almost impossible to secure enlistments. The enlistment period of the Regular Army has been reduced to three years straight and the provision for three years in the reserve has been eliminated by a previous act of Congress. That, however, was not done for the National Guard, and to-day the period of enlistment in the National Guard is three years' active service and three years in the reserve. This bill is to make the period of enlistment in the National Guard conform with that of the Regular Army as to length.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator from New York if the bill is approved by the officers of the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it is. I may also say that this bill is embraced in the House reorganization bill which was passed by the other House, and this very language is a part of that bill.

Then, there is another little feature of this bill which provides that a soldier who has served six months in the Army of the United States during the recent war may enlist in the National Guard for one year instead of for three years. That same privilege is extended to-day to soldiers who want to enlist in the Regular Army. If they have served in the World War, they may enlist in the Regular Army for one year. This bill is to make the two services have the same period of enlistment.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps the Senator from New York in his answer to the Senator from North Dakota gave the information I seek, but I was not able to hear him. Do I understand that the bill cuts off the reserve period entirely?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does.

Mr. POMERENE. So that the period of enlistment is limited to three years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is limited to three years, but for veterans to one year, and then they may reenlist for one-year periods as often as they like.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4185) to permit the acquisition of land at the Leon Springs Military Reservation, Tex.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS (for Mr. WALSH of Montana):

A bill (S. 4186) to authorize the Broadwater Irrigation District, a Montana corporation, to construct a dam across the Missouri River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 4187) providing for the transfer of the hull and boiler inspectors of the Willamette (Oreg.) collection district from the fourth to the third class; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KNOX (for Mr. PENROSE):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 186) to extend the authority of the county of Luzerne, State of Pennsylvania, to construct a bridge across the north branch of the Susquehanna River from the city of Wilkes-Barre, county of Luzerne, Pa., to the borough of Dorranceton, county of Luzerne, Pa.; to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KNOX submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $714,007.39 for payment to the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., as recommended in the report made to Congress under date of February 11, 1916, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ESTATE OF EDWIN W. TRIMMER.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 344), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Horace C. Trimmer, Theodore L. Trimmer, Sidney C. Trimmer, Rhoda W. Pickrell, and Gail C. Peacock, children of Edwin W. Trimmer, late a conductor of elevator in the employ of the United States Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

J. W. FLANAGAN.

Mr. CULBERSON (by request) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 345), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to J. W. Flanagan, administrator of the estate of the late J. W. Flanagan, formerly a Senator from the State of Texas, the sum of $5,356.16, for balance of salary due him as a Senator of the United States from March 4, 1869, to March 29, 1870, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CONTRACT VALUE OF COTTON.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I have here a clipping from an article being issued by Mr. Calvin, who purports to be chairman of sundry farming committees. I desire to read from the clipping, as follows:

This is a bad time to be experimenting. Cotton has reached and maintained a good price under the present system, and it seems to me that it would be unwise to tamper with it at this time.

Mr. President, I should like to know what that has to do with the price of cotton at this time. In my opinion, it has nothing whatever to do with it.

If the amendment should be enacted into law and the price should undergo a heavy decline it would be a hard matter to convince the farmers that the amendment was not responsible for it.

I should like to know how that could possibly be.

There is an old saying that "we should let well enough alone," which seems to apply with added emphasis in this case at this time.

That is always the statement made by the fellow who wants to keep what he has got.

As above stated, I do not know how the board as a whole which I represent stands on this matter, and I do not think that they should come to any conclusion without a thorough investigation, for it is a matter of far-reaching importance to the cotton farmers and not one to be passed upon in a superficial manner.

This matter has been discussed for several years, backward and forward, in the effort to get a satisfactory solution; in other words, in the effort to get the exchange price equal to the commercial price.

I am of the opinion that the members of the board would prefer to "let well enough alone" and not tamper with a proposition that might have dynamite in it.

That is exactly like an exchange orator discussing the question; such orators always endeavor to scare you with the charge that there is dynamite in the proposition.

I am also of the opinion that this will be the attitude of an overwhelming majority of the cotton growers.

That is his opinion, which he is circulating here broadcast amongst the Members.

I sincerely trust that the conference committee can see its way clear to take the amendment out of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and if, as above stated, there are those who think this legislation wise and expedient, let them introduce a bill in due form and give all interested parties an ample opportunity to be heard, and if such a bill has merit Congress will no doubt enact it into a law.

The amendment was put on the Agricultural bill because when I first came here the Agricultural bill was before the Senate, and the matter had to be taken care of then or not at all. There was not time to introduce a new bill and put it through, so that it had to be done at that time.

The three last sections of E. A. Calvin's circular letter of March 29 in the interest of the cotton exchanges, and sent to all Representatives, House and Senate.

Mr. Calvin proposes to be the Washington representative of the cotton States official advisory marketing board, but judging from his letter he could not better represent the gamblers on the cotton exchanges.

I want to call your particular attention to that.

It is difficult to understand how he could represent the gambling devices of the cotton exchanges and the farmer at the same time.

I have here a telegram from Mr. L. B. Jackson, the director of the Georgia State bureau of markets:

ATLANTA, GA., April 2, 1920.

Hon. B. B. COMER:

Your telegram received. The cotton States official marketing board, composed of commissioners of agriculture and other agricultural officials of the cotton belt, have not met and considered the Comer amendment and only know from meager newspaper reports what it contains—

You know Calvin said that he believed his attitude would be the attitude of the overwhelming majority of the cotton growers. This man, the secretary, says they only know from meager newspaper reports what it contains—therefore no one has any authority to commit the board. I am secretary of the board and know whereof I speak. Personally I have always urged an amendment that would compel deliveries to average middling.

Now, that is just what the tendency of this contest means—to compel a delivery that will average middling. This particular bill does not go as far as it ought to. It simply demands that half of a contract shall be middling or above, and half, at the seller's option, down.

As I read the news items that is what your amendment does. I want to know exactly what your amendment provides.

That is from L. B. Jackson, director of the Georgia State bureau of markets.

Here is a letter which I have written to a cotton firm at Greenville, S. C.:

I am having sent you copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 1 and the two days before that, all relating to my amendment to the cotton-futures act.

This has created some stir among the exchanges, they claiming that it will hurt the producer and the dealer.

They always claim that. Give me a man who is reaping an unholy gain, and he will always say that to take that away will hurt somebody other than himself. They always say it.

As you know, I am both producer, dealer, and manufacturer, and what we are trying to do is to escape the defects of last year's amended act restricting the delivery to 10 grades.

We say you should make the two markets alike, the exchange and the commercial, but we have seen this year where the variation has been as much as from 3 to 5 cents, and right now July cotton and May cotton are below April cotton. It has always been below spot cotton. Now, Senators, we expect that the exchange price will be lower, because the very minute you get it higher the exchange becomes the market of delivery, and it is never intended to be the market of delivery. They do not intend cotton to go through the exchange. It does not go through the exchange. The exchange hedges the sale or hedges the buy, and you go into the market and buy it where you find the cotton.

What we are trying to do is to escape the defects of last year's amended act restricting the delivery to 10 grades and fix it so, in a measure (it is not a complete measure), that the gambling seller will be afraid to sell the market to pieces; that anybody, both seller and buyer, can make a hedge that will be much less dangerous than at present.

At this time, as you know, New York fluctuates constantly from 3 to 6 cents per pound, and the distant months are always behind the present months. This is, as you know, wrong. We ought to get back as near as we can to where you could sell or buy cotton basis middling any of the months ahead with fair confidence that you would have the approximate price of the commercial market and not be jingled around in the laps of, or in the sweet generosity of, the exchanges.

Now, that is just what they are claiming. They are claiming that they are generous. They are saying that it is jingled around in their laps, safe to all, and in the best interests of all. The producer and dealer have got to have a defense in the markets, and the buyers and sellers in the markets have got to have an arrangement safe to both and all protected in the law.

It is a mistaken idea that the producer's, the dealer's, and the manufacturer's interests are at loggerheads.

It is not true.

Their interests are the same, and all of these are against any anvantages in the law which the gambling speculator may have at the present time.

That is just what it all means.

I have here an editorial from the Macon Telegraph. I should be glad if all of you would listen to it, particularly the southern Members. This is from the Macon Telegraph. That is right in the heart of the cotton country:

BREAK UP THE ROBBERY.

Opinion is divided as to what is for the best interests or what is fair in regulating the cotton exchanges. B. B. COMER, former governor of Alabama and now United States Senator, attached an amendment to the Agricultural bill on its way through the Senate providing that a buyer of future contracts may require delivery of one-half in middling to middling fair and the other half from any standard grade of cotton. There was a time when future contracts on the New York exchange could be filled in any or all of 28 grades on a middling basis.

He meant 21 grades.

The gamblers, with their exchange rules, kept about 100,000 bales of dog-tail and unspinnable cotton in New York warehouses, and when they were called by any holder of a future contract, they dragged out this old stuff which they kept on cold storage from one season to the other and drove the demander out of the market.

That is true; and, Senators, if they will do that one time, will they not do it again? If they practice it when they have the whole thing, will they not practice it when they have a part of the thing? It is the farmer, the producer, the dealer, the manufacturer, that you must protect.

He could not spin it or sell it.

I introduced evidence the other day showing where we took cotton that we kept in New York three months, trying to sell it, and we could not get a single bid, and we had to put that same cotton back and deliver it on the exchange. We could not deliver it anywhere else. Such a thing as that is monstrous.

As a consequence of these practices, on delivery days there was a selling of contracts instead of demanding cotton, and the sellers or bears who always seek to depress the market would make their "killing" among the boosters of prices.

In other words, they sheared the lambs.

Then came Government "regulation" of the exchanges, and the number of grades tenderable was finally reduced to 11—

It was 10, as a matter of fact—which is the status of the matter now. And Senator COMER wishes to further amend the law. The exchange manipulators have organized a crusade against the Senator—

You all know that is so. The exchanges have organized a crusade against this amendment, for what purpose? By George, to protect the farmer! Who ever heard of a thing like that?

The exchange manipulators have organized a crusade against the Senator, charging that inasmuch as he is a manufacturer of cotton—

They always say that. They always attribute selfishness to somebody. It is one of their methods of escape; it is one of their attacks. It is an outrage that a man can not come up and do his duty without being accused of being selfish in trying to do it—he has introduced this bill in the interests of the manufacturer and against the interests of the farmer—and the exchange.

Who ever heard of a thing like that? The farmers' interests and the manufacturers' interests have to go together. They have to do it. It is the manufacturer, the man who buys the cotton, that takes it off the market. If it were not for his purchasing it, taking it off the market, and sending it to consumption, what would become of the market?

I want to call the attention of every southern man here to this: This year and last fall the exchanges tried time and again to break the price of cotton. Time and again they tried to do it. It was only by the firm holding by the farmers, by the spot holders, that the market was preserved. Many times the exchange market went from 3 to 5 cents below the spot market, and yet they say they are acting in the interests of the farmer!

But Senator COMER makes a good showing as to his farming interests, as well as being a manufacturer, and it is believed he has the whip hand in the fight before the conference.

The whip hand in the fight! They have not seen the exchanges fight, have they? They do not know down there how it is done. The farmers never organize. They have no adequate organization. They do not know how. They have not the money to organize with. It is the other fellow who does the organizing. It is organization against unorganization. That is what wins the fight always, and that is where the farmer has had his trouble.

He claims for his bill that a future contract will mean something and can not be used for speculative and gambling purposes.

All it means, Senators, is that it tends to make the exchange price commensurate with the commercial price. That is all it means—nothing else—and anybody knows that is what the exchange stands for, and it will stand for it if it is not prevented by law.

The agility and facility with which cotton contracts were manipulated in the unregulated days, and the only slight improvement that has been achieved under the law as it stands, makes Senator COMER'S amendment worthy of serious consideration, and if it will accomplish what he says it will—

It will not accomplish, Senators, the full intent of it. I could not get a bill like that through; but it will accomplish in a large measure what it is intended to do, and that is the protection of the cotton people; and, by the way, there is nothing more important in the United States than cotton farming—it should have the whole-hearted support of every Congressman and Senator.

The people of the South, unorganized and financially depressed as they have been since the War between the States, have had their cotton taken away from them—by the most abominable combinations and tactics of the speculators, who could organize a raid at any time and sell 40,000,000 bales of cotton against a crop of only 15,000,000 bales, and when delivery time came at the end of any month they would tender the dog tail and escape all consequences of overselling. Under this nefarious practice cotton could be depressed at any time, and the cotton farmer was robbed of his cotton as an annual festivity.

That is so. The exchanges have fleeced them unmercifully—

I have had New Orleans deliver me 16 different styles of low-grade cotton in 100—16 different styles, an average of 6¼ bales of a kind in 100 bales, when they knew it was unusable.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. COMER. Why, surely not.

Mr. GRONNA. Being a member of the committee of conference which has to decide this question, I want to say at the outset that I believe it is only fair to say that the committee of conference is willing to take the judgment of the people from the cotton States; but as to the merits of the Senator's amendment, as I understand, the Senator wants to make it possible for the buyer to demand one-half of the purchase to be above the standard grade.

Mr. COMER. No; not above; not below, Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, at or above.

Mr. COMER. No; that half of it shall be the higher grades, you understand.

Mr. GRONNA. And the other half below?

Mr. COMER. Anywhere they want. It gives the seller the option of delivering anything he wants as to half of it. It gives the buyer the right to demand that half of it shall be middling and above. You know, there are 10 grades that are tenderable. There is middling, strict middling, good middling, strictly good middling, and middling fair. Those are the five grades up. He can deliver any one of those, or any combination of those, for half of it. Then there are five off grades—low middling, strictly low middling, strict middling tinges, good middling tinges, and good middling light yellow stains, making five. Now, he can deliver any part or combination of those he wants to, or he can deliver any combination he wants in the 10 grades for the 50 per cent, but the 50 per cent shall be middling and above. I will state while I am on this question that three-fourths of the mills, possibly, use middling and above, you understand, and some of them use strict middling, and by a combination of good middling and middling you make strict middling. The majority of the cotton is middling to good middling. More than half of it runs that way.

More than half of the mills spin these grades, and when a man takes a contract of this kind, if he can not use it himself, he can sell it; but under the old system possibly more than two-thirds of the mills could not use one-tenth of it.

Mr. GRONNA. Let us take a concrete case, now, and say that a farmer has a thousand bales of cotton, one-half of it middling or better; the other half middling or lower than middling. In order to sell that cotton he would of course have to sell it all, because the buyer could refuse to accept the half below middling, but perhaps he would be willing to accept what was above middling or good middling. Would it not penalize the cotton farmer in disposing of his lower grades?

Mr. COMER. Not in the least. The exchanges do not spin any cotton, and they do not manufacture any cotton.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that.

Mr. COMER. They do not deliver cotton through the exchanges. If the exchange price were to exceed the market price sufficient to pay the cost of delivery through the exchange, then the dealer would sell the market, the exchange would be flooded with cotton, and there would be an immediate recession of the exchange price. This, you understand, can only happen for a very few days at a time, making what is called a "market squeeze." A farmer sells or buys a thousand-bale contract on the exchange market, then sells or holds his cotton, as the case may be, to the spot dealer offering the best price, getting the spot differences between his grades. There can be no other relation between the farmer and the exchanges in the bettering of his condition than to wait to see how his exchange contract is working and then close the contract out. If he goes into the exchange market it is pure speculation. He takes his chances as to whether there is an advance or a decline in the price. The final disposition of his cotton, no matter what the grade, has to be on the spot market. The exchange does not help him in his differences at all. The spot market as a rule ignores his differences.

Spot cotton is sold always at the supply and demand price, at the market price. You can not sell it for a penny more, no matter where it is, except in an accidental "squeeze."

Mr. GRONNA. I am asking only for information. Let us take another case. Suppose a farmer has a certain number of bales of cotton, and it is all either middling or below good middling. What happens to that farmer when he offers his cotton on the market?

Mr. COMER. On the spot market he takes the actual price on the different grades. On the exchange market he takes the chance, and with the present law the chances are against him, and at last his cotton has to be sold at the market price. Just suppose I am a farmer, and that I have a thousand bales of cotton which I want to sell on the market and get the money for, but I am not satisfied with the price at the time. I believe it will go higher, and I go on the exchange and buy a thousand bales of cotton. I buy that cotton within the 10 grades, and the seller could deliver me any part of it that he pleases. Say I am also a manufacturer, and I want to buy a thousand bales of cotton, and I go on the exchange and buy a thousand bales of cotton, and the time of delivery comes, when I want to cancel my contract and get the cotton in. I go out in the market where the cotton is, anywhere from Virginia to Texas, and buy my thousand bales at the market, and sell my hedges. You do not put any low-grade cotton or high-grade cotton on the exchange. They do not have anything to do with the exchanges. The exchange is not a consumer; it is a supposed barometer or index of prices and should be a true one.

Let us take wheat. You have, say, a million bushels of wheat—I am giving you a limited amount, you see—which you want to sell. You do not want to hold it; you want to realize on it before you deliver it. You go into the market and sell a million bushels of wheat. You go ahead and you get your wheat out and sell it in the market to the millers, or anybody else; they are the ones who get it at last. Then you go and close your hedge. Cotton is handled in the same way. The mills do not get the cotton out of the exchanges. They go on the market and buy it. To-day we have contract hedges in New Orleans. To-day we are buying low-grade cotton from all over Texas. As we get in the spot cotton, we close the hedges, or wait, as we have been doing very much to our advantage, and close at the end of the month. This latter part is speculation, which we would not do if the exchange market was a true index of the commercial or spot market.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that while I have not dealt on the exchanges in grain, I am quite familiar with the grain exchange. But we deal with only one grade, and that is the contract grade of wheat.

Mr. COMER. No. 2.

Mr. GRONNA. We deal only with the No. 2 northern, which is the contract grade, and whatever is of an inferior quality will, of course, be reduced in price.

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. There is where the wheat farmer has suffered, because there are times when 60 pounds of wheat of a grade which has been graded simply by looking at it or by weighing it will produce practically as much flour, and absolutely as good flour, as the higher priced wheat. I do not know that that will apply to cotton. If it does, it seems to me there might be such a thing as penalizing the farmer on the lower grades.

Mr. COMER. Not through the exchanges. The exchanges have not anything to do with the value. The exchanges can not exceed the commercial price on any grade. The very minute the exchange got higher than the commercial price people would ship the cotton into the exchanges and break it. You can not sell the cotton higher than the commercial price. The mills are buying the higher grade cotton at a high price rather than the lower grades at the lower price, because of the high cost of manufacture and in the higher prices of the better grades of goods they can make more money than out of the lower grades.

Mr. GRONNA. I am quite sure that the Senator from Alabama wants to do what is for the best interests of the cotton farmer, as well as for the manufacturer. I am quite sure of that, and I am not at all surprised that a propaganda has been instituted and is carried on if there is anything that hurts the exchanges. I had some experience with the exchanges myself on the floor of the Senate only recently, and I simply mention this to show that the Senator is not alone in being attacked when legislation is proposed which will tend to make a commercial price and not a speculative price. When I introduced a bill not long ago to abolish the Grain Corporation, because it was my belief, and the belief of a great many people throughout the United States, that the Grain Corporation was in fact a factor in creating speculative prices, the members of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis who testified here admitted that never in the history of the grain trade had there been greater fluctuations on the markets than during the time the Grain Corporation had exercised control over the wheat.

Mr. COMER. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Great fear was expressed by the Grain Corporation that if my bill should go through the farmer would lose.

Mr. COMER. They always do.

Mr. GRONNA. He was the man whom the Grain Corporation, and every grain exchange, every chamber of commerce, and every board of trade was trying to protect. Of course, the price of wheat went down temporarily, because there was a scare; but wheat to-day is selling at $3.20 a bushel in the markets of the city of Minneapolis, and it shows that the fears expressed were entirely unfounded. I simply rose to get some information from the Senator and also to say to him that I hope the Senators from the cotton States will get together and agree upon what they want, and, so far as the conference committee is concerned, I am quite sure they will stand by the judgment of the people who know something about the industry.

Mr. COMER. I thank the Senator very much. I understand that. If this amendment does not go through, we have a case against some man from down home. But, in connection with the question the Senator raised, let us suppose a farmer has a hundred bales of cotton which he wants to get the money for. He believes that cotton will advance and he sells his hundred bales and buys a contract. The other man believes that cotton is going down and he sells a hundred bales on contract. Neither of those men expect the delivery of a single bale, good, bad, or indifferent, and when they say the amendment will result in hurting low-grade cotton every man knows it is not true. I understand there are some low grades raised down in Oklahoma. Oklahoma has a great deal of low-grade cotton, and they say it will hurt low-grade cotton. Mr. President, you might just as well say it will hurt No. 3 wheat. There is not a word of truth in it. Low-grade cotton has to come through the factory; it has to come through the mills for that class of goods; and I want to explain for the record here why low-grade cotton is so cheap right now. There is a big difference in conditions. Machinery is three times as high as it was. It costs three times as much to build a mill as it did. Labor is very much higher than it was. You can mill high-grade cotton much faster than you can low-grade cotton; you do not have to stop and clean it. Then, besides that, there is so much more of it waste in low-grade cotton. Then, again, the price of goods made out of high-grade cotton is better than that made out of low-grade cotton, and that makes the difference in the price. It is governed by the law of supply and demand. It is a question of what the mills can do with it. They have charged that our mills, the Avondale Mills, will be benefited by the amendment.

I have a letter from my son, who says, "Dad, your bill will hurt us, because we can use any grade cotton we can get." He is the manager of the business. In our business we can use any grade, and he says, "We use anything from waste up to strict good middlings. When a contract is tendered us, we have the ability to take it, and thereby we do not lose any money on the business. You can easily understand that. When, say, July cotton was 6 cents cheaper than spot cotton, we bought July cotton. When May cotton was 5 cents a pound cheaper than December cotton, we bought May cotton and held it, and we did not care about it." But it is the man who can not hold it; it is the small fellow, the farmer, who is hurt in all these nefarious transactions, and it is wrong. It is wrong for any man to sit here and allow himself to be befuddled with such propaganda as they get out, and I for one resent it. It is not right.

This editorial continues:

> The people of the South, unorganized and financially depressed as they have been since the War between the States, have had their cotton taken away from them by the most abominable combinations and tactics of the speculators, who could organize a raid at any time—

They could organize a raid at any time—> and sell 40,000,000 bales of cotton against a crop of only 15,000,000 bales, and when delivery time came at the end of any month they would tender the dog tail and escape all consequences of overselling. A man could not take it. He had to settle with their differences.

This editorial continues:

> Under this nefarious practice cotton could be depressed at any time, and the cotton farmer was robbed of his cotton as an annual festivity. Cotton manufacturers have very little interest in the particular price of cotton.

They think we are always trying to beat the market, and why should we want to try to beat the market? We want things on an even basis. The manufacturer of cotton wants prices on an even basis the year around. It is not the price he pays for it; it is regularity he wants.

The editorial continues:

> Cotton manufacturers have very little interest in the particular price of cotton. What they want most of all is a stabilized market. Manufacturers prefer to have a high market, all things being equal, rather than a low one, because their percentage of profit applies to the gross cost of the manufactured article, and high cotton means more profits. The manufacturers want a future delivery of cotton to protect their contracts for manufactured goods.

Now, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, suppose I have sold 10,000 bales of goods, and I have not the cotton, and I want to go into the market—not the spot market, but in the future market—and get my contracts and hedge that. But suppose on the contrary I have bought 10,000 bales of cotton and have it in the warehouse, and I have not sold the goods, and I want to go in there and sell 10,000 bales of cotton and hedge that, and I want to do it in a business way. I do not see how on earth anybody can object to it.

This editorial proceeds:

> The manufacturers want a future delivery of cotton to protect their contracts for manufactured goods. They sell a bill of goods to-day, requiring 10,000 bales of middling cotton. The manufacturer can not go into the market and in one day get 10,000 bales of middling cotton. And the next day the price may have advanced to where he would not have any profit in his goods contract. So he must protect himself upon the goods contract by an immediate purchase of a cotton futures contract at the price at which he agreed to deliver the goods.
> The manufacturer, as the exchange gamblers charge against Mr. COMER, does want this law amended as proposed by Mr. COMER.

They are always charging something; they are just like a man who is trying to get his hand in your pocket. Let me read that again:

> The manufacturer, as the exchange gamblers charge against Mr. COMER, does want this law amended as proposed by Mr. COMER. He wants this amendment because under it he would be able to make the exchange speculator or trader deliver to him the manufacturable cotton he will have to deliver in the goods he has sold. It will furnish the manufacturer a market wherein he can instantly buy the ten or twenty thousand bales of cotton required, protecting himself against loss, and he can insist that he get the cotton required for his goods contract. Even now he must close out his futures contract as he buys his cotton or let the speculator or exchange trader palm off on him the 11 grades provided for under the present law, loading him up with a lot of grades he has no use for.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to this in particular:

It is charged by the speculator, who has always had the dearly beloved farmer's interests so much at heart, that with this amendment of Mr. COMER'S a farmer with other grades of cotton than those specified in the futures contract can not sell his grades at all.

That is what they claim.

Which is all bosh.

There is nothing in it whatever. It is not sold through the exchange. You have to get the market at exchange prices. It is exchange prices which we are insisting should be the commercial prices or along in that neighborhood. That is what we are interested in.

The futures contract under the Comer amendment will be worth exactly what the spot cotton is worth—

That is what you want. You do not want futures contract worth 6 cents a pound less than the commercial price.

The futures contract under the Comer amendment will be worth exactly what the spot cotton is worth, because spot spinnable cotton can be demanded under it. Under the Comer amendment, we shall not see July futures go down to 30 cents while March spots stood at 40 cents, as was the case this month.

That was true at that date; it was an outrage; and it was the case this month.

The grade specified in a contract will be a basis, and the delivery of that grade will be demanded or its equivalent in real honest spinnable grades as are acceptable to the spinner. And this spinnable cotton will have to be raised by the farmer and bought from him.

You have to buy it from him. It has to come from him. He does not send the cotton to the exchange, no matter what happens. It is the index, the barometer—not the mercury, but the barometer showing the true condition.

If Mr. COMER'S bill will accomplish what is aimed at, and what for so many years has been sorely needed, it should pass in a hurry. It will make futures and spots stand on a parity, and the speculator can not manipulate his drives so as to depress the market and rob people and maintain a difference of 10 cents per pound between spots and futures. If the farmers of the South had had no money in bank on which to hold their cotton this past month and year, their spot market would have followed the futures down to 30 cents, as it has always done. More power to Senator COMER.

I am not through yet.

The exchanges have a very strong lobby here, being directed, I understand, by Mr. Calvin, who is using his relation to the official cotton people to make more effective his lobby in the interest of the exchanges. They are the farmers; the exchanges are the farmers he is representing.

You will recall that prior to 30 days ago the New York exchange market was running from 3 to 4 cents per pound cheaper than the spot market, that occasionally a spurt of selling would take place trying to break the spot market. They did that. They tried hard to break it. This species of guerrilla warfare will be entirely defeated if the exchanges have to deliver one-half of a contract middling and above instead of, as now, all the contract their selection from the most undesirable grades. You understand that a large percentage of the mills do not use anything below middling.

That is true. A large part of the crop is above middling. The exchange selection for delivery is made not as an agricultural commodity or a manufacturing commodity, but as a speculating commodity.

Of course, this makes it to the greater advantage of those mills that use the grades below middling—I mean the present exchange contract—as they have no trouble in hedging. A mill or dealer strong enough to play the game, particularly those mills which could use any grade, can go right into the market and buy the ahead months, and as the months come due demand delivery of the cotton and have ability to pay for it, unless the party on the exchange is willing to deliver the contract on basis of spot value. They always protect themselves. It is the other fellow who can not do it. But in the future market, as at present constituted, the small trader and the public at large—the producer and the small spinner who always get run out of the market on the threat of tender—will always be at the mercy of the smart fellows on the exchange organized as against the unorganized public, and the amendment will certainly help protect these small users.

The cotton-exchange men know that to claim that the privilege of tendering low-grade cotton on contracts would furnish a market for the low-grade cotton carries absolutely no truth. There is not a word of truth in it. In the years past when any grade could be tendered, we have seen cotton contracts selling at anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent off middling cotton. The only low-grade cotton that is ever accepted on an exchange contract has merely been that some big operator could accumulate a supply of it and hold it in hand at New York or New Orleans forever as a threat to tender and so depress and keep depressed the market.

Of course, in all important legislation defending the public, there are scare heads, threats, and bullies, and all sorts of dire prophecies resulting from that species of legislation. You will remember that when Columbus was trying to get ships to sail west on a voyage of discovery and all through the voyage, until land was found, there was every dire prophecy of impending evil and disaster held out.

It is the same way about this proposition here. It is simply a scare head, a scare head that ought not to fool anybody. I am sorry it does fool some people. Are the exchanges competent advisers as to how they should be controlled? Should Congress lay down the regulations to protect the farmers, the dealers, and the manufacturers, or should the exchange do it? Should they be left to what the exchanges advise? Cotton speculation as practiced through the exchanges and abundantly borne out in their history has shown the most outrageous swindling methods. The value of cotton not only to the South, not only to America, but to the world is too great to be bandied around in any such manner, and Congress owes it to this great international product to fully protect it.

THE HARBORD MISSION (S. DOC. NO. 264).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in response to a resolution of the Senate requesting the President to furnish that body, if not incompatible with the public interests, with a copy of the report made on conditions in the Near East by the mission headed by Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord, United States Army, known as the "Harbord Mission."

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 3, 1920.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

H. R. 1288. An act for the relief of George W. Gamble;

H. R. 1309. An act for the relief of Perry L. Haynes;

H. R. 4184. An act for the relief of C. V. Hinkle;

H. R. 6198. An act authorizing payment of compensation to Swanhild Sims for personal injuries;

H. R. 7573. An act authorizing payment of compensation to Pasquale Dolce for personal injuries;

H. R. 8881. An act for the relief of the First National Bank of New Carlisle, Ind.;

H. R. 9046. An act for the relief of William Malone;

H. R. 9048. An act for the relief of Catherina Rea, administratrix of the estate of John Rea;

H. R. 9629. An act for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick & Wrecking Co.;

H. R. 10598. An act for the relief of the First National Bank of Sharon, Pa.;

H. R. 11030. An act for the relief of the Woodford Bank & Trust Co., of Versailles, Ky.; and

H. R. 12634. An act for the relief of Wilhelm Alexanderson.

H. R. 12530. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McLEAN. I report back favorably, without amendment, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill (H. R. 12711) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, and I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. It passed the House last week. I will state that the bill is a verbatim copy of Senate bill 3958, reported favorably from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has been on the calendar for a month or six weeks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 12711. Is there objection?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to say a word. I shall not object to the request of the Senator from Connecticut. I think, however, that it is a mistake to pass this bill. I believe that the bill will eventually pass, and for that reason I shall not take advantage of the rule and ask to have it go over.

Mr. President, my opposition to this proposed amendment to the Federal reserve law comes from the fact that I have always been opposed to giving too much power to any individual or to any board. There have been times during the war when that was necessary, and it would be necessary if we were to have a war in the future to give to the President of the United States and those associated with him unlimited power. But I have never been able to see any good reason why we should in times of peace give unlimited power and authority to public servants, because that is what they ought to be, nor should the Federal Reserve Board be given the power to limit loans, to increase the rate of interest, to make conditions such that it would be impossible perhaps to carry on production.

I know it is said with reference to this bill that it is for the purpose of doing away with speculation. To that I certainly would have no objection, but that is not the way it works out. I know from actual experience that only recently an order was sent out by the Federal Reserve Board authorizing the raising of the rates of interest. The class first affected by this order and who actually had to bear this burden were the producers. That has always been the condition, and that always will be the condition. I know as a matter of fact that within the last three months the order to raise rates of interest and to limit loans seriously affected the producers of the country. It affected the producers in my State and in the Northwest generally.

The argument is made that this will only affect the large concerns and those who are asking for larger credits than they are entitled to, but that does not always follow. When the order was sent out only a short time ago that the banks must exercise care and not extend credit to the farmer what effect did it have? And, Mr. President, that was at a time when it was impossible for the producers to get cars to enable them to ship their products.

You might just as well say to the farmer, "You must sell your wheat; you must sell your cotton; you must sell your live stock," as to say to him, "On the first day of the month, when your obligation becomes due, you must pay us, because we can not extend further credit." That is what has happened, and I am afraid it will happen in the future.

Why it should be necessary for the Federal Reserve Board constantly to have to ask for more power in times of peace is more than I can understand. I think I know that the Federal reserve law has been and is defective, so far as the question of inflation is concerned. I think I may be pardoned for saying that I have studied that law. I may not understand it correctly, but I have formed the conclusion, sir, that at a time when inflation has actually taken place we can not by law give power arbitrarily to deflate the currency without ruination to the producers of the country, because the effect of such an undertaking must necessarily fall upon the producers, and the farmers' products will be the first ones to decline in price.

I am only giving my reasons, Mr. President, why I do not think the bill should be passed. I believe it will serve no good purpose to the country, because it will be detrimental to the producers, and legislation which is detrimental to the producers will ultimately become burdensome and detrimental to the people generally. We can not continue to saddle burdens upon the producers without having a serious effect upon the country generally. We are not living in a country where the producers are going to be satisfied to be slaves, as many of them have been in the past.

We are living in an enlightened age and in a country where we should help the producers to have the same opportunity as the man in other business or as the man who is engaged in vocations and trades. The young boy on the farm to-day will not remain on the farm with conditions as they have been in the past. Who is going to perform the labor if we create such conditions that it will be impossible to make a living upon the farm without the old order of having to work from 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning until dark, when all labor elsewhere is clamoring for a six, seven, or eight hour day and five days during the week? I ask you how are you going to keep the educated young farmer on the farm under those conditions?

I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that those who are supporting this bill desire the passage of this bill for the purpose of hurting the farmer. I am sure that is not the case. I am sure their motives are just as patriotic and just as good as are mine; but I question whether it is for the best interests of anybody to enact this legislation.

A banker does not have to take bonds or to discount bonds or to buy bonds, whether they are par or below par, if he does not wish to do so. The only ones who will be burdened by this kind of legislation will be the smaller banks, the smaller institutions, and ultimately credit will be denied the farmer. That simply means that the farmer must stop or cease producing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the Federal reserve act as amended by the acts approved September 7, 1916, and June 21, 1917, be further amended by striking out the semicolon after the word "business" at the end of subparagraph (d) and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and which, subject to the approval, review, and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, may be graduated or progressed on the basis of the amount of the advances and discount accommodations extended by the Federal reserve bank to the borrowing bank."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, when my attention was first called to the pending measure I thought I saw in it an extension of power that could be used to the detriment of the commercial world. With a law, new as the Federal reserve law was, that had stood the test of the greatest financial strain that the world had ever endured, that had financed the World War so far as America was concerned, and in a large degree had financed the Governments which were allied with us, without there being any financial disaster in this country, but, on the contrary, an increased prosperity in spite of the war burden—after this crucial test of the system, that had more than met the expectation of those who had formulated and enacted it, it seemed to me that while we were in a reconstruction time, when the great cry of the country was for production, it was a doubtful experiment to begin an artificial deflation of our currency. The high cost of living has been attributed to different causes, and perhaps it is attributable in part to most of the causes that have been advanced, but all of us agree that the solution of the problem of the high cost of living in this country is production equal to or in advance of the demand.

The proposed amendment of the law provides that the Federal Reserve Board shall be given the power, to be exercised at its discretion, it is true, to say at what limit a borrowing bank shall begin to pay a premium or a penalty or a tax on its excess borrowings over the amount allowed. That is a tremendous power to put in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board, in view of the particular genius of the Federal Reserve System.

That system as a whole accommodates all of the member banks; the gold reserve that it has is the common property of the system; the wealth that is back of the notes issued upon the gold reserve, plus the commodities themselves, represents the commercial and floating wealth of the country.

Mr. President, I submit that so long as there is the gold reserve, so long as there is the wealth of the country for the issuance of our time paper—30, 60, 90 day or 6 months paper—it is wholesome that we have what seems to be an inflation of the currency, but which on analysis is nothing more nor less than clearing-house certificates based upon the actual wealth of the country and secured by a percentage of the gold reserve.

The small banks throughout the country, members of the system, in the time of moving the crops and commodities which have been produced on the farm, in the field, and in the factory on their 30, 60, 90 day and 6 months paper have had freedom for the first time in the history of banking in this country in hypothecating that paper and securing enough currency on it to meet their obligations and to tide over the time between the time of a transaction being entered into and its consummation. Heretofore the amount of money has been limited; the amount of circulating medium has been limited by rigid, inflexible standards that caused us to be always under the shadow of a panic, always upon the thin crust of a crater. The commercial life of America was absolutely in the hands of a few bankers and financiers who, at their sweet will, could demand the retirement of certain securities and bring about a panic.

Under the provisions of the Federal reserve banking legislation the commercial wealth of the country, that which may be bought and sold, has been mobilized and rendered flux by virtue of the fact that the amount that could be issued to a member bank was not restricted to the capital and surplus of such bank but was measured entirely by the resources of the entire Federal Reserve System, so that a small bank having a limited capital, being a member bank, receiving paper that had been passed upon the Federal Reserve Board as collateral, could discount an almost unlimited amount of paper at its regional reserve bank. This proposed amendment of the law provides that when the banks have reached a certain percentage of their capital and surplus, which may be called the normal percentage, the Federal Reserve Board may from then on, by means of a graduated or progressive tax, restrict the facilities of that bank.

I appreciate, as every other Senator here does, that we are face to face with a situation that is alarming. When the Federal reserve act was passed there were less than $1,000,000,000 of bonded indebtedness owed by this Government, while to-day the amount is over $20,000,000,000. When the Federal reserve act was passed there was incorporated in it a provision making Government bonds collateral for loans. During the campaign for the floating of Liberty bonds the people throughout the country were flatly told, and honestly, as they thought, that if they would subscribe for those bonds the banks of the country would carry them for them and give them a certain time to liquidate. Under this proposed amendment the inevitable result will be that the banks that are carrying such bonds will be forced to liquidate their holdings.

There are a great many people who believe that there was a moral contract between the Government and the purchasers of the bonds that they should have this privilege. Now, we are told that, in order to meet the commercial necessities of the country, we must find a way by which we can check certain great banks which are depleting the Federal Reserve System of its reserves, and we must find a way by which we can check this wild speculation where they hypothecate their collateral and take the money that is thus drained and go to Wall Street and there lend it on call at anywhere from 6 to 30 per cent.

I recognize the fact that the currency could be inflated to an almost unlimited degree upon the hypothecation of the promise of the Government to pay, and some remedy must be found by which there can be left in the Federal Reserve System sufficient reserves to meet the requirements of the commercial interests of the country, but I am not sure as to whether the Federal Reserve Board should be given the power at its own will artificially to deflate the currency at this time, because we all know that that is the object sought to be attained—not so much the checking of wild speculation, but the deflation of the currency in order to bring down prices to what they claim is the normal.

I have never seen in this country, especially in the section with which I am familiar, such great prosperity; I have never seen so much real, genuine investment; I have never seen such bright hopes; I have never seen so much energy put forth, because, when everything is said and done, you may extend to a man all the credit that he may need in the form of book credit, but nothing takes the place of the actual possession of the circulating medium of the country to nerve him to invest and to expand his business.

I had intended to oppose this bill. I thought it unwise, and were it not for the fact that we are face to face with a condition over which we have no control—the issuance of the staggering bonded indebtedness of this country, making the inflation of the currency a possibility that would absolutely ruin commerce—I say, were it not for the conditions that confront us, and with the hope born of my desire that the governors of our Federal Reserve System, those in whose hands we have placed the administration and execution of this law, will deal justly and fairly with the situation, I might further oppose this amendment of the present law; but I want to say in conclusion, Mr. President, that I do not believe it is a sound policy of government to make it possible for any man or set of men arbitrarily to determine whether I am speculating or whether I am investing money.

When I bring to a bank a collateral that is recognized as gilt-edged and hypothecal and ask for a loan, it is not the province of the bank or the banker to know what I am going to do with that money. It is too far-reaching to say to them, "We grant you, by the enactment of a statute, the right to determine whether this man is speculating or whether that man is investing properly"; yet that is precisely what this legislation proposes to do. When they have evidence that a certain bank or certain banks are borrowing too much for speculative purposes, they can invoke this rule to discourage it.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not like to interrupt the Senator from South Carolina, because, if I understand this bill, his remarks, so far as they touch it, constitute a very sound argument in favor of its passage. But the statement which the Senator has just made, to the effect that this is granting a new power to the Federal Reserve Board, which would authorize them arbitrarily to play favorites with the banks, I think is a statement which is utterly unfounded, because the law as it reads to-day gives to the Federal reserve bank, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the power to extend to each member bank such discounts, advancements, and accommodations as may be safely and reasonably made with due regard for the claims and demands of other member banks.

This is very broad language. A Federal reserve bank can prefer either the bank or the security offered, if it desired to abuse its power; but the amendment which is proposed defines this provision and permits a limit to which a Federal reserve bank can refer member banks and say, "While we may have discretion under the law to do anything we have a mind to do with you, we do not want to decline to discount good paper, for it may hurt your bank to have it advertised throughout the community that you have been declined accommodation; nevertheless here is the law." Under this law, when they fix the normal discount rate below a percentage of the banking capacity of the borrowing bank and the bank desires to borrow above that percentage, then the Federal reserve bank can say, "Here is the law. You have unduly expanded your credits. We have fixed this limit, and if you want further accommodation you must pay a higher rate."

If the Senator will pardon me while I am on my feet—I do not want to take any more time than necessary in discussing this measure, because I am very anxious to get a vote on it before 2 o'clock—I will say to him that it must be clear to him and to those who are opposed to this measure, if there are any others besides himself and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], that this bill simply gives to the Federal reserve bank, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the power to fix a normal maximum rate which they can apply and must apply to every member bank in a given district. If a bank seeks accommodations above the limit fixed by the board, they can raise the discount rate. Now, it may well happen that a few of the stronger banks in the district, inasmuch as the law now is "First come, first served," may exhaust the resources of a Federal reserve bank, in which event other banks in the district that may have been modest and conservative in their demands must be denied all accommodations.

I agree with the Senator that while credits may be unduly expanded it would be unwise and disastrous to undertake artificially to curtail the credits needed by legitimate commercial demands. We all want increased production; we all agree that it must be had; and we know that if we increase production we must increase the credits demanded to finance the producing activities of the country. On the other hand, credits that are desired for speculative purposes should be discouraged and restrained in every possible legitimate way.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me right at that point, the only thing that has at all reconciled me to this measure is that upon speaking to certain ones in authority over this law I was informed that their object in discouraging and having the power to refuse an excessive loan from certain sources was that they would then be enabled to have sufficient reserves to put the initial rate of interest on commercial paper on the real investments and purchases so long that even though the graduation was put upon it the maximum that they might reach after they had perhaps exceeded their capital and surplus, or the normal, would not be a prohibitive rate of interest; but we have no guaranty that this will be observed, and the law is there.

Now, Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator said a moment ago about having the power, the Senator knows that whenever any class of paper is received for discount, whatever the rediscount is, it is uniform for that class of paper throughout the entire system. They would have to do that or they would be guilty of playing favorites; but what I was saying was this——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there? That is one of the primary purposes of this amendment. The rate must be the same on a certain class of paper to-day.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. Now, then, if this bill passes, the rate on first-class commercial paper can be lowered under the limit fixed by the Federal Reserve Board, and that is all in the interest of conserving the resources of the Federal reserve bank in the interest of legitimate commercial paper. The Senator can see that.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Oh, I said a moment ago that that was the feature of the thing that reconciled me to it.

Mr. McLEAN. Now, they could not do that as the law is to-day. The rate on that class of paper must be the same, no matter whether a bank has borrowed double its capital and surplus or whether it has not borrowed a dollar. If you have a bank in South Carolina that has not asked for a dollar of accommodation the rate must be the same as would be charged to a bank that had borrowed eight times its capital and surplus.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I recognize that.

Mr. McLEAN. It must be clear to the Senator that in that this amendment will permit the Federal reserve bank to conserve its resources in the interests of legitimate commercial transactions. There is no question about that, and that is the whole purpose of the law.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What to me is the most objectionable is fixing a limit of the borrowing capacity of a member bank, putting a line, and saying that if it goes beyond that line it begins then to pay a premium.

Mr. McLEAN. That it can do now, in my opinion, under the statute which I quoted to the Senator. But the language is very general.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If that is the law now, why does the Senator want to have this amendment adopted?

Mr. McLEAN. Because, as I have said, the Federal reserve banks do not want to say to a member bank, "We can not let you have any more money at all." It will not sound well in the community and may hurt the bank. They want the law to expressly give the power to graduate the discount rate and fix a limit to which they can refer the banks and say, "You have borrowed up to a certain multiple of your bank's capital and surplus, or a certain percentage of your borrowing capacity. The law has expressly given us the power to fix a limit. Now, we have fixed it under this law, and you can not go beyond that. If you do, you must pay a higher rate."

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Connecticut stated, and I agree with him to a certain extent, that this amendment would enable the Federal reserve banks to make a limited amount of loans upon first-class commercial paper; but the Senator is overlooking the fact that it leaves the authority with the Federal Reserve Board to decide the question as to what is good commercial paper. The Senator knows that that question has been debated for years and years in Congress.

Mr. McLEAN. Of course. This proposed law does not affect that one way or the other.

Mr. GRONNA. But it leaves the arbitrary power to the board——

Mr. McLEAN. This adds nothing to the law in that regard.

Mr. GRONNA. To decide which is and which is not commercial paper.

Mr. McLEAN. No.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the bill (S. 3958) to amend section 14 of the Federal reserve act, which is identical in language with the bill just passed, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

RESIGNATION OF OFFICERS IN 1861.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have a communication here which I ask may be read from the desk, and I shall then follow it by the introduction of a joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

PETITION OF THE CONFEDERATE NAVAL VETERANS TO CONGRESS TO ACCEPT THE RESIGNATIONS OF THEIR DEAD COMRADES.

Several hundred officers of the United States Navy, from the South, resigned their commissions in 1861 to cast their fortunes with their States. The resignations of most of them were accepted at the time. There were 136 of them, however, who resigned at about the same time whose resignations were not accepted and the Navy Register of 1862 records them as "dismissed," while it records all the others as "resigned."

By instructions from my comrades at our reunion in Birmingham in May, 1916, I am here to petition Congress to accept these resignations in order that their descendants may not bear the stigma of their parents' dismissal from the United States Navy. If any were dismissed for any other cause than that they believed they owed paramount allegiance to their States let the record in their case remain as it is.

The heroism these men displayed during the Civil War is an American heritage and may be the pride of every American citizen. Their sons and grandsons fought your battles in the Spanish-American War. Their grandsons and great-grandsons are fighting the battles of America to-day. They are denied the privilege of joining patriotic orders because their ancestors are branded as having been dismissed from the service.

The Confederate Naval Veterans have tried to get the Confederate Army Veterans to join in this petition, and include those who resigned from the United States Army in 1861 to cast their fortunes with their States, but we have been unable to do so. In fact, we withdrew our petition last June for that purpose. After waiting a year to secure their cooperation and receiving no response we feel that we should not be denied because they have not joined with us in our petition.

Every man named in that list of 136 is dead, and of the 6,000 who served in the Confederate States Navy all are dead but about 150, and those are following them fast, and we ask this boon at the hands of Congress before we, too, have passed away.

In the list is Capt. Sidney Smith Lee, brother of Gen. Robert E. Lee. The general resigned April 25, 1861, and his resignation was accepted. The captain resigned April 22, 1861, and the Navy Register records him as having been dismissed on that date. Capt. Lee's name appears on the accompanying list.

This act of grace is within the power of Congress, either to date the acceptance of these resignations back to the time they resigned or of this date, 57 years after they resigned.

Respectfully,

THE CONFEDERATE NAVAL VETERANS,
By A. O. WRIGHT, Admiral Commanding.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am sure that in view of that statement, and the facts connected with this matter, no one would object to having the records show that these men were not dismissed, but that they resigned, as they did in the many cases of men who happened to be in the American Navy and who threw their fortunes with the Confederate side. I introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 187) to correct the records of certain naval and marine officers who joined the Confederate forces was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That every officer or midshipman of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, who was dismissed therefrom solely because he left such service in order to join, or because he joined, the Confederate forces for service during the Civil War, shall be held and considered to have duly resigned and to have been honorably discharged therefrom, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to correct the records of such officers and midshipmen in accordance herewith, as of the date of such dismissal.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a joint resolution, and under the rule it must go to a committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I will merely introduce the joint resolution, then, and——

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator want to have it referred?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. As a part of my remarks I would like to incorporate a list showing the names of the men who were in the American Navy prior to the war and who would be covered by the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The list referred to is as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 1 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MYERS, which was to insert a new section, to be known as and numbered section 15, to read as follows:

SEC. 15. That none of the provisions of this act shall apply to and none of its benefits shall be received or enjoyed by any person who is a member of any association, society, organization, or union of Government employees which is affiliated with, subject to, or a member or component part of, or acknowledges the authority of, any higher or superior body or institution of organized labor; and, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of Pensions shall make and enforce rules for the enforcement of this section and governing the method and character of proof required in order that employees may receive the benefits of this act.

Amend further by renumbering the subsequent sections in accordance herewith.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay," but I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). The senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. NUGENT's name was called). The Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] is absent on official business.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and he not being present I transfer my pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. PHIPPS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], which I transfer to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GAY. May I inquire if the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. GAY. I have a general pair with that Senator which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "nay."

Mr. BALL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington) after having voted in the negative. The Chair desires to state that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent, and I agreed to take care of him with a pair to-day. My recollection is that he voted on yesterday upon this amendment the same way that I have voted, and therefore I shall allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MCCUMBER entered the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]; and

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

The roll call resulted—yeas 3, nays 43, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas are 3 and the nays are 43. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] are present and paired. A quorum is therefore present. The nays have it.

So Mr. MYERS's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of the practical unanimity with which the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] was voted down, I want to supplement what I said yesterday by reading into the RECORD an extract from a letter of Mr. Herbert C. Brown, Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, upon the subject comprised by that amendment.

In answer to a question asked him by Congressman BLANTON:

May we expect efficient service generally from our employees as long as they are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. Brown said:

I believe that the affiliation of Government employees with labor organizations must, of necessity, result in a reduction of efficiency in the departments. I am of the opinion that such affiliation has an unfortunate effect on the morale of the service. The employee comes to feel that his success depends not so much on his individual effort as on the political strength of the organization to which he belongs.

"(3) Is there not fully as much reason for separating our Government employees from strike organizations as there was for separating the police and firemen from such organizations?"

Yes, quite as much reason, and even more. In the event of police strikes or strikes involving a fire department it will always be possible, because of the relatively small number of people involved, for residents of the community to assume the burdens laid down by the striking policemen or firemen, and while it is true that inexperienced persons would not be able to safeguard the public interests to the same extent as could regular policemen or firemen, yet the danger to the community could be kept within reasonable bounds and situations of this sort could be taken care of with a relatively small loss to the public. In the case of a strike of Government workers, which might involve not merely a few employees, but practically the entire force in the Government service, the damage to the public interest would be far greater. Such a strike would practically result in the suspension of all the functions of the Federal Government. It would affect not merely a few people, or a few thousand people, but, practically speaking, the entire population of the country.

Senators may vote down amendments like this, but they can not refute the arguments upon which the affirmative of the amendment is founded.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 13, in line 6, after the word "of," I move to insert the words "paying annuities and of," so that it will read "for the purpose of paying annuities and of carrying out the provisions of section 11 of this act."

Mr. SMOOT. I see no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 13, in line 6, after the word "of," where it appears the first time in the line, insert the words "paying annuities and of," so that it will read "shall constitute a part of said fund for the purpose of paying annuities and of carrying out the provisions of section 11 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to offer one other slight amendment. On page 13, in line 9, the word "the" appears to have been stricken out, as though it were an amendment of the committee which had been agreed to. I am satisfied that that was done by inadvertence. It was probably a typographical error. The word "the" should remain in the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that amendment will be considered as disagreed to and the word "the" will remain in the text.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been requested not to do what I had intended to do, and under the circumstances I am going to respect the wish, but I indulge the hope that in some way these empty benches may transmit to their possessors the information which the Senator from Utah is about to give. I think it due to the taxpayers at least that Senators should hear him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when we stop to think that the bill before this body, which, if the duration of the bill is 75 years, will involve the expenditure of the enormous sum of $2,475,000,000, it is unbelievable that we can not get more than one-half dozen Senators to listen to the argument upon such a measure——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, there were some of us who failed to understand the Senator's statement as to the length of time involved.

Mr. SMOOT. Seventy-five years. I know that in the last few years the minds of the people, and particularly legislators, have been trying to grasp what a billion dollars really means, and yet no man can stop to consider how far-reaching the expenditure of that amount of money will go without wondering when all such huge expenditures of money are going to cease.

Two years ago on the floor of this Chamber I made the statement that not for the next quarter of a century would the expenses of our Government be less than $3,500,000,000 per annum. I was taken to task for that statement. I was charged with talking politics and for political advantage, and the statement was virtually denied by officials of the Government. But I say again that the expenses of the Government of the United States will not be for the next quarter of a century less than $3,500,000,000 per year, and I am fearful that they will be at least a half billion dollars more than that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would give us some justifiable reason for supposing the sum would be less than $5,000,000,000, considering the way we are making appropriations and increasing expenses.

Mr. SMOOT. I was prepared, Mr. President, to expect estimates from the departments of the Government for $4,000,000,000 for the coming fiscal year, particularly after the denial had been so vehemently made that our expenditures would ever again amount to $3,500,000,000, but when the actual estimates came in for the coming fiscal year they, in conjunction with expenditures not actually estimated for, amounted to $5,200,000,000, notwithstanding the fact that the war has been over for 14 months.

I know it is very unpopular for a Senator or Representative to undertake to reduce appropriations, and one who does so is looked upon with a great deal of disgust; he becomes very unpopular here in the District of Columbia and every effort is made to render him unpopular with his people at home; but be that as it may, Mr. President, so long as I am in public life I am going to try to treat the money of the people of the United States and its expenditure through appropriations by Congress in the same way that I would if the money belonged to me personally. I am just as sure as I live that if Senators of the United States would give attention to the details of appropriation bills, we could cut them by hundreds of millions, if not by billions, of dollars each year.

I am fully aware that there is going to be a retirement bill passed, and if the pending one was a proper bill I should favor it, as I have favored similar legislation in the past. I do not want a bill to pass this Congress unless at least Senators have had an opportunity to understand what its provisions are and what obligations it is imposing upon the Government of the United States. When that information shall have been given to the Senate, so far as I am concerned, it shall rest with this body whether the legislation now before the Senate shall be passed in its present form or whether it shall be amended.

In nearly all the former bills which have been before Congress relating to the subject of retirement the age of retirement has been fixed at 70 years. I am not going to repeat the argument which was made by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] upon this subject, but I wish that every Senator would read what he said, for no honest man can refute the statements made by him.

The pending bill provides three ages for retirement of Government employees: One class is to be retired at the age of 60 years, another at 62 years, and the third at 65 years of age. I wish to say, however, in addition to what was said by the Senator from Ohio on yesterday, that, if the ages are ultimately agreed to in this pending bill, the result will be that the provision allowing an extension of two terms of two years over and above the ages of retirement, the inefficient clerks of the Government will remain in the service the extra four years, but the efficient man will leave the service, draw his annuity of $720 per annum, seek private employment, and the Government of the United States will lose his services perhaps for 10 years.

I know that it is proper and right when a man, whether he be an employee of the Government or of a private institution, has given the best part of his life to the Government or to such institution and becomes disabled in any way, I do not care how it may come about, through age or otherwise, there ought to be consideration shown him and an annuity of some kind paid to him in order that he may not suffer during the remaining days of his life; but where a man at 60 years of age is in the vigor of health, as most men are, there is no necessity for his retirement. Some of the best service ever given not only to the Government of the United States but to institutions of every character and kind has been rendered by men between the ages of 60 and 75 years. I say to Senators that I can go into the departments of the Government to-day and find men 75 years of age who, after having served the Government for now nearly 40 years, are the men who have all the details of the department at their fingers' ends. If you want any information in reference to governmental affairs you can get it from them.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. Have any of the men to whom the Senator refers asked to be retired at 60 years of age?

Mr. SMOOT. Not one, Mr. President. And if it were not for filling the RECORD with letters, I should like to have inserted as a part of my remarks 20 or 25 letters from men in the service above the age of 70 years who state that they hope that no provision will be made whereby they will be compelled to leave the service of the United States until they shall have arrived at an age when their services will no longer be valuable to the Government.

We all believe in a contributory plan; I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor, nor do I believe there are many Representatives who do not believe a contributory plan is the one which should be adopted; but, as I have said, I would rather have a noncontributory plan than to have the plan provided for in this bill. Most of the evil in this bill arises because of the age limit, and I am going to offer an amendment to this bill striking out 60, 62, and 65 as the ages of retirement and inserting in lieu thereof the age of 70.

I have had prepared a careful estimate of the cost by years of retiring employees in the classified civil service at the ages of 60, 62, and 65, under the provisions of the pending bill, and at the age of 70, with the same benefits. The statement is based upon the number of employees who were in the Government service before the war, just as all the other estimates have been made upon the same basis. That is the only fair way to make a comparison of costs. The estimate is made for a period of years, running from 1 year to 77 years, and gives the total cost under the provisions of the bill as reported to the Senate, including all that the Government of the United States would be required to pay and all that would be contributed by the employees as proposed under the plan of the bill. I am not going to take the figures for each year, but will begin with the year that the act takes effect and follow on down every fifth year until the seventy-seventh year is reached. I ask unanimous consent, however, that the table showing the comparative estimate of costs be inserted in the RECORD at the end of my remarks as part thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the table referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. With the retirement ages fixed at 60, 62, and 65 the total cost for the first year this bill takes effect will be $4,584,871, while, with the retirement age fixed at 70, the cost will be $2,051,387. For the fifth year, in the first instance, the cost will be $7,629,299 as against $3,006,582; for the tenth year, $12,070,624 as against $4,388,062; for the fifteenth year, $17,987,266 as against $7,146,618; for the twentieth year, $25,297,838 as against $10,122,487; for the twenty-fifth year, $33,064,667 as against $14,344,735; for the thirtieth year, $39,168,775 as against $18,576,206; for the thirty-fifth year, $42,429,271 as against $21,821,095; for the fortieth year, $42,780,162 as against $23,418,405; for the forty-fifth year, $41,299,243 as against $23,451,217; for the fiftieth year, $39,810,490 as against $22,007,725; for the fifth-fifth year, $38,759,167 as against $20,304,967; for the sixtieth year, $38,193,032 as against $19,323,573; for the sixty-fifth year, $37,977,711 as against $18,901,116; for the seventieth year, $37,925,831 as against $18,774,315; and for the seventy-fifth year, $37,919,821 as against $18,750,221. The total for the 77 years under the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 will be $2,475,299,798 as against a total cost with the retirement age fixed at 70 of $1,228,462,661.

The cost to the Government, and the percentage of the cost to the Government, and the cost to the employees, and the percentage of the cost to the employees perhaps will tell the story better than the total cost as to what changes my amendment would make in the bill. I will give the total, so as to save time; but any Senator who desires to follow this and see just what the difference may be, can find every year from the year the act goes into effect for the next 75 years.

In other words, the cost to the Government at the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 would be $1,943,281,146. At the retirement age of 70 the cost to the Government would be $804,406,769. The average percentage of cost to the Government at the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 would be 78.51 per cent, and at the age of 70 it would be 65.48 per cent, while the percentage of cost to the employees at the ages of 60, 62, and 65 would be 21.48 per cent, and at the retirement age of 70 it would be 34.52 per cent. The total cost to the employees at the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 would be $532,018,652, and at the retirement age of 70 it would be $424,055,892.

Mr. President, in all of the discussion of the retirement bill the statement has so often been made that we were working upon the half-and-half plan. I recognize that my amendment is not going to reach that end. If the amendment suggested by me should be agreed to, the employees would pay 34.52 per cent. That is the average percentage for the 77 years. If, however, the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 should be retained, the Government employees would pay but 21.48 per cent.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I am satisfied that the Senator's statement is true that his amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not say that.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood the Senator so to say.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I think it will be agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to suggest that as far as one can ascertain from surrounding conditions, only eight Senators will have ever heard it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am fearful that that is so, Mr. President; but the condition is such that I do not know what is going to change it. I know that the Senators are tired out, and I know that we have only about 49 or 50 Senators in the city, and I know that nothing will keep them in the Chamber, and I know that legislation which is coming up at this time is passed not because of the fact that they have studied the same or listened to the discussion upon it, but because they have confidence in the committee reporting it to the Senate. It is, however, a very unfortunate way to pass legislation, whether it be in the year 1920 or any other year.

I know that it will make no difference if we stand here and discuss this question for hours. It will not change the situation; and I want to say at this time that I want the estimated cost to go into the RECORD, so that if the House desires to make an examination of it it will be there, so that Members can all get it, or anyone else that is interested in this proposition can see it.

It has been stated to me time and time again in the last few years that if the bill passed as it was, it would cost the Government of the United States $100,000 the first year, and the next 10 years it would not cost the Government of the United States anything. I can not imagine, of course, why any such statement as that is made, and it can be made only upon one hypothesis, and that is this: If an individual goes to the bank and deposits 2½ per cent of all his income, to be drawn out of the bank some future day, and if there are 100 such depositors, the amount of the deposits might run the affairs of the bank, providing they used all of the money deposited; but when the depositor wanted his money, it having been expended for the purpose of running the bank, it would not have the money on hand to pay the depositor, and the only thing for the bank to do would be to borrow the money or close its doors.

Now, the 2½ per cent paid by the employee of the Government each year for 10 years or for any length of time is given to the Government as the trustee for that employee, and if he serves the Government until he reaches the age of retirement he not only receives all that was deposited by him but the interest upon it, with the hope that with what the Government of the United States gives he can be paid $720 per annum as long as he lives thereafter. That is all there is to it; and if the Government of the United States takes the money that is deposited by the employees for the purpose of receiving an annuity at the age of retirement, and spends it for any purpose whatever during the first 10 years or the first 20 years, the Government would not have to raise revenue during that time to meet that amount; but when the time comes for payment it will have to raise it, and it will have to raise it in a lump sum, not only the amount that they paid in but interest at the rate of 4 per cent besides, if the employees draw it out before 15 years. So we had better not deceive ourselves. The figures will show just exactly what it will cost the Government and what it will cost the employees year by year, beginning with the first year and ending with the seventy-seventh year.

Mr. President, in reference to this estimated cost, it has been checked and rechecked by the very best actuaries there are in the United States, and I have not any doubt but that it is right. It makes no difference to me just what little differences there may be in the estimates. What I am more interested in is the kind of legislation, the plans that we are undertaking, because this is a new undertaking on the part of the Government, and I am frank to admit that if a greater number of employees enter the Government service it will cost more as the number increases; and these estimates, as I stated, are based upon the employment of 263,152 people.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator tell us under whose supervision these estimates were made?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked the Efficiency Bureau to make them up, and I told Mr. Brown of the Efficiency Bureau to get them up just as quickly as possible and to take the very best help that there was in the United States to do it. I said I did not know how soon the bill was coming up, and I wanted to be prepared to submit the figures at the time that I intended to offer the amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I think perhaps it would be just as well, unless the chairman of the committee desires to say something, to offer my amendment; or I can offer it at this time, and then the chairman of the committee can speak upon the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator can offer the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Before I offer it, however, I want to call attention to the fact that if the proposed amendment that I shall offer is adopted the balance of the bill will be left just as it is, and all the relief provisions of the bill will be in it, and the changes made will be as to the age of retirement. I call attention to section 5 of the pending bill to show how carefully the relief provisions have been provided for, and no employee can object to them.

Section 5 reads as follows:

SEC. 5. That any employee to whom this act applies who shall have served for a total period of not less than 15 years, and who, before reaching the retirement age as fixed in section 1 hereof, becomes totally disabled for useful and efficient service by reason of disease or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on the part of the employee, shall upon his or her own application or upon the request or order of the head of the department, branch, or independent office concerned, be retired on an annuity under the provisions of section 2 hereof: Provided, however, That no employee shall be retired under the provisions of this section until examined by a medical officer of the United States or a duly qualified physician or surgeon or board of physicians or surgeons designated by the Commissioner of Pensions for that purpose and found to be disabled in the degree and in the manner specified herein.

Mr. President, this amendment simply means this, that if an employee reaches the age of 60 or the age of 62 or the age of 65, following out the classes in the bill as it is now before the Senate, and is still in full vigor of life, the Government of the United States can say, "You are to serve until you are 70 years old." If he is disabled for usefulness by reason of disease or injury, he can retire, even though he has not reached the ages named.

The difference between the costs lies in the fact that from the age of 60 to 70 there are 10 years that the employee pays his contribution and the Government pays him his salary. Not only that, Mr. President, but the interest compounded upon all his former payments makes a difference in the cost not only to the Government but to the employee himself.

Is there anything, or could there be anything, fairer? I know that there are hundreds of men who will not serve the Government of the United States until they are 70. I know there will be hundreds of cases of employees being disabled, perhaps physically, perhaps by accident, who will not even reach the age of 60, whose annuity will be paid under this bill.

I am not objecting to that, Mr. President. If an employee is not able to do the work, if he is in no physical condition to do it, if his mental condition is such that he can not do it, and he has served the Government of the United States faithfully for 15 years or more, I am willing that he should draw his annuity. But I am not willing, after having paid an employee who has reached the age of 60 years the salary which the Government would be compelled to pay him all that time, to allow him to leave the Government service, draw $720 from the Government, and give all of his energy and service, which ought to be given to the Government of the United States, to some outside concern. That is the whole matter in a nutshell, and I offer the following amendment.

On page 1 of the bill, line 7, I move to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "seventy." Then, Mr. President, I will follow that amendment with another, to strike out, on page 1, line 10, after the word "hereof," the following proviso:

Provided, That mechanics, city and rural letter carriers, and post-office clerks shall be eligible for retirement at 62 years of age, and railway postal clerks at 60 years of age.

In other words, Mr. President, the age of the retirement is 70, irrespective of the classes, and section 5 of the bill, known as the relief section, will apply to them all. If there is a post-office clerk who is ineligible at the age of 60, or 58, or 56, or any other age, if he has been in the service of the United States 15 years he will receive the annuity. But, Mr. President, if they are able physically and mentally when they reach the age of 60, under the amendment they must serve until they are 70 years of age; or if not 70, until they are disqualified by physical disability or mental disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "sixty-five" and insert the word "seventy," so that it will read:

Or shall have on any date thereafter reached the age of 70 years and rendered at least 15 years of service," etc.

Also on the same page, line 10, after the word "hereof," strike out the colon and the proviso down to and excluding the period on line 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah has offered two amendments, and the question will be first taken on the first amendment which was read by the Secretary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah, at the beginning of his address, made a statement that was rather startling to one who understands that the Senator will vote for this bill. The Senator from Utah stated, in substance, that so long as he remained a Member of Congress he would handle the money of the Government exactly the same as he would if the funds were his own. I understand that when this amendment is agreed to the Senator from Utah intends to vote for the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator and to the Senate very frankly that I am just as sure as that I live that if the amendment were not offered the bill would pass with the ages fixed at 60, 62, and 65, and I am going to do the very best I can for the Government of the United States, and it was with that in view that I offered the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand, Mr. President, but I think I can convince the Senator, if he remains in his seat, that he is not going to do anything like what he says he would do.

Mr. SMOOT. I am generally here.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not particularly opposed to an old-age pension. I do not know that I would be greatly opposed to the Government becoming an insurer of the health or longevity of all its citizens. I do not know that there would be anything greatly inequitable if the Government should say that it will take care of every man and woman who reaches the age of 70, and when they can no longer take care of themselves, provided it works honestly and equitably and is fairly applied to every one of the citizens of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senator that if I had an employee in my service who had served me for 30 or 40 or 50 years and had been a faithful servant all of that time, if I had a dollar left on earth I would never allow him to suffer.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly, Mr. President; we would all do that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is how I would feel about an employee who worked for me. I would give my money for that purpose, and I think a reasonable bill ought to be passed by the Congress of the United States for Government employees.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator forgets—and that is the whole trouble with this class legislation—that the bill has to be paid by those who are not singled out for Government benefits. It is not the Senator who is paying. Let us give a parallel case, and see whether the Senator would follow the same rule that he is applying here. Let us suppose that the Senator, as an employer, employs 110 people; that to 10 of those he pays $1,400 a year and that to the other hundred he pays $700 a year. That is about the fair difference between the average earnings of like employment in the country as compared with Government employment, at least that was the condition before the war and undoubtedly it will be the condition when we return to normal conditions.

Now, the question is this, Would the Senator say to those to whom he is paying $700 a year, "I will tax you to give a pension to those to whom I am paying $1,400 a year"? I do not think the Senator would do so; and if he attempted to do it, I think he would have a strike of the hundred in less than 24 hours. That is what the Senator is doing in voting for this bill.

But that is not all, Mr. President. Suppose those to whom he is paying $1,400 a year are working 7½ hours and those to whom he is paying $700 a year are giving him service 10 hours a day. Would he go to those who are working 10 hours a day for $700 a year and say, "I propose to tax you to pay a pension to those who are laboring 7½ hours a day and who are receiving $1,400 a year"? Again, I do not think the Senator would use his own funds as he now proposes to use the funds of the Government. But let us not stop there——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. It is very easy to state a hypothetical case and make an argument upon it.

Mr. McCUMBER. These are not hypothetical cases; they are the facts.

Mr. SMOOT. I know what the Senator is trying to arrive at.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And I know it can be answered. But I do not know that I want to take the time of the Senator to interject what I would say in reply. However, I think the statement made by the Senator can be answered very easily, indeed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I know the answer. There is just one answer. The answer is that the Government will get better service. It has been stated over and over again. I do not think the Government will get any better service. The answer is that you will get rid a little earlier of the men who are unfit, because you can pension them and get those who are better qualified. That does not apply. On the contrary, exactly the opposite will result, and I will tell the Senator why. Here is a person who has labored for so many years. Perhaps he is unfit now. If he can stay a year or two or three or four years longer he can get a pension, and so the bureau will keep him there, because it will struggle on with the knowledge that in a few years it will get rid of him anyway, and he will be employed when otherwise his services might be dispensed with.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator has not read the bill, or he would not have made a statement of that kind. The provisions of this bill are so liberal that if an employee is disqualified, physically or mentally, after serving 15 years, he is entitled to his annuity, and therefore if he is 54, or 55, or 52, even, under the provisions of the bill he can be retired. I called particular attention to section 5 of the bill, providing for the relief measures, and stated to the Senate that I thought they were most liberal; and I do think so. As to the other part, I will say to the Senator, though I dislike to interrupt him——

Mr. McCUMBER. No, the Senator can go on; and I will answer him when he gets through. I do not object to interruptions, and I am very glad to have them; I have read the bill and understand it. I understand what it means, I understand what its effect is going to be, and from my knowledge of human nature, I do not think it is going to benefit the service. If the Senator thinks so, he is entitled to his own convictions. I am trying at this very moment to convince the Senator that the bill does not do what he would do in his own private business, notwithstanding the fact that he asserts that he would handle Government funds exactly the same as he would handle his own under like conditions, because it is inequitable to the people who have to foot the bill, and I have enough confidence in the sense of justice of the Senator from Utah to know what he would do were the power in his hands under like conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had 110 employees and they served me for 40 or 50 years, as the case may be, or if the proposition was less than that, but over 15 years, whatever I gave them, no matter whether they received a salary of $700 or $1,400, I would have to foot the bill, if I had the money or property to do so. If I could do it I would do it, and if I could not do it that would be another question.

Mr. McCUMBER. The peculiarity of the case is that in this instance the Senator would not be paying the bill. He has got to shift the bill on the public, and the public are those whose earnings are not $1,400 a year, and yet they have to go into their pockets and make the payment. So the Senator can not say, "Oh, well, I would suffer the loss." No; the Senator would have to charge the expenses to the hundred to take care of the ten. That is the actual operation of the law.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator can make any kind of statement he wants to, but all that I would have to do, so far as the Government was concerned, would be to pay my share of taxes. I recognize that. The Senator compared the Government with myself, and said that I would not carry out in my own life a provision like this if I instead of the Government were employing people. The Government is not employing all the people of the United States. This applies to the employees of the Government, just as my position would apply to the 110 men he spoke of as employed by me. I would take care of the 110 men, and I would do exactly the same with my 110 employees as I have asked the Government of the United States to do with its employees. No matter what the Senator may say, that is my position.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is very far afield from the real question. The Government does not employ all these, but the people of the Government pay the bill, and that is the thing that the Senator does not look at.

Mr. SMOOT. I do look at it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say that those who are receiving far less, working as honestly and as faithfully, are the ones who are called upon to pay the bill, and the Senator can not by any kind of argument get away from those premises. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

Mr. SMOOT. It is very easy to get away from the premises, because the money that I have to take care of my employees, if I have the money, was not made by my labor; it was made out of the profits of the goods that I sold to some one else. Some one else furnishes the money to me to pay, just the same as the taxpayers furnish the money to the Government of the United States to pay its employees. So the analogy is perfect, notwithstanding the Senator says otherwise.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the analogy is perfect, that if you tax one class of people to pay a benefit to another class the loss is going to be upon the class that is taxed. That is a little proposition in mathematics that neither the Senator from Utah nor anyone else can possibly escape. The money must come from somewhere. The people have got to pay the money. The Congress distributes that money in its appropriations. It ought to attempt to distribute it equitably and it ought not to provide for any distribution that would take it out of the pockets of one class for the special benefit of another class.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will give the Senator all the time he wants. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator's statement as a principle of business. There is no doubt about that at all. But the same thing applies to the individual. If I make any profits at all in selling the goods, those profits would be made through the employment of the 110 employees. I tax the people who buy the goods, and the people who buy the goods tax the people who buy from them, and that profit then is in my hands, and I can do as I please with it.

The Government gets it by taxation, and when it is in the possession of the Government the Government does with it as Congress says. If it is wrong to pay money for this purpose, then we are all wrong who vote for it or believe in the principle. It seems to me that there is quite a difference between paying an annuity by the Government to its own employees and paying an annuity by the Government to the employees of REED SMOOT or anyone else.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us see where the Senator's argument leads him. He says that as an employer necessarily if he pays anyone an excessive price, or whether it is excessive or not, he must make it out of the profits, therefore the public to whom he sells goods must really be the parties who are paying it, because they are paying his profits, and therefore he concludes that the officials of the Government and the Congress of the United States are perfectly justified in levying an unequal tax upon one class for the benefit of another class. I will have to disagree with the Senator upon that character of conclusion.

But this is not the only feature of the case. The Senator says that he would handle the funds of the Government exactly the same, and that means upon the same principle as he would handle his own private funds. Let us carry this matter a step further, and let us suppose that the 10 persons whom the Senator employs and who get $1,400 a year also get one month's absence with pay. The other 100 do not get any absence with pay; they have to work, and work for a less sum of money in order to make ends meet. Again the Senator turns around and charges those who work 12 months out of the year for $700 for the benefit of those who work 11 months for $1,400. That strikes me as being a little bit inequitable. It may be that it does not so strike the Senator.

Nor does it end there. If those who are working 12 months in the year for $700 get sick, they must lose their time; but the Senator would give those who are receiving $1,400 a year another month of sick leave without any loss of salary, and again he will turn around and load the burden upon the poor fellow who has to pay his own sick bills, who has to lose his time, and who gets but half the pay for the full 12 months of the year.

I say it is inequitable, and I for one will not vote a tax upon this other class of people to help out a class that is receiving far more than they are. If the question comes up to pension every one in the United States who works honestly and fairly until he can work no more, that will raise entirely a different question, because then we could apply a rule of pensions that would at least approximate fairness. You can not do it in this case.

Again, the Senator from Utah spends some time here in convincing the Senate that the Government in a few years will pay 64 per cent, or about that, of this cost of pension, while the individual will pay, we will say, 36 per cent. The Senator is mistaken there, too. Just wait two years from now. There will be a demand to increase the salaries of these clerks. Part of the demand will be based upon the sum of money that is retained to pay pensions, and the Senator, I think, and probably the rest of us, will vote to increase the pay, so that in effect the Government will be paying every cent of it. They will be backed by all the labor unions in the country and we will bow just as we are bowing now to a united demand of the few against a disunited sense of justice of the many.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to infer that I shall take the position that the amount that is deducted from the employees monthly, which is 2½ per cent of the salary, shall ever be taken into consideration in fixing a salary. I shall take the opposite view and say that all that the Government pays shall be counted as a part of his salary.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, it will pass; and that additional salary will take care of the amount that will be necessary to pay the pension. I am not at all doubting that that will be the final result. So we do not need to waste a great deal of time in asserting who is going to foot the bill. The Government is going to foot the bill, the taxpayers are going to foot the bill, and the people who work the hardest and longest and get the least pay will be the people who are going to take care of this pension. That is the whole thing in a nutshell, and that is why there will be one vote against the proposition.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just a word or two relative to the proposed amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which amendment I have about concluded to accept. There has been more or less of exaggeration, however, in regard to the subject of ages of retirement, and I wish to call attention, as I think I should call attention, to two or three matters in connection with the age limit.

Figures have been given as to what it would cost the Government to retire its employees at the age of 60 years. We grant, of course, that the cost to the Government will be much greater if it retires its employees at a lower age than if it retires them at a more advanced age, but it ought to be remembered, Mr. President, that the age of 60 years as the age of retirement applies only to the railway postal clerks, of whom there are about 21,000, as against at least 300,000 who are now in the Government service. Why should the age limit have been fixed at 60 years for employees in that class? Because of the more exacting nature of the work they perform, because of both the physical and mental strain upon workers in that class, and because of the conditions under which they work they are apt to break down and become inefficient at the earlier age. That is why the age limit was put at 60 years, though it may be a little low.

Then, why do we make another class which will retire at the age of 62 years? That class includes rural letter carriers, city letter carriers, and mechanics. From the physical standpoint, the work of the carriers and the mechanics is hard and difficult, and a man will not stand up, perhaps, under the exercise and strain of that work as well as he will if his work is simply clerical and therefore less laborious and difficult. We make 65 years the age of retirement for employees generally. The railway postal clerks, the rural carriers, the city carriers, and the mechanics constitute a decided minority of the employees in the Government service.

What, however, did we do in addition? The bill provides that, having reached the age of retirement in any one of these classes, there may be, if the employee is still efficient, an extension of time during which he may serve the Government for two years, and that may be again repeated if the employee desires to serve longer and the head of the department or the bureau certifies to his efficiency in the service. So we thought we had fairly well covered that question.

I appreciate, however, the fact, Mr. President, that scores and hundreds of men in the Government service are perfectly fit and efficient for the work they do at the age of 75 years and over.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of what the Senator has just stated, I am prompted to ask him this question: When the committee of employees was before the Civil Service Committee of the Senate asking for this legislation and asking that the ages be fixed at 60, 62, and 65, did they look upon the chairman of the Senate committee as a decrepit old man?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think they did.

Mr. POMERENE. I thought not.

Mr. STERLING. I think they sized up the chairman of the committee as one who would not retire until this civil-service retirement bill had passed.

But, Mr. President, as I said a while ago, there are those who are 70 years of age and over who are able to render efficient service, and their continued services are sought to be provided for in the bill itself. However, as stated by the Senator from Utah, section 5 of the bill—the section relating to disability and retirement on an annuity for disability after 15 years' service—will, I think, cover many employees who through disease or through injury would be retired, and in view of that section and in view of my belief, too, in regard to the ability of very many who have reached the age of 70 years to still render efficient service, I am disposed to accept the amendment of the Senator from Utah, and I do now accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the other amendment follows in connection with the one which has just been agreed to and is on page 1, line 10, after the word "hereof," to strike out the proviso ending in line 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the whole and open to amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before this measure is put to a final vote there are a few additional observations which I desire to make. Before proceeding may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Did I understand that the Senator from Utah had incorporated in the RECORD the detailed report showing the difference in cost to the Government and the employees as a whole and to the Government and employees separately as between the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65 on one hand and the age of 70 years on the other?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked unanimous consent to do so, and it was granted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, some weeks ago when this bill was pending before the Senate a colloquy occurred amongst the Senators, in which I participated, as between the experts called before the committee who were supporting the so-called Sterling bill and Dr. Brown, who was the actuary who has been constantly consulted by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and myself. I may say, in view of the fact that Dr. Brown was referred to as one of the men who had been lobbying against the pending bill, that animadversion was wholly unjustified, because Dr. Brown, as the head of the Bureau of Efficiency, several years ago began the investigation of this subject under a Senate resolution which I myself presented to the Senate, which was unanimously adopted by the Senate, and under which it became his duty to investigate this subject from beginning to end. While I was chairman of the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment we used his services very freely; those of us who have been interested in this subject have used them since; and I very much regret that this one man in the Government service who knows more about this subject than all the other operatives in the Government service together was not called before the committee, so that they might have had the benefit of his information.

I regret, too, that this bill was not referred back to the committee when we challenged the correctness of the figures which were given by the alleged expert, Mr. Beach, so that Mr. Beach could have had an opportunity to cross-examine Dr. Brown, and Dr. Brown an opportunity to cross-examine Mr. Beach. But sometimes we do not want information; and that is what some Senators are afraid of on this subject. I am willing to undertake the task of persuading any set of men who will sit and listen to some facts and figures as to the substantial correctness of Dr. Brown's estimate, and my belief is that I could persuade some Senators, if they would sit in the Chamber; but I pray to be delivered from the task of persuading empty benches as to the correctness of my position.

Mr. President, I am of plain speech. I always have been and always expect to be, but I can not persuade myself that it is right to deceive ourselves or to deceive the public as to the cost of this retirement proposition.

Let me go back a little. I wish to say that some days ago I asked to have reprinted the substitute which I had offered and which was lying on the table. I had instructed the clerks in my office to change the maximum rate of assessment from 8 to 6 per cent. I do not know where the mistake occurred, but suffice it to say that a mistake did occur, and the reprint made the maximum assessment 8 per cent; it should be 6 per cent. I had expected to offer that amendment, but in view of conditions in the Senate I believe it will be useless to offer it now. However, I want Senators and Representatives, even after this passes the Senate, to give a little more attention to its details.

With an assessment limitation of 8 per cent for a period of 70 years I believe the bill which I proposed would have cost about $173,000,000. Reducing the assessment to 6 per cent, it would have cost probably between a million and two million dollars a year in addition to the $173,000,000. At the end of that time the system would have been absolutely self-sustaining. To those who are favoring the pending legislation, if it passes, I want to make the prediction that, although the employees of the Government will get under the amended bill their annuity, for which they will pay on the average about 34.51 per cent of the total cost, and the Government will pay the balance, that balance will be taken into consideration by the Congress when it comes to fixing their salaries afterwards. That has been the experience in Great Britain, in Canada, and in every country where the contributory plan has been adopted.

When we try to deceive ourselves as to the cost of these various propositions I want to call the attention of Senators to this fact: Probably two years ago the McKellar bill was presented. It was the famous fifty-fifty plan—50 per cent of the cost payable by the Government and 50 per cent by the employees, it was claimed. Under it, remember, the retirement ages were 65 and 68, and the maximum annuity was $600. That was called a fifty-fifty plan, though Dr. Maddrill, one of the experts, who favored one of the first drafts of the bill, said that the annuities as therein provided would cost about 6 per cent of the salaries—as he put it, a few tenths of 1 per cent below 6 per cent—but the advocates of the bill struck off all of the tenths over and above 5 per cent, 2½ per cent to be paid by the employees and 2½ per cent by the Government. For convenience they called it a fifty-fifty plan. The real purpose, in my judgment, was to deceive the public.

Then we come to the pending bill. The lobby get busier, and they come in with another plan. They decide that they will make a limitation of 2½ per cent; that the old and the young shall pay the same rate. The young man and young girl entering the service at the age of 20 must pay the 2½ per cent whether they get $1,000 or two or three or four or five thousand dollars, and they must pay it until they arrive at the retirement age. They continue to pay the 2½ per cent on their salaries, whatever they are, for all these years, and the elderly employees who have been feasting at the public crib all their lives only pay the 2½ per cent for a few years. They get the same annuity that the young and ambitious man and woman who enter the service get, and no more. The young employees with a little more than the average salary can go out and buy their annuities cheaper than they could get them from the Government.

Now, observe the influence of this fifty-fifty plan, which seems to be a sort of magic wand that is waved before the eyes of everybody who wants to inquire into the cost. Now, note: Under the pending bill they reduce the ages to 60, 62, and 65, and they increase the annuity from $600 as a maximum to $720, and the assessment is only 2½ per cent, so notwithstanding the fact that the years of retirement are reduced and the annuities are increased our good friend the chairman of the committee was induced the other day by these lobbyists or somebody to say that he believed eventually it would be a fifty-fifty plan. There are some "innocents abroad."

Let us now inquire what this is going to cost. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] discussed the table which he introduced. It is the result of the most careful investigation, covering a period of several years, by Dr. Brown and some of the ablest actuaries in the country. Mr. Beach will not dare to question the correctness of these figures, and Mr. Beach was one of the experts before the McKellar committee and before the Sterling committee. The first plan—the McKellar plan—was called the fifty-fifty plan, and the last plan is referred to—it is true with some hesitation—as a fifty-fifty plan, though there are all these different elements materially changing and increasing the cost to the Government.

The committee refused to call Dr. Brown before them. They did not want his expert knowledge. It might have undeceived them.

The total cost, under the bill as it was before the amendment, to the employees and to the Government together for 77 years would be $2,475,299,798; and now, since the retirement age has been increased to 70, this $2,475,299,798 total cost for the 77 years is reduced to $1,228,462,661.

Well, it is a pretty good afternoon's work to save to the Government and the people of the United States over $1,200,000,000; and if nothing more comes out of this debate, I shall always congratulate myself that I had a little something to do with this, and I want to congratulate the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Iowa that by reason of the fight we have made, if we have not accomplished anything more, we have saved to the American people over $1,200,000,000.

Now, let us see further.

Under the old plan, with the retirement ages of 60, 62, and 65, it would have cost the Government alone $1,943,281,146. Under the amended bill, making the retirement age 70 years, it will cost the Government only $804,406,769. The percentage of cost to the Government under the lower ages to which I have just referred was 78.51 per cent of the whole. Under the amended bill, the retirement age being 70, it will cost the Government 65.48 per cent. The cost to the employees under the first bill during these 77 years would be 21.49 per cent. Now, it will be 34.52 per cent. It will take some stretching of the imagination to say that where the employees pay only 21.49 per cent of the cost of the annuities it is a fifty-fifty plan.

Mr. President, I am still as firmly convinced as I ever was that the right system to be adopted is the one which will place a limitation upon the amount of the assessment, with the intention of ultimately making it self-sustaining. I believe that the experience of future years will demonstrate that that would be the wisest plan to adopt, both from the standpoint of the Government and from the standpoint of the employees themselves; but I can not persuade empty benches that that is so. My information is that with a great many Senators away from the city, and with others who have been under the influence of this magic wand that I have referred to, it is useless to talk this afternoon about adopting the substitute measure which I proposed, and which I should like to see adopted, and which would be adopted if I could bring it about; but at the present time it seems to me that I would be somewhat derelict in my duty if I did not accept the compromise which has been offered, rather than to run the risk of having the original bill pass the Senate. For that reason I am going to ask, not that my substitute be presented to be voted upon, but that it be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. I do that so that the Members of the House and other Members of the Senate who may perhaps arrive at the point where they will think it is necessary to give a little attention to the matter of an expenditure of $1,200,000,000 may have the benefit of an examination of the two bills, and an opportunity to study them and to compare them; and if there is anyone who is not satisfied with the report of the expense of these two bills in this comparative statement, he can at any time invite these actuaries before them for an investigation, and they will be glad to place all of the information they have at the disposal of any committee that wants to investigate the subject.

Mr. President, I do not know that it is necessary for me to repeat what I have said at different times. I feel deeply the necessity for some plan of retirement, for the good of the public service and for the benefit of those who have served the Government faithfully, and that means, I hope, a majority of these men; I know that it does not mean all of them.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] usually has a very cogent way of putting a point, and he has so spoken this afternoon. Many of the arguments which are produced in support of this retirement plan are equally worthy of consideration when it comes to the general question of an old-age pension, and there is some merit in it when it comes to those who are old and feeble. Whether there is a pension system or not, the old and feeble, during their declining years, ought to be cared for, as a matter of humanitarianism, if for no other reason. I do not know whether this will come before the Congress of the United States or not; I do not know whether it should be dealt with here or in the States separately. I have come to no conclusion in that behalf, but it is one of the questions that are going to be presented for decision, and perhaps not in the very far future.

Now, Mr. President, for the reasons thus perhaps briefly stated, I shall submit this matter to the candid consideration of the Senate.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. POMERENE to the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That beginning with the 1st day of July next following the passage of this act there shall be deducted and withheld from the monthly salary, pay, or compensation of every officer or employee of the United States to whom this act applies an amount computed to the nearest tenth of a dollar that will be sufficient, with interest thereon at 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually, to purchase from the United States an annuity, payable quarterly throughout life, for every such employee on arrival at the age of retirement, as herein provided. The deductions herein provided for shall, in the case of employees who are in the service of the Government at the time this act goes into effect, not to exceed 6 per cent of the said salary, pay, or compensation; and shall be based on such annuity tables as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, compounded annually, and shall be varied to correspond to any change in the rate of salary, pay, or compensation of the employee: Provided, however, That the deductions made from the salary, pay, or compensation of persons hereafter entering the service shall not exceed 6 per cent thereof, and such persons shall be entitled to such annuities only as said deductions with accumulations of interest thereon will purchase.

"SEC. 2. That the amounts so deducted and withheld shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and credited, with interest thereon, to an individual account of the officer or employee from whose salary, pay, or compensation the deduction is made, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to invest and reinvest such funds or any portion of usch funds in any of the following securities, namely: Bonds of the United States, bonds issued under the provisions of the Federal farm-loan act, bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of any State of the United States, or any county or municipal bonds which may be approved by the board of investments hereinafter provided for.

"The moneys deducted from salaries and the income derived therefrom shall be held and invested, as above described, by the Secretary of the Treasury until paid, as is hereafter provided. Any deficiency in the fund hereby created to carry out the provisions of this act shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"For the purpose of aiding the Secretary of the Treasury in investing the funds and enforcing the provisions of this act, a board of investment is hereby created, composed of the Treasurer of the United States, one person to be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury from his department and one person to be designated by the President from among the employees of the classified civil service. The members of the board of investment shall be sworn and shall hold office until others are appointed and qualified in their stead.

"SEC. 3. That all those engaged in the classified civil service shall be retired at 70 years of age and shall be entitled to the annuities and benefits herein defined: Provided, however, That if within 30 days before an officer or employee reaches the retirement age, the head of the department or independent office in which he is employed certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury that by reason of his efficiency and willingness to remain in the service the further continuance of such officer or employee would be advantageous to the public service, he may be retained for a further period not exceeding two years, and at the end of two years, by similar certification, he may be continued for another period not exceeding two years. Upon the failure of the head of the department or independent office to make the above-described certificate, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to place such employee upon the retired list.

"SEC. 4. That upon absolute separation from the classified civil service prior to the age of 60 years, and only upon such separation, the officer or employee may withdraw his savings then credited to his account, with the accumulations thereon, in one sum. In case of the death of an officer or employee while in the service the amount of his savings and accumulations thereon shall be paid to his legal representatives.

"SEC. 5. That upon separation from the classified civil service at any time within 10 years prior to the age of retirement the officer or employee shall receive such life annuity as his accumulated earnings, including the interest credited thereon, may purchase: Provided, however, That if said employee should die before receiving in annuities a sum equal to his accumulated savings, including the interest credited thereon, together with the compound interest thereon as herein provided, then the balance remaining to his credit over and above the annuities received by him shall be paid to his legal representatives.

"SEC. 6. That in case of reinstatement in the classified service of any person who at the time of his separation therefrom received a refund under section 4 of this act, he shall be deemed to be a new entrant to the service, and the monthly deductions from his salary shall be computed from his age at the date of such reinstatement unless he shall within 90 days after reinstatement pay to the Treasurer of the United States the amount refunded to him, which shall be applied toward the purchase of the annuity herein provided for and the deductions from his salary thereafter shall be only for such sums as may be necessary to pay for the balance of said annuity.

"SEC. 7. That beginning with the 1st day of July next following the passage of this act every officer or employee then or thereafter in the classified civil service who at that time or thereafter shall have reached the retirement age shall be retired, and if in the service of the United States for 20 years or more shall receive from the United States during the remainder of his life an annuity, payable quarterly, equal to one-half of the average annual salary, pay, or compensation received during his entire period of service after July 1, 1912, such annuity not to exceed a maximum of $600, and to cease at his death. Those who have served less than 20 years shall be entitled to one-twentieth of such annuity for each year of said service: Provided, however, That if such officer or employee at his death shall not have received annuities equal to the amount of the savings and deductions from his salary, pay, or compensation, with compound interest, as hereinbefore provided, the United States shall pay to his legal representatives the balance remaining to his credit.

"SEC. 8. That any employee to whom this act applies who shall have served for a total period of not less than 20 years, and who, before reaching the retirement age as fixed herein, becomes totally disabled for useful and efficient service by reason of disease or injury not due to vicious habits, intemperance, or willful misconduct on the part of the employee, shall, upon his or her own application or upon the request or order of the head of the department, branch, or independent office concerned, be retired on an annuity under the provisions hereof: Provided, however, That no employee shall be retired under the provisions of this section until examined by a medical officer of the United States or a duly qualified physician or surgeon or board of physicians or surgeons designated by the Commissioner of Pensions for that purpose and found to be disabled in the degree and in the manner specified herein.

"Every annuitant retired under the provisions of this section, unless the disability for which retired is permanent in character, shall, at the expiration of one year from the date of such retirement and annually thereafter until reaching the retirement age as defined in section 1 hereof, be examined under direction of the Commissioner of Pensions by a medical officer of the United States, or a duly qualified physician or surgeon or board of physicians or surgeons designated by the Commissioner of Pensions for that purpose, in order to ascertain the nature and degree of the annuitant's disability, if any; if the annuitant recovers and is restored to his or her former earning capacity before reaching the retirement age, payment of the annuity shall be discontinued from the date of the medical examination showing such recovery; if the annuitant fails to appear for examination as required under this section, payment of the annuity shall be suspended until continuance of the disability has been satisfactorily established. The Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized to order or direct at any time such medical or other examination as he shall deem necessary to determine the facts relative to the nature and degree of disability of any employee retired on an annuity under this section.

"Fees for examinations made under the provisions of this section by physicians or surgeons who are not medical officers of the United States shall be fixed by the Commissioner of Pensions, and such fees, together with the employee's reasonable traveling and other expenses incurred in order to submit to such examinations, shall be paid out of the appropriations for the cost of administering this act.

"In all cases where the annuity is discontinued under the provisions of this section before the annuitant has received a sum equal to the total amount of his or her contributions with accrued interest, the difference shall be paid to the retired employee, or to his or her estate, upon application therefor in such form and manner as the Commissioner of Pensions may direct.

"No person shall be entitled to recive an annuity under the provisions of this act, and compensation under the provisions of the act of September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," covering the same period of time; but this provision shall not be so construed as to bar the right of any claimant to the greater benefit conferred by either act for any part of the same period of time.

"SEC. 9. That upon the retirement of officers and employees as herein provided during any fiscal year, the funds appropriated for their salaries which remain unexpended shall be applied as follows:

"First. To the payment of their annuities;

"Second. Ten per cent thereof shall be covered back into the Treasury; and

"Third. The balance shall be available in the department or independent office from which said employees are retired for the appointment of other officers or employees in the lower grades. Except as herein provided all annuities shall be paid out of appropriations specially made for that purpose.

"SEC. 10. That every officer and employee in the classified civil service after this act takes effect shall be deemed to consent and agree to the deductions made and provided for herein and shall receipt in full for the salary, pay, or compensation which may be paid monthly or at any other time, and such payment shall be a full and complete discharge and acquittance of all claims and demands whatsoever for all services rendered by such person during the period covered by such payment, except his claim for the benefits to which he may be entitled under the provisions of this act, notwithstanding the provisions of sections 167, 168, and 169 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and of any other law, rule, or regulation affecting the salary, pay, or compensation of any person or persons employed in the classified civil service to whom this act applies.

"SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and keep all needful tables, records, and accounts required for carrying out the provisions of this act, including data showing the mortality experience of the officers and employees in the service and the rate of withdrawal from such service, and any other information that may serve as a guide for future valuations and adjustments of the plan for the retirement of officers and employees. The Secretary of the Treasury shall make a detailed comparative report annually to Congress showing all receipts and disbursements, together with the total number of persons receiving annuities and the amounts paid them.

"SEC. 12. That this act shall apply only to persons in the competitive classified civil service of the United States, including the District of Columbia, the Canal Zone, and the island possessions, whose salaries, pay, or compensation is paid from moneys of the United States and shall not apply to postmasters or to persons serving in positions excepted from examination, as defined in the civil-service rules. Whenever any person shall become separated from the classified civil service by reason of appointment in the unclassified service, such separation shall operate to take him out of the provisions of this act, except as to payment of any amount that may be due him. The President shall have power, in his discretion, to exclude from the operation of this act any group of employees whose tenure of office is intermittent or of uncertain duration.

"SEC. 13. That none of the moneys mentioned by this act shall be assignable either in law or equity, or be subject to execution or levy by attachment, garnishment, or other legal process or to the payment of taxes, local, State, or Federal; nor shall any money paid to any employee or to the legal representative of a deceased employee be subject to the payment of the debts of such employee.

"SEC. 14. That for the clerical and other service and all other expenses necessary for carrying out the provisions of this act during the fiscal year 1917, including salaries and rent in the District of Columbia, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $20,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. No officer of employee receiving a regular salary or compensation from the Government shall receive any additional salary or compensation for any service rendered in connection with the system of retiring employees provided for by this act.

"SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to perform or cause to be performed any or all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect; and his decision as to the amount to be deducted, the amount of interest to be credited, the amount of an annuity or refund to be paid, in any case, shall be final and conclusive and shall not be subject to review by any officer or authority."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792, known otherwise as the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York does not expect to go on with the bill this afternoon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; in connection with the action just taken by the Senate, I beg leave to give notice that on or about 2 o'clock on Monday I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to address the Senate upon the pending bill and the question of the military policy of the country.

Mr. POMERENE. My attention was diverted. What is the bill that was made the unfinished business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Army reorganization bill; and I was about to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 5, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 5, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, at this season, when the thought of the Christian world has been turned to the glorious doctrines of the resurrection, we lift our hearts to Thee. We do not think of the living among the dead but turn our thoughts to the source of life, to the author of our being, to the giver of all good and perfect gifts. We pray Thee to bestow upon us that life that will endure forever. Our little systems have their day. They have their day and pass away, but Thou art God from everlasting to everlasting. Thy kingdom shall have no end. Give us a part in the triumphs of Thy grace in the service to which Thou dost send us in the world. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. NELSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that Mr. BRITTEN had been appointed one of the managers of the conference on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 11927) to increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Coast Guard through the temporary provision of bonuses or increased compensation, in the place of Mr. Browning, deceased.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled joint resolutions, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution to readmit Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten to the status and privileges of a citizen of the United States; and

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution authorizing the Department of Commerce to participate in the National Marine Exposition to be held in New York in April, 1920.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Winona, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Bay Cities Physical Education and Recreation Association, of San Francisco, Berkeley, Oakland, and Alameda, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the promotion of physical education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Foreign Trade Club, of San Francisco, Calif., praying for the establishment and operation of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Marion County, Kans., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Smith-Towner bill providing for the establishment of a Department of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KIRBY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3139) for the purchase of land adjoining Fort Bliss, Tex., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 506) thereon.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6025) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 507) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and by unanimous consent the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 4188) granting a pension to Earle H. Philbrick (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 4189) for the relief of the Gadsden Contracting Co. (with accompanying claims); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 4190) to acquire a site for a public building at Parsons, W. Va.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 4191) granting a pension to James Wiley; to the Committee on Pensions.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7015) providing that the Panama Canal rules shall govern in the measurement of vessels for imposing tolls, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted an amendment proposing that one half of certain sums be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia in full for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEYES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $1,500,000 to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to enter into a contract or contracts for the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital in the District of Columbia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,127.85 to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay to Edith B. Macon, daughter and sole heir of the estate of David W. and Elizabeth L. W. Bailey, deceased, being in full settlement of the award to the estate of Davis W. Bailey against the District of Columbia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. WARREN. As we are about to take up the calendar, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Smoot
Comer	Kendrick	New	Spencer
Culberson	Kenyon	Nugent	Sterling
Cummins	Keyes	Page	Sutherland
Curtis	Kirby	Phipps	Thomas
Fernald	Lenroot	Pomerene	Townsend
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Ransdell	Trammell
Gronna	McCormick	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Hale	McCumber	Sherman	Warren
Harris	McKellar	Simmons	Watson
Henderson	McNary	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Alabama [Mr UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Members.

The names of the absent Senators were called, and Mr. GAY, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names.

Mr. CAPPER, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. EDGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. GERRY entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present, and the calendar under Rule VIII will be proceeded with.

Mr. WARREN. As we finished with Order of Business 362, Senate joint resolution 151, when the calendar was last considered, I ask that we may begin with Order of Business 363, House bill 8314.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the calendar, beginning with Calendar No. 363, House bill 8314. Is there obpection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AERONAUTIC ENGINEERING.

The bill (H. R. 8314) to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to detail such officers of the Army as he may select, not exceeding 25 at any one time, to attend and pursue courses of aeronautic engineering or associate study at such schools, colleges, and universities as he may select.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is authorized to pay tuition for the officers so detailed and to provide them with necessary textbooks and technical supplies from any moneys available for the Air Service of the Army not otherwise specifically appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to know just what change the bill makes in the existing arrangement which provides for the teaching of these men in the War Department. Evidently from the reading of the amendment of the committee the training of these officers in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor will be outside of the War Department. I wish to know if there is any good reason why that should be done?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to detail officers of the Army as he may select them, not to exceed in the aggregate 25 officers at any one time, to attend aeronautical engineering courses at schools, colleges, and universities in the country.

The Senator from Utah, of course, will understand that the Army educational institutions, commencing at West Point and going to the service schools, do not and can not at present provide courses in aeronautical engineering to any extent like institutions such as the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or perhaps the scientific school at Cornell University and schools of that character which exist in State and private universities over the country.

It is hoped by permitting not to exceed 25 officers of the Army to attend these courses the Army will be able to keep pace with the enormous stride being made in aeronautical engineering. The committee felt that an Army officer who has been detailed to the Air Service and who ought to know about aeronautic engineering, designing machinery and motors, should have an opportunity to keep pace with the advances that are being made.

The Senator will notice that the expenses are kept down as much as possible; indeed, the Secretary of War is authorized only "to pay tuition for the officers so detailed and to provide them with necessary textbooks." This is a measure which I think will tend to the better education of the service.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator where is the training of officers of the Army in aeronautical engineering carried on to-day upon the part of the Government? How many places are there in the United States under the direct charge of the Government where this work is being conducted?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think it can be said that there is any institution under the direct charge of the Government that can carry on this work as it is carried on by some of the private institutions. I do not know of any institution in the Army or any place under the jurisdiction of the Army where courses of this kind can be given; in other words, the Army has not set up a school for aeronautical engineering or a school for flying except for training the fliers in the actual art of flying, but in the technical sense, I think, the Army has no such school.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering."

ARMY POST SCHOOLS AND LIBRARIES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 128) relating to schools and libraries at Army posts was announced as next in order.

The joint resolution was read.

Mr. GRONNA. Let that resolution go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

DISPOSAL OF SURPLUS DENTAL OUTFITS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 222) authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to sell at public or private sale, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, all dental outfits in excess of the needs of the Government, preferentially to persons who served in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, or the American Red Cross of the United States during the recent war and who are at the time of such sale licensed to practice dentistry; but not more than one set of dental supplies shall be sold at private sale to any one person.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant revocable licenses for the removal of sand from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation for industrial purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "purposes," to insert "at such reasonable prices as may be fixed by the Secretary of War," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant revocable licenses for the removal of sand from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, Utah, to persons and corporations within said State, to be used for industrial and manufacturing purposes, at such reasonable prices as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRATER LAKE NATIONAL PARK, OREG.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2797) to add certain lands to the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the south, west, and north boundary lines of the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., are hereby changed as follows: Beginning at the southwest corner of Crater Lake National Park; thence west on the continuation of the present south boundary line, approximately three-quarters of a mile, to its intersection with the boundary line between Jackson and Klamath Counties; thence north along the said county line between Jackson and Klamath Counties and continuing north on the county line between Douglas and Klamath Counties to its intersection with the hydrographic divide on Bear Butte, elevation 7,027 feet, between Rough and Bear Creeks; thence northerly along the said hydrographic divide, now between Dog Prairie and Watson Creeks and Bear Creek, passing over United States Geological Survey bench mark, 6,057 feet, to its intersection with the continuation west of the surveyed section line, township 27 south, range 6 east, 2 miles north of the sixth standard parallel south; thence east along the continuation of said section line and along said section line through township 27 south, range 6 east, between sections 19 and 30, 20 and 29, 21 and 28, 22 and 27, 23 and 26, and 24 and 25, and continuing east along the section line between sections 20 and 29, township 27 south, range 6½ east, to its intersection with the county line between Douglas and Klamath Counties, which is on the hydrographic divide between the headwaters of Thirsty and Thielsen Creeks and Marsh Creek; thence south along the said county line to Howlock Mountain, elevation 8,351 feet; thence east along the main hydrographic divide between Marsh and Sink Creeks to its intersection with the continuation north of the east boundary line of Crater Lake National Park; thence south along the continuation of the said east boundary line of Crater Lake National Park to the present northeast corner of the Crater Lake National Park; and all of those lands lying between the boundary lines of the Crater Lake National Park are hereby added to and made a part of the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of May 22, 1902, entitled "An act reserving from the public lands in the State of Oregon as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States and for the protection and preservation of the game, fish, timber, and all other natural objects therein, a tract of land therein described, etc."; the act of August 21, 1916, entitled "An act to accept the cession by the State of Oregon of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced in the Crater Lake National Park, and for other purposes"; and the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish the National Park Service, and for other purposes"; and all acts supplementary to and amendatory of said acts are made applicable to and extended over the lands hereby added to the park.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice in the report of the Acting Secretary of the Interior that certain amendments have been suggested to the pending bill, and I can not see that there is any amendment embodied in the bill as reported to the Senate. I wonder whether the bill as reported includes the amendments suggested in the letter of November 29, 1919, of the Acting Secretary of the Interior. If the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who reported the bill, will examine the letter referred to he will see that certain amendments are therein recommended to the bill, the first being on page 1, line 3, after the word "east," to add the word "west," and the second, on page 3, line 5, after the word "between," to insert the words "the boundary line above described and." I have not had time to examine the bill in order to ascertain whether or not the bill has been changed to correspond to those suggestions. If they have not been embodied in the bill, I will say to the Senator that the description contained in the bill would be incorrect.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, when the Committee on Public Lands authorized a favorable report, the report was prepared by the clerk of the committee, and I assume that the amendments have been incorporated in the bill. If not, I ask that they may be made at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to ask that the bill go over temporarily?

Mr. MCNARY. I should prefer that that be not done.

Mr. SMOOT. I say "temporarily," and then the Senator can ascertain whether the amendments have been embodied in the bill. If they are in the bill, then we can return to the bill and pass it; but I am sure the Senator does not wish the bill to pass if the description is wrong.

Mr. MCNARY. That is true; but that can be ascertained in just a moment without passing it over.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well, if the Senator desires that course and the fact can be ascertained without waiting too long. I merely made the suggestion in the interest of saving time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest to my colleague that he allow the bill to be passed over temporarily, so that it can be ascertained whether the amendments have been incorporated in the bill.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well. I will ask that the bill be passed over temporarily for the purpose of ascertaining if certain amendments have been embodied in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

SALE OF GRAIN.

The bill (S. 3844) to provide for discontinuing the purchase and sale of grain by the Government, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NELSON. I ask that that bill may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES AT LANGLEY FIELD, VA.

The bill (S. 3516) to authorize the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to furnish quarters at Langley Field, Va., to the civilian employees of the national advisory committee for aeronautics, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to furnish living quarters at Langley Field, Va., to the civilian employees of the national advisory committee for aeronautics, to supply them with heat, fuel, and light for such quarters at the actual cost thereof to the Government, and to extend to them the privilege of purchasing subsistence stores and commissarial supplies at cost plus 10 per cent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATHRYN WALKER.

The bill (S. 2371) for the relief of Katheryn Walker was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 4, after the word "to," to strike out "Katheryn" and insert "Kathryn"; in line 5, after the word "formerly," to strike out "Katheryn" and insert "Kathryn"; and, in line 7, after the word "meridian," to insert: "Provided, That the said Kathryn Walker pay the lawful price of the land within six months after the approval of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent to Kathryn Walker (formerly Kathryn McKnight) for the northeast quarter of section 12, township 29 south, of range 7 west, New Mexico meridian: Provided, That the said Kathryn Walker pay the lawful price of the land within six months after the approval of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Kathryn Walker."

LANDS WEST OF SALT LAKE MERIDIAN, UTAH.

The bill (H. R. 5213) for the relief of occupants and claimants of unsurveyed public land in township 8 north, range 2 west, of Salt Lake meridian, Utah, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on the survey of any areas of public land in sections 10, 15, 22, and 27, in township 8 north, range 2 west of the Salt Lake base and meridian, in the State of Utah, which may be found to have been erroneously omitted from the official survey, plat of which is now on file in the General Land Office, the Commissioner of the General Land Office be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause such areas to be surveyed and platted in such a manner as will segregate the several holdings of the bona fide occupants of such areas as shown by their occupation and improvements.

SEC. 2. That under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe all such bona fide occupants as shall have had adverse possession by themselves or their grantors for seven years prior to the approval of the plat of survey provided for herein shall have a preferred right at any time within six months after the approval of such plat of survey to purchase at the rate of $2.50 per acre the lands so occupied and improved in such parcels as the same are so held and possessed by each of them, not to exceed in any one case 160 acres.

SEC. 3. That in lieu of any portion of such areas which may be found to lie within the limits of a grant to any railroad company and to have been for the period of seven years mentioned in the preceding section in the possession of a bona fide occupant or occupants claiming otherwise than through such company, such railroad company shall be entitled to select other lands in accordance with the terms and restrictions of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1874: Provided, That the land described in one certain patent of the United States dated September 16, 1884, to the Central Pacific Railroad Co. as lot 5 of the northwest quarter of section 15 of the township and range aforesaid, containing 33.19 acres, shall not form the basis for any such lieu selection; but the survey hereinbefore provided for shall be so made as to identify said tract; and title to said tract is hereby confirmed in said railway company and its grantees.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS AND MARSHALS.

The bill (S. 3430) fixing the salaries of certain United States attorneys and United States marshals was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 3, line 18, after the name "Maryland," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$6,000," so as to read:

For the district of the State of Maryland, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 21, after the name "Michigan," to strike out "$4,500" and insert "$5,000," so as to read:

For the eastern district of the State of Michigan, $5,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I inquire what calendar number we are now considering?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Calendar No. 376.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will have to ask that that bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CONFINEMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

The bill (S. 3875) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and they are, extended so as to apply, in the discretion of the trial judge, to the cases of women or girls over the age of 16, as follows: Whenever a woman or girl shall be convicted of lewdness, prostitution, or similar offenses, under circumstances rendering such offense punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States, such woman or girl may be confined, during the term of sentence, in some home of refuge to be designated by the Attorney General, in the manner provided in the case of juvenile offenders, by said sections 5549 and 5550, when, in the opinion of the presiding judge, that course seems justified by the circumstances of the case and the intelligence and previous character of the offender: Provided, however, That this act shall not apply to the case of any woman who has previously been twice convicted of similar offenses in the courts of the United States, or who, at the time of her arrest, was conducting or managing a house of prostitution.

SEC. 2. This shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that on page 2, line 10, the word "act" be inserted. It has evidently been omitted through a typographical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I will ask the author of the bill what the object of the bill is.

Mr. NELSON. I can briefly state the object of the bill. I may say, in the first instance, that it is a bill recommended by the district judge in Texas.

The object of the bill is that in cases where women have been convicted of improper offenses, if they are not what you might call professional women, but have gotten into it accidentally, the United States judge may suspend sentence. That, in brief, is the object of the bill. If the Senators will read the bill—it is a very short bill—they can see the object of it. It is to overcome a decision of the Supreme Court, rendered, I think, about a year ago, which held, contrary to the practice that had prevailed before that time, that no Federal judge had a right to suspend a sentence of conviction. It had been the custom, in the case of minor offenses, or offenses that were not of a serious character, or where there was likely to be a reform in the near future, for the Federal judge to impose a sentence and then, in his discretion, suspend the sentence practically during good behavior. The Supreme Court of the United States held that that was unwarranted and unconstitutional; that the judges had no such right. The object of this bill is to allow suspension of sentences to occur in certain cases of the women referred to in the bill. I will read it. The provision is very brief:

That the provisions of sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and they are, extended so as to apply, in the discretion of the trial judge, to the cases of women or girls over the age of 16, as follows: Whenever a woman or girl shall be convicted of lewdness, prostitution, or similar offenses, under circumstances rendering such offense punishable by imprisonment under the laws of the United States, such woman or girl may be confined, during the term of sentence, in some home of refuge to be designated by the Attorney General—

And so forth. There is a long letter here from the district judge down in Texas. These are cases that occur on the border, and they relate to a large extent to poor Mexican women who come over the border.

Unless there are some questions to be asked, I shall not take up the time of the Senate in further discussion of the bill. As I said, the district judge sent his recommendation up to the Attorney General, and the Attorney General forwarded the letter with his indorsement and recommendation to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the committee were unanimous in favor of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

SALARIES OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS AND MARSHALS.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, a little while ago Senate bill 3430, which relates to the increase of salaries of certain United States attorneys and United States marshals, was reached on the calendar.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, on the objection of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that bill went over.

Mr. POMERENE. I so understood; but I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee a question for information with regard to it.

I notice, for instance, that in the State of Ohio, where we have 5,000,000 people, these salaries have been increased from $4,500 to $5,000. In the State of Oklahoma in one district the salary is $6,500 and in another $5,000. In the State of Texas, with four districts, there is one salary of $4,500, two of $5,500, and one at $6,000. Now, why these larger increases——

Mr. NELSON. I will explain the situation briefly to the Senator from Ohio.

We have received from time to time certain bills, which have been sent to the Judiciary Committee, to increase the salary of a United States attorney or a United States marshal somewhere. We got so many of those bills that the committee finally considered that we had better revise the whole list and make such changes as were necessary. The committee then referred the question to the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice prepared a lengthy report, which has been printed, giving the amount of business in each judicial district throughout the entire country and the salaries paid to the attorneys and the marshals and recommending a slight increase. In this bill, with the exception of one or two cases—I do not at this moment recall them, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who had direct charge of the bill, is not in his seat—except in one or two cases we followed the recommendation of the Department of Justice. We gave increases to the extent and in all cases where the Department of Justice recommended them; and inasmuch as the bill has gone over I would suggest to the Senator that he get a copy of the report that was sent in to us, which has been printed, and he can see the basis on which the bill is framed. The committee felt that it was better to have a general bill than to take up from time to time isolated cases, where it might happen, if we passed the bills, that they were discriminatory as to other districts. We thought it was fairer to make an increase all around where it was necessary; and the bill is based not upon the population of the States at all but upon the amount of business done in the respective districts.

If the Senator will examine the report, he will find the whole matter set out. Inasmuch as the bill has gone over, however, I will say nothing more about it at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, my attention was attracted to the difference in the allowances to these several districts. I know that the business in the State of Ohio has grown tremendously; and while they may have in one State a certain class of cases, in another State they have a certain other kind of litigation, and because of our enormous industrial life in Ohio as well as because of the prosecutions under the liquor and antivice laws, the business of the officers there has enormously increased. I could not quite understand, therefore, why the salaries should only be increased to $5,000 in Ohio and in Oklahoma to $6,000 and in some of these other districts to $6,500.

Mr. NELSON. I might say, in reference to Oklahoma, that they have had an enormous amount of business growing out of the distribution of lands among the Five Civilized Tribes. The litigation in that direction has been enormous and unusual.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

SHORTAGE OF CARS.

The resolution (S. Res. 302) instructing the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to investigate the alleged lack of supply and failure to supply an adequate number of stock cars and cars for transporting grain and other farm products was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, at the time this resolution was introduced there was a demand from all parts of the country for an investigation with reference to the car shortage. At that time the railroads were in the hands of the Federal Government. Of course, a change has now been made, and I do not know that it would serve any good purpose to have this investigation made at this time. Therefore I ask that the resolution may be indefinitely postponed. As it was objected to at that time, we were unable to have it passed and have the investigation made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of Senate resolution 302.

The resolution was indefinitely postponed.

LANDS IN TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

The bill (S. 3461) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE DYE INDUSTRY.

The bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THOMAS SIMMONS.

The bill (S. 302) for the relief of Thomas Simmons was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 10, after the word "regiment," to insert "Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, Thomas Simmons, who was a private in Company F, One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other allowances shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as there will be a meeting of the Committee on Pensions to-morrow to consider a general pension bill relating to the veterans of the Civil War, which will probably be reported out, I ask at this time that all the pension bills upon the calendar may be passed over as they are reached to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

LAND IN HURON COUNTY, MICH.

The bill (H. R. 202) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for a certain described tract of land for public park purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for the following tract of land, to wit: Lots 1 and 2, section 17, and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 20, township 18 north, range 11 east, in Michigan, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other mineral deposits found in the land, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: And provided further, That this grant shall be subject to all prior, valid existing rights under the land laws of the United States, and that if the grantee shall fail to use the land for public-park purposes or shall devote the same to other uses the title thereto shall revert to the United States: And provided further, That said grantee shall, within two years from the approval of this act, file its application and make entry and use of the land under this act, for the purposes herein specified, and the grant herein is made upon the express condition that, within 30 days of the receipt of any request therefor from the Secretary of the Interior, the county clerk shall submit to the said Secretary of the Interior a report as to the use made of the land herein granted the county during the preceding period named in such request, showing compliance with the terms and conditions stated in this act, and that in the event of his failure to so report, or in the event of a showing in such report to the Secretary of the Interior that the terms of the grant have not been complied with, the grant shall be held to be forfeited, and the Attorney General of the United States shall institute suit in the proper court for the recovery of said lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY POST SCHOOLS AND LIBRARIES.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a few moments ago I objected to the consideration of Calendar No. 364, Senate joint resolution 128, relating to schools and libraries at Army posts. I have since conferred with the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and I have also read the report. I was under the impression that it would involve considerable expense, but I find that it is only an authorization to the War Department to purchase newspapers for camps outside of military posts and schools. I therefore withdraw my objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before I agree to the consideration of the joint resolution I want to have it distinctly understood that it will not authorize the War Department to print newspapers or periodicals or documents of any kind. The joint resolution provides—but also those schools and libraries that may be established at such other stations or camps as the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, designate, and said provision shall be construed to authorize the furnishing of newspapers and periodicals to troops at such other stations or camps.

If the word "furnishing" means that they are going to publish, as they have in the past in many cases, then I shall seriously object to the passage of the joint resolution. If it is for the mere purpose of purchasing the newspapers and periodicals, that is a different proposition, and I have no objection to it.

The reason I speak at this time, Mr. President, is because the Joint Committee on Printing has stopped a large number of the publications at the Army posts, and there has been every endeavor on the part of the War Department to evade the order. They have been issuing some of the publications by multigraphing, and in one case they have lithographed the periodical, claiming that the law did not prevent the multigraphing or lithographing, and therefore that they were at perfect liberty to go on publishing them. The other day the Senate agreed to an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill which will prevent that practice in the future.

But the committee had two objects in view: One was to conserve paper and the other was to conserve the money of the United States; and particularly where there were two or three periodicals published at one post we thought it was not only a wicked waste of money but of paper. Instead of complying with the order of the committee, the department began to issue the same publications by using the multigraph and by issuing them in a lithographed form, costing a great deal more than if they had been printed and taking more paper.

So, Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that if this joint resolution is passed it will not authorize the War Department to print, lithograph, mimeograph, or multigraph any document or newspaper for the purposes provided for in the joint resolution; and if it is not so understood, I want to have the joint resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the call of the calendar.

SCHOOL LANDS IN FREMONT COUNTY, WYO.

The bill (H. R. 6136) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to school district No. 21, of Fremont County, Wyo., was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell to school district No. 21, of Fremont County, Wyo., the west half, southwest quarter, southwest quarter, southeast quarter, section four, township one south, range one west of the Wind River meridian, containing 1¼ acres, the same being a part of the Shoshone Agency reserve on the Shoshone or Wind River Indian Reservation.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL LAND IN LAPWAI, IDAHO.

The bill (H. R. 6772) authorizing and directing the transfer approximately of 10 acres of land to rural high-school district No. 1, Lapwai, Idaho, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to rural high-school district No. 1, Lapwai, Nez Perce County, Idaho, the following-described land:

Beginning at a point which is 30 feet west, 113.6 feet south, and 696 feet south, 86° 6′ west of the northeast corner of lot 27, section 2, township 35 north, range 4, West Boise meridian, which is the northwest corner of the present Lapwai School grounds; thence south 86° 6′, west 483 feet; then south 40° 20′, east 1,174 feet; thence north 43° 54′, east 598 feet; thence north 264 feet to southeast corner present school grounds; thence south 86° 6′, west 696 feet to southwest corner present school grounds; thence north 300 feet to place of beginning, excepting eighty-nine one-thousandths acre as shown on plat "Reserved cemetery," containing 10.747 acres: Provided, however, That there is hereby reserved from said grant any buildings that may be on the property, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause such buildings to be removed at the expense of the said rural high-school district No. 1, of Nez Perce County, Idaho: Provided further, That the said rural high-school district shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior for the credit of the Nez Perce Tribe of Indians in full compensation in the amount of $1.25 per acre: Provided further, That in the event the said rural high-school district No. 1, Nez Perce County, Idaho, shall cease to use the lands herein granted for the purpose of experimental agricultural demonstrations, then, and in that event, the lands shall revert to the United States for the use and benefit of the Nez Perce Indians.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL LIVE-STOCK COMMISSION.

The bill (S. 3944) to create a Federal live-stock commission was announced as next in order.

Mr. FERNALD. I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

SHIPS ACQUIRED FROM GERMANY.

The bill (S. 3928) relating to the ships acquired from Germany, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 6, to insert the words "establishing a definite shipping policy"; and on page 1, line 9, after the word "delay," to insert the words "in such manner as will in its judgment make them most serviceable for profitable operation or sale."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MILWAUKEE BRIDGE CO.

The bill (S. 2921) for the relief of the Milwaukee Bridge Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Milwaukee Bridge Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., a corporation of the State of Wisconsin, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $640, the same being the amount of liquidated damages deducted from the contract price for failure to complete within the stipulated time the work of constructing and erecting lock gates at Hurricane Shoals, Trinity River, Tex., under contract dated December 22, 1913, between the Milwaukee Bridge Co. and the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RUDOLPH H. VON EZDORF.

The bill (S. 3205) for the relief of the widow of Rudolph H. von Ezdorf, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Whereas Rudolph H. von Ezdorf, late surgeon and a commissioned officer in the United States Public Health Service, contracted myocarditis as a sequel to an attack of yellow fever, incurred in line of duty while an assistant surgeon engaged in the special work of suppressing an epidemic of yellow fever in the State of Mississippi during the year 1898; and

Whereas said myocarditis so contracted was the approximate cause of the death of the said Rudolph H. von Ezdorf while he was actually engaged in the special work of investigating the suppression and control of malarial fever in the county of Lincoln, N. C., on September 7, 1916: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the widow of Rudolph H. von Ezdorf, deceased, the sum of $4,500, being the amount of salary and allowances for two years.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule has always been to pay one year's salary on the death of employees in the Government service, and I think that that rule has been strictly adhered to with this exception. It provides for salary and allowances for two years. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] reported the bill, and I ask him why that rule should be set aside in this case?

Mr. GRONNA. As the Senator from Utah knows, a similar bill was considered by the Senate at the last session of Congress, and I think it passed the Senate once or twice, carrying the amount which the committee recommended. The bill provided originally for an allowance of $9,000, and the committee reduced it to $4,500. The committee were unanimous in making this allowance.

I know that the Senator from Utah is correct in stating that as a rule the Committee on Claims allows one year's salary. There are, however, a few exceptions, and I will say to the Senator from Utah I believe I am correct in stating that those exceptions have applied to the cases where Army officers have died. This is a very meritorious case and the bill ought to pass.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that may be the case, but I wanted to know the reason why. It does not seem to me that there is very much difference between the case of the widow of an Army officer and the widow of a civilian. I think that losing a husband is just as bad in one case as in the other; in fact, I think it is a little worse in the case of the widow of the civilian. But as this is a unanimous report, and I recognize the fact that there ought to be some compensation granted, I will not object.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator from Utah that the amount provided in the bill is one year's salary of the man, according to the information before the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill does not say so.

Mr. SPENCER. But it is as a matter of fact. The bill originally called for $9,000. It was reduced to $4,500, which was the salary of the man. There is provision for only one year's salary. That statement is made in the report.

Mr. SMOOT. If that is the case, then we ought to amend the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the bill be amended to read "salary and allowances for one year," instead of "two years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 5, strike out the words "two years" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

Mr. SMOOT. That conforms to the rule of the Senate.

Mr. SPENCER. The original amount was for two years' salary. The amount provided for in the bill is one year's salary. So there is no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

CRATER LAKE NATIONAL PARK, OREG.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, awhile ago Calendar No. 367, the bill (S. 2797) to add certain lands to the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., was temporarily passed over. I ask that the Senate may revert to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that will be done.

The bill (S. 2797) to add certain lands to the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McNARY. The Secretary of the Interior has suggested amendments, which I have sent to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendments will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "west," insert the word "east"; and on page 3, line 5, after the word "between," insert the words "the boundary lines above described and," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the south, west, east, and north boundary lines of the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., are hereby changed as follows:

Beginning at the southwest corner of Crater Lake National Park; thence west on the continuation of the present south boundary line, approximately three-quarters of a mile, to its intersection with the boundary line between Jackson and Klamath Counties; thence north along the said county line between Jackson and Klamath Counties and continuing north on the county line between Douglas and Klamath Counties to its intersection with the hydrographic divide on Bear Butte, elevation 7,027 feet, between Rough and Bear Creeks; thence northerly along the said hydrographic divide, now between Dog Prairie and Watson Creeks and Bear Creek, passing over United States Geological Survey bench mark, 6,057 feet, to its intersection with the continuation west of the surveyed section line, township 27 south, range 6 east, 2 miles north of the sixth standard parallel south; thence east along the continuation of said section line and along said section line through township 27 south, range 6 east, between sections 19 and 30, 20 and 29, 21 and 28, 22 and 27, 23 and 26, and 24 and 25, and continuing east along the section line between sections 20 and 29, township 27 south, range 6½ east, to its intersection with the county line between Douglas and Klamath Counties, which is on the hydrographic divide between the headwaters of Thirsty and Thielsen Creeks and Marsh Creek; thence south along the said county line to Howlock Mountain, elevation 8,351 feet; thence east along the main hydrographic divide between Marsh and Sink Creeks to its intersection with the continuation north of the east boundary line of Crater Lake National Park; thence south along the continuation of the said east boundary line of Crater Lake National Park to the present northeast corner of the Crater Lake National Park; and all of those lands lying between the boundary lines above described, and the boundary lines of the Crater Lake National Park are hereby added to and made a part of the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act of May 22, 1902, entitled "An act reserving from the public lands in the State of Oregon as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States and for the protection and preservation of the game, fish, timber, and all other natural objects therein, a tract of land therein described, etc."; the act of August 21, 1916, entitled "An act to accept the cession by the State of Oregon of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced in the Crater Lake National Park, and for other purposes"; and the act of August 25, 1916, entitled "An act to establish the National Park Service, and for other purposes"; and all acts supplementary to and amendatory of said acts are made applicable to and extended over the lands hereby added to the park.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States whether for homestead, mineral, right of way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARTHUR WENDLE ENGLERT.

The bill (H. R. 795) for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$749.50," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Arthur Wendle Englert, late of Albion, Mendocino County, Calif., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $749.50, being the value of work done and improvements made by him in good faith during the year 1911 on lands then shown by the records of the San Francisco land office to be unpatented, and for which lands patent was issued to said Englert in accordance with law, but which patent was a nullity, said lands having, a long time previously, been patented by the United States to other persons.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wanted to find out whether there is a report from the Department of the Interior, as this is entirely a land matter. I see that the Claims Committee asked the Secretary of the Interior for a report upon the bill, and while I have not had time to examine the report I take it for granted that the report will show that that amount of money was expended upon the land. I call attention to the fact that there are other similar claims, I understand, before the Committee on Claims. I do not know whether they intend to act upon them or not.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

W. L. ROSE.

The bill (H. R. 1275) for the relief of W. L. Rose was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. L. Rose, of Sacramento, Calif., late of the United States Navy, the sum of $66.12 to indemnify him for clothing and property lost on the United States ship Yosemite, November 13, 1900.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if he recalls whether this particular claim was ever submitted to the Appropriations Committee and went into an appropriation bill? I will say to the chairman of the Committee on Claims that such claims are generally reported from the Claims Committee and appropriated through deficiency bills. I want to know whether the chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows about this particular bill.

Mr. LODGE. It surely will not be paid the second time if it has once been paid.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether we have paid it or not.

Mr. WARREN. These claims may come in appropriation bills at times, but almost invariably they go out in conference, objection being made by the conferees of another place on the ground that they ought to go to the Committee on Claims. We have certified up nearly every year to the military branches claims which on their face show that they should be paid, but they are claims nevertheless. Many of these are asked in order to close the account of some officer, and they are sent up as though they were to go in deficiency bills, when as a matter of fact they should be certified up and go in a body to the Committee on Claims.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

E. T. THING AND S. A. THING.

The bill (H. R. 1853) to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing for losses and damages sustained by them by the negligent dipping of their cattle by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $698.40, to reimburse E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing, of the county of Imperial, State of California, for losses and damages sustained by them through the negligence of one of the veterinary inspectors employed by the Bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture, in dipping cattle belonging to said E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing, in Imperial County, Calif., on or about the 8th of July, 1915, said sum to be paid to said E. T. Thing and S. A. Thing in full for all losses and damages so sustained by them.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask what was the character of the negligence of this representative of the Government?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to the provisions of this bill. The Department of Agriculture in dipping and treating cattle used a solution which was too strong, and of course it killed the cattle. The reports in reference to the matter have been printed, but they are rather too lengthy to read. The committee, however, is unanimous in its report that the claim ought to be allowed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is the Department of Agriculture keeping this agent in its employ to continue this work?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not know whether it is or not. Of course, it was an experiment, I will say to the Senator. There are a great many of these dips which have been experiments, and this is not the first time that such a thing has happened.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did the owner of the cattle understand that this was simply an experiment?

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, it was an experiment so far as this man's cattle were concerned.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not think it was an experiment. I think it occurred in this way: Certain tracts of country are quarantined because of scabies or some other similar disease, and cattle owners inside of the confines of the quarantined area are required to dip their cattle. If there is an owner who is absent and nobody is authorized to act for him, or an owner who is a little contrary and does not propose to dip his cattle, oftentimes the Government or State officials take charge and dip the cattle, and accordingly collect the amounts for so doing. Or this may have been a case of some importation, where dipping became necessary.

In most localities, however, they have committees acting under State authority to perform this work instead of the Government being compelled to carry out its own orders.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming misunderstood what I said. I said that it was an experiment with the solution which was being used in this particular case. The solution was so strong that instead of eradicating the ticks or whatever the cattle might be infected with, it killed the cattle. So it was an experiment as to that solution. Of course, the agent was at fault, and the Federal Government is responsible for the resulting damages.

I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that the dipping of cattle is not an experiment, but it was an experiment so far as the solution which was used in this particular case was concerned.

Mr. WARREN. And if the department was at fault, then the United States should pay for it. Its agent was somewhat incompetent.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us see what Mr. Francis G. Coffey says about this. His letter reads:

There is no act of Congress authorizing the payment of claims of the character of the one presented by Mr. Thing. The claim is unliquidated and does not grow out of any contract between the claimant and the Government. The cattle were dipped by Mr. Thing to meet a requirement of the Government necessary to entitle him to import them.

In other words, Mr. Thing did the dipping, and the Government of the United States had nothing whatever to do with it; but the cattle had to be dipped before they could be imported in order to comply with the law.

Mr. WARREN. The Government, however, was represented there.

Mr. SMOOT. The letter continues:

If, as alleged by him, the cattle were dipped under the supervision of a United States officer or employee in a solution prepared under his direction and they were injured because of its improper preparation or the failure of the officer to test it, the most that can be said is that the injury occurred through the negligence of the Government employee and for such an injury the Government can not be held responsible.

In my opinion, the payment of the claim is not authorized, and Mr. Thing should be advised accordingly.

Therefore I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Utah from what he is reading?

Mr. SMOOT. I am reading from a letter which is signed by Mr. Francis G. Coffey, solicitor of the Department of Agriculture, office of the solicitor, dated Washington, October 15, 1915.

Mr. SPENCER. On May 23, 1918, the Secretary of Agriculture wrote to the committee that "the department believes that the object of the bill is meritorious."

Mr. SMOOT. I have read from the letter of the solicitor of the department, who had the whole matter in charge; and I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, the Senator from Utah has the right to object to the consideration of the bill, but I want the RECORD to show that it is conceded by the Department of Agriculture that the agent of the department was at fault; that the treatment of these cattle was under the supervision of an official of the Government, who used this solution, as the result of which the Messrs. Thing either lost their cattle or the cattle were injured; and that the claim is a just one and ought to be paid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the bill will be passed over.

E. WILLARD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6291) for the relief of E. Willard. It proposes to pay E. Willard, of Willard, Wash., $60 to compensate him for damages and losses sustained by reason of the negligence of employees of the United States Forest Service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARA KANE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6413) granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent foster parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the navy yard, League Island, Philadelphia, Pa., March 5, 1915, William A. Yenser being the adopted son of the said Clara Kane.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT C. BURGESS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6773) for the relief of Albert C. Burgess. It proposes to pay $1,200 to Albert C. Burgess for the loss of his eye, sustained while performing his duties as keeper at the National Zoological Park.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEAVENWORTH BRIDGE CO.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2934) for the relief of the Leavenworth Bridge Co., of Leavenworth, Kans. It proposes to pay to the Leavenworth Bridge Co., of the city of Leavenworth, State of Kansas, $30,843.45, in settlement of their claim on account of the extra expense in the building of the bridge across the Republican River at Fort Riley, Kans., such extra expense being the increased cost of labor due to direct Government competition in the local labor market and overhead costs during the period subsequent to the original completion date, which extra was required because such labor as was available was incompetent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have some Senator explain this bill and why the Government of the United States is asked to pay $30,843.45 in this case. I make a request for an explanation of the bill because of the fact that there is a general law which takes care of contractors under the Government, and I wish the Senator who introduced the bill to explain why this particular claim does not fall within the jurisdiction of that law.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the contract involved in this bill had been made a little later the general law to which the Senator from Utah refers would have applied, and, I believe, it does apply, anyway, but the War Department, when the claim was presented, after having considered it for some time, had a doubt about it. The original claim was for the sum of forty-odd thousand dollars actual loss, but after it was submitted to the department they went over the case item by item, allowed the amount carried by the bill, and recommended its payment. After consultation with the departmental officers about it, I introduced the pending bill, calling for the payment of precisely the amount which they found the company should have.

The contract was taken for $45,000. The contractors were employing men and paying them from $3.50 to $4 per day. When we entered the war, however, Camp Funston was established and the Government took the men away from the contractors and paid them $8 or $9 a day. The contractors were then compelled to increase the wages of the men who had agreed to work for them for a smaller sum, in order to meet the wages which were paid by the War Department at Camp Funston.

They were compelled to buy additional material and pay a higher price for it. The itemized statement furnished to the War Department showed a total loss of $45,000, but, after carefully investigating the case, the War Department only recommended that there be paid the amount proposed to be appropriated by the bill. If that amount is paid the company will still lose about $15,000, and, if the claim is not allowed, and allowed very soon, some of the contractors or subcontractors who did work will go into bankruptcy. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Claims, from which this bill comes, whether it is the policy of the committee in all such cases to make good the losses of contractors on account of extraordinary labor conditions during the war? What is the policy of the committee? Will they treat with equal consideration all other contractors who have lost money by making estimates which necessarily were insufficient on account of the rise in the cost of labor during the war period?

Mr. CURTIS. Let me state to the Senator before the chairman of the Committee on Claims answers his question that in other instances the conditions would probably not be like the conditions in this particular case. The bridge was built upon the property of the Government at Fort Riley. Camp Funston was established at the east end of the military reservation and the bridge was built at the west end. In building the camp employees engaged to do the work on the bridge were deliberately taken away from the contractor by being offered higher wages, and likewise the material which the bridge construction company had to use cost it more money.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask if during this period the contractors asked for relief from such practices?

Mr. CURTIS. They did; they presented their complaint to the department, but the department said they needed the men to build the encampment and for the contractors to proceed with the building of the bridge and that the extra cost involved would be made good to them. The claims were presented to the department in the regular way and on the regular forms provided, and the officers of the department have held that there was due the contractors the amount stated in the bill. It appeared for a time that the claim would be paid under the existing law, but some officer raised a technical objection to that. The department then stated they would prefer to have the contractors come to Congress for relief.

Instead of asking for the full amount of loss, when I introduced the bill I merely asked for the amount that was found due by the officers of the department. I did not include the additional $15,000 claimed on account of loss incurred, but covered simply the items that were approved by the department.

Mr. PHELAN. The department itself has been adjusting such losses in most cases.

Mr. CURTIS. I think that is true, but only in the case of contracts made later than the Leavenworth Bridge Co. contract was entered into. That contract was made with the Government a short time before we entered the war, but the work was not commenced until after the war began.

Mr. PHELAN. Doubtless this case, as explained by the Senator, is meritorious, but is it the policy of the Committee on Claims, or is it the policy of the Senate to be established by this precedent, to allow contractors compensation for work done under such circumstances, where the cost of labor and material has gone up after the awarding of the contract?

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, so far as I am able personally to explain to the Senator from California, I should say that the general policy that influenced the committee was in no case to allow for a loss which the contractor might have suffered, except where the loss was occasioned either directly by the act of the Government or was occasioned under such circumstances as made the Government responsible, and where, in addition to one of those two conditions, the department of the Government under which the work was done, after examining the facts, recommended that there was such a loss as the Government ought, in good conscience, to compensate for. Where those three conditions combine in a case the committee generally looks with favor upon it; but, as the Senator from California puts the question, certainly a contractor who suffers a loss under his contract instead of a profit is not entitled to compensation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if this amount is to be paid, it seems to me we ought to strike out all after the word "market" in line 11, down to and including line 3 on page 2, so that there will be no question about the basis upon which the claim is paid, namely, for "extra expense being the increased cost of labor due to direct Government competition in the local labor market." I think the bill should stop there.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the remainder of the bill being stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that would be preferable to inserting the clause:

and overhead costs during the period subsequent to the original completion date, which extra was required because such labor as was available was incompetent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, after the word "market," it is proposed to strike out:

and overhead costs during the period subsequent to the original completion date, which extra was required because such labor as was available was incompetent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

O. W. LINDSLEY.

The bill (H. R. 1791) for the relief of O. W. Lindsley was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to O. W. Lindsley the sum of $300 as compensation for the loss of poles owned by him which were destroyed by a slash-burning fire on August 19, 1915.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAVALRY HORSES.

The bill (S. 3609) to amend an act of Congress approved April 27, 1914, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 2, after the word "hereby," to strike out "repealed" and insert "amended so as to read as follows: 'That no part of this or any other appropriation shall be expended for defraying expenses of officers, enlisted men, or horses in attending or taking part in horse shows, fairs, exhibitions, and so forth, except by specific order of the Secretary of War and under such regulations as he may prescribe,'" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of Congress approved April 27, 1914 (38 Stat., pp. 363, 364), as provides as follows: "That no part of this or any other appropriation shall be expended for defraying expenses of officers, enlisted men, or horses in attending or taking part in horse shows or horse races; but nothing in this proviso shall be held to apply to the officers, enlisted men, and horses of any troop, battery, or company which shall, by order or permission of the Secretary of War, and within the limits of the United States, attend any horse show or any State, county, or municipal fair, celebration, or exhibition," be, and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "That no part of this or any other appropriation shall be expended for defraying expenses of officers, enlisted men, or horses in attending or taking part in horse shows, fairs, exhibitions, and so forth, except by specific order of the Secretary of War and under such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator whether there is any real reason why these officers should go to these horse races or fairs?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The amendment strikes out the words "horse races."

Mr. SMOOT. No; it says, "except by specific order of the Secretary of War and under such regulations as he may prescribe." Under that language he can still allow them to attend these places of amusement, so called.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not races. The act that this bill repeals contains the words "horse races," but the amendment proposed by the committee uses the expression "horse shows, fairs, exhibitions, and so forth."

Mr. SMOOT. But the words "and so forth" may cover not only horse races but everything else that a horse can do, and I think the amendment is even broader than the original act.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Secretary of War requested that this amendment be adopted, in order that it might be possible for Army horses to take part in exhibitions and fairs where it would be to the advantage of the service for them to do so. I have no personal interest in the measure. I was directed by the committee to report it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, I recognize that; but, Mr. President, the words "and so forth" in a law seem to me rather peculiar.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I suggest that the Senator move to strike them out.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I move to strike out the words "and so forth," in line 6, page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, in the committee amendment, it is proposed to strike out the words "and so forth," and after the word "fairs," on line 5, it is proposed to insert the word "and."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act of Congress approved April 27, 1914."

PORTRAIT OF ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The resolution (S. Res. 292) directing the Committee on the Library to have painted an oil portrait of Abraham Lincoln, to be placed in the Senate wing of the Capitol, was considered by the Senate and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to engage an artist of reputation and ability to paint an oil portrait of the late Abraham Lincoln, former President of the United States, and to place the same in the Senate wing of the Capitol Building, at a cost not to exceed $2,000, which sum shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SARAH SHELTON.

The bill (S. 3530) for the relief of Sarah Shelton was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on line 6, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,643.25," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Sarah Shelton, of Granite City, Ill., the sum of $1,643.25 for the death of her husband, William Shelton, who was killed by being run down by a launch under the charge and control of the deputy collector of customs at St. Louis, Mo., while said deputy collector was in the exercise and discharge of his duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPT. DAVID M'D. SHEARER.

The bill (S. 3725) authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the claim of Capt. David McD. Shearer for compensation for the adoption and use and acquisition by the United States Government of his patented inventions was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over, Mr. President.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Utah that I understand a similar bill passed the Senate a few days ago authorizing the Court of Claims to adjudicate the right of an officer to a patent. I will ask the Senator from Missouri if that is not true?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this bill relates to the claim of Capt. David McD. Shearer. No doubt he was in the United States Army. If he was in the United States Army, even though he was the original discoverer, under the law he has no right whatever to receive compensation from the Government of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; he was only in the Army as an officer after 1917, during the war with Germany. He developed his patent while he was working as a civilian engineer with the Mississippi River Commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, he was in the employ of the Government at the time, then.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The law says that an employee of the Government is entitled to compensation for the patent if he made the invention outside of working hours and not while he was in the employ of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask to have the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). There being objection, the bill will be passed over.

EMMA J. SPEAR.

The bill (H. R. 3211) for the relief of Emma J. Spear was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that Emma J. Spear, mother of Henry W. Spear, late of Troop M, Second Regiment United States Cavalry, shall be regarded as the duly designated beneficiary of the late Henry W. Spear under the act approved May 11, 1908, as amended by the act approved March 3, 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY CO., ETC.

The bill (S. 132) for the relief of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co., and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding, the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., in accordance with the decisions of said court in causes Nos. 28,272, 29,636, and 30,159, and the claims of the Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Railway Co., in accordance with the decision of said court in cause No. 29,875, which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the claim of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co., in accordance with the decision of said court in cause No. 24,409: Provided, That said court in rendering judgment shall enforce the provisions of section 3477, Revised Statutes of the United States, prohibiting the assignment of claims against the United States, and shall render judgment for said claimants only for the amounts in which they, and not any predecessors of theirs, were underpaid, it being the purpose of this act to waive only the statute of limitations and not any other legal defense the United States may have to said claims: Provided further, That the same right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States as exists in other cases in the general jurisdiction of said court is hereby granted.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like the Senator who reported this bill to tell us something about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the committee report describes the situation adequately, and perhaps the best way for me to explain it is to read a little from the report:

This bill authorizes the several railway companies mentioned therein to bring suit in the Court of Claims for certain underpayments by the Post Office Department for mail transportation, without regard to the statute of limitations, but does not waive any other of the legal rights of the United States in said court.

The reason why the statute of limitations was permitted to run is because it was not until the decision in the Alabama Great Southern case, which had to be carried to the United States Supreme Court, that it was made clear that the roads were entitled to payment at the full postal rate along such portion of the lines as had not been actually land aided, following which decision the roads brought suit, but which suits could not go further back than six years from date thereof.

Some of the railways brought suit to recover payment, because their suits had not been debarred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. WARREN. I do not see anything here that gives any idea of the amount of the claims. Has the Senator any information on that point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President; I have. The report states further:

According to the Post Office Department reports, the amounts properly due to these claimants are as follows.

It seems that the Post Office Department understands that the roads should receive these amounts:

Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co	$6,315.00
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co	40,034.76
Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis & Omaha Ry. Co	5,449.19
St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Ry. Co	912.02

The total amount would be $53,000, if the Court of Claims allows it. They must prove their case before the Court of Claims. This merely waives the statute of limitation and gives them an opportunity to sue as other railways sue and to claim the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case referred to in the report.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON COAL LANDS.

The bill (S. 1257) to amend an act approved June 22, 1910, entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 2, line 6, after the word "same," to insert the words "but no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," approved June 22, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That from and after the passage of this act unreserved public lands of the United States, exclusive of Alaska, which have been withdrawn or classified as coal lands, or are valuable for coal, shall be subject to appropriate entry, selection, or sale under any of the nonmineral public-land laws applicable to the particular lands desired if not containing coal, and to withdrawal under the act approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act; whenever such entry or withdrawal shall be made with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the coal in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same, but no desert entry made under the provisions of this act shall contain more than 160 acres: Provided, That those who have initiated nonmineral claims under the public-land laws in good faith prior to the passage of this act on lands withdrawn or classified as coal lands may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which said claims were initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act.

"SEC. 2. That any person, State, or corporation desiring to make entry or selection under any nonmineral public-land law of lands withdrawn or classified as coal lands, or which are valuable for coal, shall state in the application for entry or selection that the same is made in accordance with and subject to the provisions and reservations of this act, and the Secretary of the Interior, in withdrawing under the reclamation act lands of this character, shall state in the notice of withdrawal that such withdrawal is made subject to the provisions and reservations of this act.

"SEC. 3. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the entry or selection is made, and of this act, the entryman or selector shall be entitled to a patent or to a certification, as the law may require, to the land entered or selected, which patent or certificate shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal in the lands so patented or certified, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal-land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to acquire coal deposits or the right to mine and remove the coal under the laws of the United States shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands selected, entered, or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal thereon upon the consent of the surface entryman or owner, or upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal deposits in any such lands, or the right to mine or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the coal therefrom, and mine and remove the coal, upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That the owner under such limited patent shall have the right to mine coal for use upon the land for domestic purposes at any time prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held to deny or abridge the right to present and have prompt consideration of applications to locate, enter, or select, under the land laws of the United States, lands which have been classified as coal lands with a view of disproving such classification and securing a patent without reservation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE SEQUOIA NATIONAL PARK, CALIF.

The bill (S. 1391) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt National Park was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Since this bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands a question has arisen as to the boundary lines of the park, and there has been a dispute between the Forestry Service and certain interests of California. The report that was made, as given in the bill, is hardly correct. The whole question is under investigation at this time, and the report will be made to the committee in a very little while, with a hope that all parties interested may come to an agreement as to the actual quantity of lands involved. Therefore I ask that the bill may go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The bill will be passed over.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The bill (H. R. 10207) providing for service of process in causes removed from a State or other court to a United States court was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, in all cases removed from any State court to any United States court for trial in which any one or more of the defendants has not been served with process or in which the same has not been perfected prior to such removal, or in which the process served upon the defendant or defendants, or any of them, proves to be defective, such process may be completed by the United States court through its officers, or new process as to defendants upon whom process has not been completed may be issued out of such United States court, or service may be perfected in such court in the same manner as in cases which are originally filed in such United States court: Provided, Nothing in this act shall be construed to deprive any defendant upon whom process is so served after removal of his right to move to remand the cause to the State court, the same as if process had been served upon him prior to such removal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH W. SKILL.

The bill (S. 1457) for the relief of Joseph W. Skill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States receiving injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," are hereby extended to Joseph W. Skill, who was permanently disabled while employed by the Department of the Interior at Imperial Valley, Calif., and that he be paid such sums as would properly be due him within the provisions of section 4 of the said act of September 7, 1916. The United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in compliance with the terms of the said act of September 7, 1916, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of said commission.

Any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated is hereby appropriated for the purpose of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAGNESITE ORES.

The bill (H. R. 5218) to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of magnesite ores and manufactures thereof in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GLASSWARE, ETC.

The bill (H. R. 7785) to provide revenue for the Government, to establish and maintain in the United States the manufacture of laboratory glassware, laboratory porcelain ware, optical glass, scientific and surgical instruments, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been requested to ask that these tariff bills shall go over for the day. There are only five minutes left of the morning hour, and it would be impossible to obtain the consideration of them to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

THE PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) granting a bonus to enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts who have accepted or may accept their discharge in order to reenlist in said Philippine Scouts was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, a component part of the Army of the United States, who enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, and who, prior to expiration of the period of their enlistment contracts, have accepted or may accept their discharge from such enlistment in order to reenlist in said Philippine Scouts, shall be entitled to the payment of $60 as provided in section 1406 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919.

Mr. POMERENE. Let us have some explanation of the joint resolution. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will be very glad to give an explanation, Mr. President. The Senator from Ohio will remember that Congress, toward the end of our participation in the war, or immediately after the armistice date, passed an act providing for the payment of a bonus of $60 to every soldier who was honorably discharged. That applied to the Regular Army, to the National Army, and to the National Guard, as it was then composed, in the service of the United States.

There has always been a question as to whether the Philippine Scouts belong to the Regular Army or not. It has been a matter of doubt as to whether they were covered by that legislation. The War Department has been unable to make up its mind to pay to the enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts, as they take their discharges, this bonus of $60, and as those men enlisted with the same idea with which the white troops enlisted, this joint resolution is to permit the payment of the $60 bonus to the enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts as they are discharged and reenlist.

Mr. POMERENE. In other words, it simply treats them as if they were a part of the Regular Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly as if they were Regulars. I think, myself, they are entitled to it.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT COMMISSION ON RECLASSIFICATION OF SALARIES.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 160) to provide for the preservation and maintenance of the records of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that may go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

ARMY POST SCHOOLS AND LIBRARIES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Calendar No. 364, Senate joint resolution 128, relating to schools and libraries at Army posts. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] objected to it when it was brought up, but since that time has indicated his approval of it, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a suggestion with respect to it which I think can be met very easily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the Senate return to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 128.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 128) relating to schools and libraries at Army posts.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I want to ask that the number on the calendar which we have just passed over on the objection of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] be not considered as passed over. Let the consideration of the calendar be considered as having stopped before we reached that, before we took up this other matter.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been passed over, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. There is something that ought to be said on the subject of the preservation of those records of the Reclassification Commission, and I had no opportunity to say anything because of the request for unanimous consent on the part of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I do not desire to interfere with what the Senator from New York wants to have done, but I do not wish the joint resolution in regard to the Reclassification Commission records to lose its place on the calendar. Evidently the Senator from Utah desires to have that go over.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked that it go over, and that was ordered, and so it is over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Utah his objection will be met if we strike out the word "furnishing" and insert the word "purchasing," on page 2 of the joint resolution, and after the word "periodicals" strike out the word "to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for," so as to make it read:

Shall be construed to authorize the purchasing of newspapers and periodicals for troops.

Mr. SMOOT. With those amendments I have no objection to the joint resolution.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3792.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Curtis	Kendrick	New	Smoot
Dillingham	Kenyon	Norris	Spencer
France	Keyes	Nugent	Swanson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Page	Trammell
Gay	McCumber	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Gore	McKellar	Pomerene	Warren
Harris	Moses	Sheppard	Watson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. CAPPER, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. PHIPPS, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. PHELAN, Mr. BALL, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. HITCHCOCK entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is recognized.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I imagine that no Senator will deny the assertion that the United States has never had a military policy. Perhaps some Senators may not agree with me in the next assertion, and that is that it is time we had one.

Some few days ago I had an estimate made in my office of the amount of money which the Federal Government has expended since 1789, the year of its establishment, and an estimate also as to what share of that aggregate of expenditures since 1789 down to 1920 had been spent for war, or in paying the bills of war. I found, roughly estimated, that two-thirds of all the money spent by the Federal Government since its establishment has been spent for war and in paying the bills left over from wars.

I think no Senator will deny that it has been the practice—I do not use the word "policy"—of the United States, the uniform practice of the United States, to prepare for war after the war has commenced, and I think a perusal of our history and a perusal of our appropriation bills and of our tax laws will indicate very clearly the terrific burden which has been placed upon the people by reason of that practice. It indicates very clearly the fearful and inexcusable extravagance not only in money but in lives.

Members of this body, of course, recollect quite clearly the last two wars in which the United States was engaged, the Spanish War of 1898 and the great World War into which we entered on April 6, 1917. I need not relate the unfortunate experience of our men in the Spanish War. I need not recite the conditions in the camps where thousands of raw recruits were thrown together, fresh from the factories and the offices and the farms, and where thousands of them died like flies because the Government was not prepared, and indeed had not had an opportunity to prepare, for receiving those men and giving them a decent chance to live and fight as soldiers.

Senators must know, of course, the terrific cost of our last essay in war. The Congress of the United States on April 6, 1917, declared a state of war to exist with the Imperial German Government. At the moment when we declared war the Regular Army of the United States numbered about 120,000 men and the National Guard of the States included about the same number. It was instantly apparent to all sensible men that, in order that the country might defend itself and vindicate its honor, it would be necessary to organize, train, and operate with an infinitely larger force. So in the month of May, if my recollection is correct, the selective draft law was passed, with the provisions of which the Senate is familiar.

In the meantime volunteering was invited by the Federal Government, and the Regular Army was somewhat filled up by volunteers, and the National Guard also was somewhat filled up in the same manner. Try as hard as it could the Government of the United States, presiding over the destinies and responsible for the protection of 100,000,000 people, was not able until the middle of June, two months after the declaration of war, to muster together and send abroad one division of troops, the famous First Division of the Regular force. That division contained 50 per cent of green, raw recruits, a fact that is not generally understood by the public. When it reached France it had to go into training. Not one of its enlisted personnel and very few of its commissioned personnel had had any training in this country with some of the more modern weapons of warfare.

It was not until September, 1917, five months after the declaration of war, that the National Guard was sent to the concentration camps, and it was not until the month of October, six months after the declaration of war, that the first selective service detachments reached the cantonments.

By that time it had become apparent to everybody that this country of ours had entered into an enormous undertaking with practically no preparation in advance, and that the great burden of at least the first year of our participation in the war would be that of training the youth of America to defend the country, to vindicate its honor, and to bring it victory. Thank Heaven, Mr. President, the youth of America did bring us the victory, as the youth of America has brought us the victory upon many other occasions; but I invite the attention of the Senate to the staggering cost of that way of doing business. Later on in the discussion I shall invite the attention of the Senate to the cost not only in money but in the lives of our young men; and I shall ask the Senate whether it believes that the young American who is expected to defend his country in time of war, the young American whom the country calls upon to take his place in the ranks, shall have a decent chance for his life when thus called forth.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have had information, which seemed to be entirely reliable, that during the course of the German war, and for many months after we had been engaged in it, American troops were sent into battle without knowing how to fire a rifle, without any training in the use of a rifle. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if that is correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There were instances of that kind. The condition was not general, but there were some glaring instances of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the evidence was not that that was wholly unnecessary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; that is not the testimony.

Mr. LENROOT. That there were trained troops that might have been sent to the front, but were kept in the United States because the officers did not want to lose their trained troops, and, therefore, sent untrained men across the sea?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not agree with the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. President, I have said that we have never had a military policy, and I think that statement is correct. I know full well that there is a suspicion and a fear in the minds of many people that the adoption of a military policy necessarily means the establishment in this country of a great militaristic machine. I would never support any such proposal, nor would the Committee on Military Affairs do so. There is, however, a kind or a type of military policy which is in sympathy with our institutions, which can be maintained and operated without violating the principles of the American people or their traditions, which can be so maintained and operated as to make this country absolutely secure and at the same time avoid the creation and the favoring of a caste of any kind or description.

I think no Senator will deny that we should have learned a great deal, and undoubtedly we have learned many tremendously valuable lessons, as the result of this last great war; and I find a disposition in the Army and in the Navy and in the Congress and among the people to take advantage of some of those lessons and to see to it that some of the handicaps that we experienced during this war shall not again be met with if we shall in the future be driven into war.

With the idea of taking advantage of the lessons of the war, the War Department prepared a bill, and to a consideration of some of its more important features I invite the attention of the Senate. The War Department bill was introduced last July in the Senate, and, I think, also in the House of Representatives, and was announced as representing the matured opinion of the War Department in the matter of the national defense and the establishment of a military policy. It provided for the maintenance of a Regular Army of 576,000 officers and men, at an annual cost of $800,000,000. It provided also for a system of universal military training, under which each young man on reaching the age of 19 would go to an intensive training camp and there be trained for three months.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator if the expense of the universal military training provided for would be in addition to the $800,000,000 to which he has referred?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would; the $800,000,000 was to be for the maintenance of the Regular Army alone, in time of peace.

At the expiration of the three months' period the young man was to return to his home and resume his civilian occupation. He was not to be attached to a reserve unit of any sort; his name and number were to be kept by the War Department, and in the event of war that young man would be summoned to the colors under a draft law, and, with his associates, was to be used to fill up the units of the Regular Army. In other words, the citizen soldier, as contemplated by the War Department bill, was really meant to be a high private in the rear rank of the Regular Army in time of war; he was to be the "replacement" of the professional soldier; the Regular Army or professional soldier was to dominate the entire situation under such a proposal, and the citizen soldier was simply to fill in the places which could not be filled in or could not be taken care of by the Regular personnel.

Mr. President, this brings up to my mind one of the most important and vital elements of the question of national defense. A study of our wars indicates very clearly, beyond all possibility of doubt, that it is utterly impossible in time of peace to maintain a Regular Army large enough to defend the country in time of war. The cost of such a force, if we could recruit it, would be absolutely prohibitive. Even 576,000 men would not be enough in a great war, and the cost of 576,000 men, at $800,000,000 a year, is prohibitive.

A study of our wars will also indicate that when we have been confronted with a national crisis, or a state of affairs worthy of that name, the country has been compelled to rely upon citizen soldiers for its defense. So it was in the Civil War; so it was in the Spanish War, and had that contest lasted a few more months it would have been increasingly so; and, above all, it was so in the last war, for, whereas we went into the war with a Regular Army of 120,000 men, which was recruited somewhat above that figure during the first two or three months of the war, the burden of the strife, the great weight of the burden and the responsibility fell upon the shoulders of the citizen soldier. In this last war we had over 3,500,000 citizen soldiers.

The Senate committee rejected the War Department's bill because the committee believed that it was in violation of the traditions and the democratic institutions of the United States, in that it attempted to make the citizen soldier subservient to the professional soldier; in that it attempted to establish in this country a very large regular or professional army in time of peace and to make that army, through its officers and its machinery, dominate completely the entire military policy and national defense of the country.

The Senate committee rejected that bill because it did not believe in that type of army, and it did not believe in an army of that size, so far as the Regulars were concerned. The Senate committee believes that it is entirely possible and entirely economical—and upon that I will venture to lay some emphasis later on—to have a democratic system under which an army can be raised and maintained.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that the bill of the department had been framed and approved by the Army Staff?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was framed in the War Department; it had the approval of the Chief of Staff and his principal assistants and the qualified approval, at least, of the Secretary of War. It was therefore incumbent upon the Military Affairs Committee, through a subcommittee which was appointed, to go to work and draft a bill which would, in its judgment, result in the establishment of a great democratic system for the defense of the United States.

The hearings commenced, as I recall, about the 1st of August, 1919. They continued practically every day until about the 1st of November. With the hearings closed, the committee went into conference and started the preparation of the bill, with the assistance, I may say, of two officers of the War Department who were given permission to assist us—Col. John McA. Palmer and Col. John W. Gulick. And I take this opportunity to express, on behalf of the committee, our great gratitude to those two officers, who have worked with us for weeks and for months, day after day, well on into the night on a good many occasions, in a most unselfish, patriotic, and intelligent way, and have been of tremendous assistance to us.

The bill now before the Senate is the bill drafted by that subcommittee and reported by the full committee to the Senate. We believe that it provides an automatic, adequate, democratic, and economical defense, and that if enacted into law it will constitute the first example in our history of this country establishing a military policy in sympathy with its institutions, its traditions, and its peculiar make-up, geographically and otherwise.

There are two exceedingly important, indeed fundamental, features of this bill.

The first fundamental change made in our military system by this bill as contrasted with the system of to-day is that this bill provides that all the military forces of the United States shall be organized into one army. Senators will remember, of course, that to-day we have a Regular Army and a National Guard. This bill merges the Regular Army and the National Guard into one army. It is done under the so-called Army clause of the Constitution, which reads, in section 8 of Article I, as follows:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

This one Army, under the terms of this bill, is divided into two classes of personnel. The first class is the permanent personnel, otherwise commonly known as the Regulars. The second class is the reserve personnel, otherwise commonly known as the citizen soldiers, designated in this bill as the reservists. The permanent personnel are the full-time soldiers, men who, in the commissioned personnel, make the military art a profession for life. The citizen or reserve personnel are the part-time soldiers. The reserve personnel, the part-time citizen-soldier personnel, is infinitely the larger of the two in our bill, as it should be in time of peace, and as it must be in time of war.

We encountered some stumbling blocks, which perhaps the Senate will permit me to describe, in merging the National Guard as it exists to-day into the Army of the United States under the Army clause. Senators will recollect that the National Guard is at present organized under the militia clause of the Constitution, which provides:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

And in another paragraph the Constitution provides that—> the Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Under the militia clause the National Guard soldiers, who have been our citizen soldiers of the past in time of peace, have suffered a very severe handicap. They have not belonged to the Army. They have been in a category and in a class by themselves. The recognition which could be given them by the Federal Government has been limited, and upon many occasions those limitations have worked to the detriment of the guard. Senators will remember that at the outbreak of the Spanish War there were National Guard units in existence, but that as the Spanish War did not involve the "suppression of insurrection" or the "repelling of invasion" the Federal Government could not call the National Guard or Organized Militia into the Federal service during that war. The result was that volunteers had to be called for, and men and officers were invited to volunteer as individuals from the guard and go into the United States volunteer service. That means the breaking up, in whole or in part, of those old, and some of them very famous, units in the National Guard. It means a change of status upon the threshold of war, a disruption, a disturbance. It means that they must all be mustered in over again, and a vast amount of paper work required. It means that under the new status they occupy a position not very secure. The units of which they were members were in many instances broken, and the guard coming from the States proud of those old units were helpless in preventing the breaking up of the units.

That happened in the Spanish War. Let us come to the Mexican border trouble. The President called for the National Guard when the border trouble became acute, and, in the end of June, 1916, about 10 days after the national defense act became a law, the guard went to the border, called out by the President under that provision of the Constitution which authorizes him, in effect, to call it out to repel invasion. They went to the border as militia in the service of the Federal Government. They could not have been sent across the Rio Grande, had that been necessary, for a military purpose, as militia. They would have had to volunteer or else be drafted as individuals into the Federal service in accordance with that provision of the national defense act which we inserted in order to enable the guard to get over that obstacle or hurdle which has confronted it at the outbreak of every war.

I have just referred to that provision in the national defense act which authorizes the President, when war has been declared by Congress, to draft the individual officers and soldiers of the National Guard into the Army of the United States. That was done at the outbreak, or shortly after the outbreak, of the German war. The result was that by drafting those men under that provision into the Army of the United States, their whole connection with the State from which they came was severed; they were deemed to have been discharged from the military service of the State. They were then solely and purely soldiers of the United States; and when they had finished their term of duty during this war as soldiers of the United States and were discharged from the service of the United States, they went back to civil life with their old units, in which they had taken such great pride, dispersed, in large measure destroyed, and no National Guard or Organized Militia left in the country. The militia clause for years has stood in the way of the recognition of the citizen soldier of the National Guard.

The militia clause has been a handicap to him and to his units and organizations. It has been a handicap to the country in so far as it fails to provide for the country at large a citizen force which can be used promptly upon the outbreak of war; for so long as the citizen soldiers are organized and maintained under the militia clause of the Constitution, and are thereby prevented in time of peace from being members of the Army of the United States, reserve or otherwise, just so long will it be impossible to have one Army whose personnel shall be transferable back and forth among all its elements; and just so long will it be necessary to repose upon the Regular officer the entire responsibility for conducting the military activities of the country; and just so long will it be impossible for the citizen officer, the officer of the National Guard, to secure recognition and take part in the councils of the War Department and the Army itself. So this bill provides that the National Guard of the United States shall be a part of the reserve personnel of the Army of the United States, and that the officers of the National Guard of the United States shall be primarily reserve officers in the Army of the United States, and secondarily shall assume an obligation to their respective States to protect those States severally against disorders which may spring up within their borders, and which, in the judgment of the governor of the State, require the assistance of those units of the National Guard of the United States stationed within the borders of his State.

In other words, this bill leaves to the State the same degree of protection against internal disorders as the States enjoy to-day with the Organized Militia or National Guard as it exists to-day, and it leaves to the officers and men of the National Guard the great privilege and opportunity of belonging to the Army of the United States and being consulted and conferred with from time to time, as is provided in this bill, upon all important matters affecting the citizen soldiers of the country.

So much for his one-army idea. I have not developed it completely nor at the length, perhaps, which the subject justifies, but I must hasten along.

I have said that the one Army is to consist of two classes of personnel—the permanent personnel, commonly called the Regulars, and the reserve personnel, commonly called the citizen soldiers.

The permanent personnel or Regular Army is first dealt with in the bill. Before the Spanish War the Regular Army consisted of about 25,000 men. Since that time it has grown steadily in accordance with acts of Congress until at the outbreak of the German war it consisted of about 120,000. The national defense act, however, having been passed in 1916, authorized the increase of the Regular Army to 236,000 men and eleven thousand and odd officers, that increase to be attained in five annual increments. Upon entering the German war the Congress authorized the War Department to take those increments in one year and raise the Regular Army up to the national defense figures without further delay.

So the present law authorizes the maintenance of a Regular Army of 236,000 men, roughly speaking, and 11,000 officers. Temporary legislation, brought about through the appropriation bill last summer and good only until next July 1, authorized the maintenance of a somewhat larger force, but existing and permanent law is reflected in the national defense act at the figures I have given.

Mr. President, the House of Representatives has passed an Army reorganization bill calling for a Regular Army of 300,000 men and 17,200 officers. This bill provides for a Regular Army or permanent personnel of 280,000 men and 18,000 officers. The enlisted strength under the Senate bill, in the matter of the permanent personnel, is 20,000 less than that under the House bill. The commissioned strength is slightly in excess of that provided for in the House bill. But this feature I want the Senate to understand, to wit, that if those provisions of our bill which have to do with universal military training are enacted, our bill further provides that, following the year in which the military training program is first put into effect, the Regular Army, or permanent personnel, shall thereafter be decreased in its enlisted strength at the rate of 5 per cent per year for five years, and in its commissioned strength at the rate of 2 per cent per year for five years, so that at the end of six years from the date of the passage of this act, if it should pass in approximately its present form, the Regular Army will consist of 210,000 men instead of the House figures of 300,000 men, and the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army will consist of 16,200 officers instead of 17,200, as provided in the House bill. Let me say to the Senate that the money we save by thus progressively decreasing the Regular Army, or permanent personnel, almost exactly offsets the cost of universal military training, other assertions to the contrary notwithstanding.

Let us remember, when we are considering the size of the permanent personnel and the relative costs of different kinds of soldiers in time of peace, that a regular soldier at present prices costs annually about $1,800 to maintain, and the most accurate figures obtained, after the most exhaustive investigations which the committee and its assistants can make, indicate that at the end of six years, with the system installed, as suggested in this bill, the citizen soldier, the product of the training system, organized either into the National Guard of the United States or in the organized reserves, as provided in this bill, will cost the Federal Government only $176 per year to maintain; and, instead of having for the defense of your country a Regular Army alone, with a somewhat indefinite National Guard, as under present law, a Regular Army alone of 300,000 men, as provided in the House bill, to cost $540,000,000, plus the cost of the National Guard, you will have a great citizen army, composed of men reasonably well trained, living the life of civilians in time of peace in their home communities; you will have a great citizen reserve army of 3,000,000 men for the same money. That is the point I want to drive home to the Senate and to the country.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that the cost to the country is $1,800 per capita per annum.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For a soldier in the Regular Army.

Mr. POMERENE. Is that on a peace basis or on a war footing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A peace basis.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the size of the Army included in that computation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not make very much difference what the size is. That is what a soldier costs us annually, except the smaller the Army the greater the proportionate cost, because the overhead can not be reduced proportionately.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that the cost is substantially the same whether you have an Army of 120,000 or an Army of 500,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think if you had an Army of 120,000 Regulars the cost per man would be a little higher than in an Army of 300,000 Regulars, because the overhead can not be reduced proportionately as you reduce the enlisted strength; but this figure of $1,800 per annum is what an Army of between 250,000 and 300,000 Regulars would cost per man per year.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator's report recommends an Army of 280,000 men now——

Mr. WADSWORTH. To begin with.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Subject to reductions until it reaches 210,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; enlisted men.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the chairman explain why an Army of 210,000 would not be sufficient now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the answer to that question would involve a review of world conditions. One man's judgment is about as good as another's. I would not care to be responsible for a bill which would reduce the available military force of the United States—I do not care whether you call it Regulars, or volunteers, or National Guard—below the figure of 250,000 at this moment of history. It is all we have now. Two hundred and eighty thousand is a safer figure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator deems 280,000 as required now, and 210,000 sufficient five or six years from now, for what specific reason? How can he justify the reduction during the next five years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because during those five years we shall be building up our citizen reserve.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator mean by that the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In part.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In part?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not contemplate that this training of these young men a few months a year will constitute them a part of the Regular Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course not. That is the very thing we do not want.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But does the Senator estimate that that training, given to this so-called citizen Army, makes it possible to reduce the number from 280,000 to 210,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not a fact now that we have several million young men who have already gone through that training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I wonder how long we are going to ask those men to bear the burden.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated that that reserve of trained citizen soldiers, occupied with civilian pursuits, would enable us to get along with an Army of 210,000 six years from now. If it would enable us to get along with a Regular Army of 210,000 six years from now, why can we not get along with an Army of 210,000 now, when we already have young men trained?

Mr. WADSWORTH. But, Mr. President, those young men are not members of the reserve army now; they are not organized and they are not equipped. And the question is, Is it fair to ask these men, who either volunteered or went cheerfully under the draft, to continue being responsible for the defense of the United States indefinitely? It seems to me, Mr. President, that their successors in age should commence to assume a little bit of that responsibility, and that is the purpose of this bill, in part. It is to establish a system which shall automatically provide the country with an adequate defense at all times and against any emergency. I want to emphasize this: I do not think it is fair to contend, Mr. President, that because we have three or four million men who have just gone through a terrific war and have now returned to civil pursuits, have been honorably discharged from the service, have gone back and are now trying to make up for the time they lost in civil life, we need do nothing about establishing a citizen army. They have done their share, and there are men of 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22 years of age who are available, and increasingly available from now on, to act as their successors; and surely there is no more honorable undertaking for a young man of to-day than to act as the successor of the young men who went into the war against Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have not any disposition to antagonize the Senator's argument at this point; I am simply seeking for information. He argues, then, that it is possible to reduce an Army of 280,000 to 210,000 during the next five years by reason of this education of young men who are coming into manhood. I ask him what hold the Government has upon those young men whom it is proposed to subject to compulsory training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had intended to come to that later in my remarks, Mr. President; but, as the Senator asks it now, I will answer the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to have that explained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That involves a discussion of the military-training features of the bill, which I had not expected to discuss until I had finished discussing the permanent personnel. Would the Senator mind if I postpone an answer to his question, or would he prefer to have it now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly I should not object to the Senator postponing the answer. My impression was that the Government did not have upon those young men whom it proposes to train any greater hold than it would have upon young men already trained. If I am mistaken in that, I would like to be enlightened.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the provisions of the bill bring about this state of affairs: A young man upon reaching the age of 18 becomes, under the provisions of the bill, liable to military training. He may take that training in either one of the three following years, his nineteenth, twentieth, or twenty-first. The period of training is four months, and in each of those years there are two such four-month periods provided for; so that in the three years there are six available periods of training for each young man who reaches the age of 18. He has six choices. He can elect to take it in his nineteenth year, in either of the four-month periods of that year, or in his twentieth year, in one of those two periods, or in his twenty-first year, in one of those two periods.

Upon the completion of his four months' training he goes back to his home and resumes his civilian pursuits, but is assigned to a reserve unit organized in the locality of his residence. He is a reservist in the Army of the United States. He remains a reservist for a total of five years, including the four months of his training. During that five years he may be called upon by the Government to attend two maneuver periods, not to exceed two weeks each; so that during that period of his term as a reservist his liability for training in maneuvers can not exceed an aggregate of one month, which, added to the four months of his intensive training, gives him five months' training. And that is all—five months out of his entire life. But while he is a member of that reserve unit organized in his own locality, composed of his own neighbors, officered by his own neighbors, citizen officers, he is liable, in the event that Congress declares war against some country, to go to the front with his unit. That is all. That is what the reserve of the Army of the United States amounts to under this bill. There is no element of compulsory military service in time of peace. Only in time of war, declared by Congress, proclaimed by the President, are these reservists liable to military service.

Then they may be called out by the President to defend the country after a declaration of war by Congress. Our theory is that these young men, having had an aggregate of five months of training, will have a better show for their lives in defending their country and in going into battle than if they had not had any training. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They can be called out then in such an emergency without any draft applying to them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They are then in effect drafted for the military service at the time they are subjected to the compulsory military training. Am I correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is, for the training.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In other words, when the Government puts its hand upon them and takes them for compulsory military training, they are subjected then possibly to military service without any form of draft specially enacted by Congress?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they are not subjected to military service in time of peace. Military service involves, primarily, fighting. They can not be compelled to fight; they can not be used as policemen; they can not be used in the exercise of military power or force anywhere in time of peace.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated that in the event of war they would be subject to military service without any draft?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then they are in effect subjected to possible military service under compulsion at the time the Government puts its hands upon them for compulsory training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and so is every man between 18 and 45 alive in the United States to-day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, no; except by a draft no man is subjected to military service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are subject to the draft.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; subject to the draft; yet those young men who are taken for compulsory military training are in effect subject to military service without any draft specially enacted by the Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true. If we were thrust into a great war, if we were dragged into a great war as we have been in the past, those same young men, whether this bill be enacted into law or not, would have to go. Somebody must go.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think there is a distinction. They would only have to go in the event that Congress enacted a draft law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But it would not be necessary for Congress to enact a draft law in order to force those millions of young men into the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How could they be forced in without a draft law?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They could not be forced in ordinarily. The American citizen can only be forced into the military service by a draft law. What I am seeking to develop is that in the guise of compulsory military training we are, in effect, subjecting to compulsory military service several millions of young men. I think the Senator had admitted that.

I am not antagonizing that. I only want to develop the fact, because if we are taking up now a plan for compulsory military service we might as well know it and not delude ourselves into the idea that compulsory military training does not involve compulsory military service, because it may.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My assertion was that it did not involve compulsory military service in time of peace. That is what I said.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I would like to know what service these reservists would owe to the States in case it was necessary to call out troops for any State function?

Mr. WADSWORTH. None. The National Guard of the United States takes care of that.

Mr. RANSDELL. That would be taken care of entirely by the National Guard of the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. I can explain that in just a moment. I said these young men upon reaching the age of 18 would have six choices as to the period in which they should take the training. There is, however, a seventh choice provided by the bill. If those young men live in a community where there are adequate facilities, they may take their training in the National Guard of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. That would be provided for, then, in addition to what the Senator has already discussed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in addition, but as an alternative. In other words, a young man living in New Orleans, if he did not want to go to the four months' training camp, could enlist, we will say, in the famous Washington Artillery of that city, and take his training with them instead, except that that training period would cover an enlistment period of three years.

Mr. RANSDELL. Would that subject him to the same enforced military service in case of war that service in the reserve would?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and that subjects him to an additional obligation as compared with a man who takes the four months' training and merely joins the organized reserve. The man who elects to take his training with the National Guard, on becoming a member of the National Guard, agrees not only to perform all the duties of a reserve soldier, a citizen soldier of the United States, but also to respond to the call of the governor of the State in which his unit is situated, if that State needs his service in suppressing disorder. That man will be liable to that degree of military service in time of peace.

Mr. RANSDELL. In his own State only?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In his own State, and also for the suppression of insurrection in the United States. But he has undertaken that obligation voluntarily. He is a volunteer in that category. He need not join the National Guard and take the training that way unless he wants to. He can take it in the four months' training camp. But if he does join the National Guard he does it voluntarily and he agrees to protect his State against internal disorder and to protect the United States in the suppression of insurrection and the repelling of invasion; and in time of war, declared by Congress and proclaimed by the President, the National Guard soldier has the same obligation as a soldier of the organized reserve.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So the two groups are part of the great citizen reserve. We merely assign a mission to the National Guard of the United States which we do not assign to the organized reserve. The National Guard of the United States will be almost exactly like the present National Guard, organized locally, officered by its own people, available for State uses under the guise of State troops, and available for Federal Government uses just as they are to-day, except it will not be necessary to muster them into the Federal service while trying to hop over that obstacle of the militia clause of the Constitution.

Mr. RANSDELL. That organization would provide for taking care, I take it, of all the famous National Guard units which exist in the country to-day?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill specifically provides that those names and designations and numerals shall be preserved. The bill specifically provides that in the designation of the location and the allocation of National Guard units in the several States, a committee shall have charge of the drawing of the regulations and that on that committee there must be a majority of citizen officers who will sit with the representatives of the War Department and work out those regulations.

Mr. RANSDELL. I think that would be very satisfactory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Upon that point may I say——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I know that the Senator from New York has the bill well in mind and well in hand. I believe his statement of the provisions of it and the necessity for its enactment in the law would be better if he were not interrupted so much. I do not agree with him on some features of the measure, but if he is allowed to make his statement throughout, I believe we can get a better view of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have but a sentence or two more to say along the line of this last discussion.

A perusal of the bill will show that in this entire organization of the one Army of the United States, the citizen officer—be he a National Guard officer or officer in the organized reserve—his status is just the same. He is admitted into the councils of the Army and given his proportionate influence. We have decentralized the authority as far away from Washington as we can do so, or as far away as we can do it with safety and with due regard to cohesion.

All of the regulations having to do with military training itself are to be drawn up by committees of officers in which the citizen officer, the civilian expert, the teacher, the doctor, the expert on hygiene, public health, and education, are to have their proportionate representation and in some of them they are to be in the majority. All of the regulations to be drawn up governing the organization of the organized reserves, deciding, for example, whether or not there shall be located at Newark, N. J., a regiment of infantry of the organized reserve composed of the young men of Newark who have gone through the four months at the training camp and gone home to live, will be decided by a committee, and the majority of that committee is to be composed of citizen officers residents of the locality and of the State of New Jersey.

Through the entire bill the citizen officer is elevated to a plane and position he has never occupied before. He is put on an equality with the Regular officer. He is made eligible for the General Staff. He is made eligible for service with the Regular troops at any time, with his own consent. If he wants to serve, he can be sent to the Philippines and serve with the Regular troops there. He can go to Panama; he can go to Leavenworth to take the course there, but only with his consent.

Mr. GORE. Some soldiers can be sent to Leavenworth without their consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they can not. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that that is the very thing we do not permit.

Mr. GORE. But there are soldiers now serving at Leavenworth without their consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I acknowledge that; but that is under another provision of law.

All through this bill we have injected at every opportunity that has occurred this idea of the citizen being counseled with, being consulted about his Army, and we are trying to make this an Army of the people of the United States, to let it be understood that this is the people's army, in the control of the people, and that these things which are so important to localities, with their varying traditions and their peculiar conditions, shall be taken care of so far as possible by the intelligent opinion of the localities represented, on those committees that are to draw the regulations, by officers who live in the several localities.

Some time ago I started to discuss the permanent personnel or Regulars. I had stated that the plan was to start with 280,000 enlisted men and 18,000 officers, to be decreased through a five-year program to 210,000 enlisted men and 16,200 officers. The war has shown us some lessons about the Regular Army. The men who have learned the lessons best are the Regulars themselves. As a result, several important provisions in the bill having to do with the Regular Army or permanent personnel, which I desire merely to touch upon, are important. Some of them, one might say, are fundamental.

The Regular Army or permanent personnel has two distinct missions at present. In this bill we give it three. Its first mission is to garrison the overseas possessions. It garrisons the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, Panama, and Porto Rico. The bill provides for the overseas garrisons, consisting entirely of the permanent personnel, except when reserve officers, with their consent, are sent with them.

The second mission of the Regular Army in time of peace is to garrison the seacoast defenses of the United States and to constitute what might be termed a small expeditionary force, for example, for protection of the Mexican border. That portion of the Regular Army, or permanent personnel, we designate the home forces.

Then the bill also provides for the training forces, which are to consist in large part, in the first instance, of the permanent personnel, or Regulars. They are to be in charge of the training of recruits under the military training program, but it is important to remember that they must rely in quite a large measure upon reserve officers who, having become thoroughly experienced as the result of this war and who in the future will get their training under the training forces, can help the training forces of the permanent personnel in conducting the training program.

So to the permanent personnel we assign three missions—overseas garrisons, home forces, and training forces—and 280,000 men and 18,000 officers can do it all at the beginning, and we believe that five or six years from now 210,000 men and 16,200 officers can do it all, so far as the efforts of professional soldiers may be needed.

At this time, Mr. President, the officers of the Regular Army are commissioned in the several branches of the Army and their promotion runs inside those branches. This bill establishes what we call a single list for promotion. Instead of having officers dependent upon the expansion of their respective arms in order to secure promotion, we provide that the promotion for officers all through the permanent personnel of the Army shall be uniform in all branches and in all services. In other words, we arrange all the officers of the Army, with the exception of the officers of the medical service and the chaplains, upon one single list for promotion. The list is made up, in the first place, by the War Department taking the present records of service and, with a few special modifications, which have to be made in order to straighten out some of the kinks which have occurred as the result of special legislation in years past, that list is made up and contains the names of all the officers of the Army, except those in the medical service and the chaplains. Promotion runs along that single line and not along the lineal list of Field Artillery officers for field artillerymen, not along the list of Infantry officers for infantrymen, and not along the list of Cavalry officers for cavalrymen, and so forth.

By that change we expect to accomplish an important reform. Senators undoubtedly know that up to this very moment there has been constant jealousy and friction and wirepulling between the different branches of the Regular Army, each trying to get ahead of the other. Officers, we will say, of one branch are constantly coming to Congress and asking Congress to pass a piece of legislation to the advantage of that particular branch of the service, and the Congress, if the argument seems good, is very apt to act accordingly. The instant that that is done, the officers from some other branch of the service come to Congress and ask that their branch may secure similar advantageous treatment in legislation. Consequently we find that there is friction and jealousy between the two; and, of course, men being human, the element of promotion and rank is one of the strongest incentives on the part of the officers of a given branch of the service to come to Congress to secure special advantageous treatment for their branch; for if they are able to obtain special advantageous treatment for their branch, it may mean and probably does mean promotion for them. The result is that the Army seldom if ever in the past has presented a concerted opinion or what might be termed a unanimous report to Congress as to what is good for the whole Army. Instead of getting such a concerted or unanimous opinion from the whole Army as to what will be good for it in the matter of legislation, we get the scattered, conflicting opinions of the different branches of the Army. We want to stop that. We want to eliminate from the minds of officers who are in the Infantry or the Cavalry or the Ordnance Department or the Signal Corps or the Engineers or any other branch all thought of promotion indirectly brought about by legislation. If we put all the officers upon one single list and have the promotions run uniformly from the bottom to the top of that list, we shall have eliminated the very element which has constantly kept the Army split up into conflicting cliques and factions.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it will not interrupt the Senator, I should like to ask him a question. I agree with the Senator about desirability of a single list; I think that change should be made; but does not the Senator think that promotion should be based absolutely on the principle of length of service? I call attention to page 52 of the bill, where there is an apparent exception to the principle of promotion because of length of service, which principle I think ought to be adopted at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there are one or two instances in the provisions of the bill in regard to the single list for promotion which may in part violate the principle of the length of commissioned service. When that point is reached in the consideration of the bill I shall be glad to discuss it; but I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that it is almost impossible to adopt a blanket rule and make it apply everywhere without hitting some heads that rise above the surface. We shall find, as we discuss the pending bill, that here and there there are little points in it to which some officer or little group of officers raise objection. It will also be found that it is going to be absolutely impossible to please everybody. It simply can not be done. We have tried our best to please the majority, and I think we have pleased the overwhelming majority.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not entirely clear that I understood the statement of the Senator from New York a moment ago. Do I understand him to mean that promotions would be made in accordance with priority of service or the length of time in service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; that is qualified in the bill. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was a little inaccurate in his description of that provision. We have not adopted the straight seniority system, but we have adopted a modified seniority and eligibility provision combined for promotion.

Mr. POMERENE. I was merely wondering how that rule would have applied in the case of Gen. Grant.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under this bill there is no limit to the rank which a man may attain if he shows the merit and the brilliancy which a man like Gen. Grant showed.

Developing a little further the matter of a central pool of officers, let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that for the first time in army legislation the bill provides in one section for the entire permanent personnel of the Army. That will be found in section 12, under which—

The President is authorized to maintain not to exceed the following permanent personnel: The General of the Army, during the tenure of office of the present incumbent—

With the retirement of Gen. Pershing from active service the office of General of the Army ceases to exist—

20 major generals of the line, 50 brigadier generals of the line, 609 colonels, 685 lieutenant colonels—

And so on down the list of majors, captains, first lieutenants, and second lieutenants. Then follows the provision—and 280,000 enlisted men in their appropriate grades, as hereinafter provided for.

There in one section is recited the entire commissioned and enlisted strength of the permanent personnel or Regular Army; and this bill permits the President of the United States to organize that Army as set forth in that section into tactical units and into services within certain very elastic or generous limitations provided throughout the bill.

The national defense act of to-day attempts by legislation to say, for example, how many regiments of Infantry shall be maintained in the Regular Army, how many companies there shall be in a regiment, how many sergeants in a company, how many corporals in a company, how many first-class privates, and how many privates; in other words, the Congress has attempted in years past to prescribe rigidly the entire tactical organization of the Army. Of course, the Congress is incompetent to do such a thing and never should have attempted to do so. I may say in passing that it would not have attempted to do so if the Army itself had not asked it, and one reason why Congress was asked from time to time to fix the strength of the Infantry, the Cavalry, and the Field Artillery, and other branches, and to raise the strength of the Infantry, of the Field Artillery, or of the Cavalry, and other branches, was that very matter of the promotion of officers running in the lineal lists inside the branches. If officers could persuade the Congress to fix the Field Artillery at a certain number of officers and men as a minimum and that minimum was larger than that provided by existing law, that meant promotion for the officers in that arm of the service. So we put the whole Army into one great pool, and we permit the President to organize it into tactical units to meet the changing conditions and demands of modern warfare.

When we went into the German war the tactical organization of the Army as defined and prescribed in the national defense act was utterly out of date; it was perfectly useless; and yet the Army was organized by the command of Congress into that kind of tactical units. We had to authorize the President at the beginning of the war to break the whole thing up and organize it over again. We did that by act of Congress, and we might just as well let the War Department officials do that from now on, because the invention of a new weapon may change completely the organization of a tactical unit or the tactical value or use even of a certain branch of the service. Congress can not keep pace with such developments; and we believe that soldiers who know how many men ought to be in a company and how many men ought to be in a regiment are better equipped to decide such questions. So, Mr. President, we have organized the whole Army into one pool of officers and men, with promotion for the officers upon a single list.

Now comes the General Staff, a portion of the military machine which is not very well understood. There is a great deal of suspicion about the General Staff in the public mind and in the Congress; there is a great deal of misunderstanding about it. Sometimes I think that the Congress and the public are not entirely to blame for that misunderstanding or for that suspicion, because, due to the fact that we have never had in this country prior to the outbreak of the last war a General Staff worthy of the name in a modern sense, we have had very few officers in the Army who understood General Staff duty; in fact, they misunderstood it in some instances just about as thoroughly as the civilians misunderstood it. It has been our effort in this bill to provide a General Staff system which shall be efficient, which shall be responsive, and which shall be a real aid not only to the Army and its permanent personnel but to the citizen reserve army and to the Congress itself. We have tried to drag aside the veil of mystery that has apparently been thrown in front of the General Staff. We have tried to make it understood by the Congress and the public; we have tried in a sense to democratize it. I am not entirely certain that it needs that; perhaps it does; but, in any event, we have inserted clauses in the bill which tend to democratize the General Staff and to prescribe its functions in such a way that not only the staff officers themselves but all the officers and men of the Army will understand what the General Staff is for.

Mr. President, you can not have a good modern General Staff until the officers composing that General Staff understand General Staff duties; and it is on that line that we have learned a great deal out of this war, particularly after coming into contact with the French, who, I think it fair to say, were the most superbly skillful in their staff work of any of the allied armies. As I recollect, it is provided in the rules or regulations governing the French Army, or perhaps by French statute, that no officer may serve upon the French general staff unless he has secured a place upon a list of eligibles for such service; and you may meet a French officer, we will say, only of the rank of captain, and if he wears the insignia showing that he is a staff officer, you can make up your mind that he is one of the brightest men of his grade, and in some instances I imagine you can make up your mind that he would rather be a captain and be on the French general staff than a major and not be there, for that sign of eligibility to general staff duty is a sign of honor. It means, in a sense, that he is a member of the intellectual aristocracy of the French Army; and it is that very system of carefully educating the staff officers so that they will know how to perform their functions, so that they will know what staff work means, that makes it possible for a Government or a commanding general to operate an army of two, three, or four million men, as was the case in this last war. You can have the finest kind of private soldiers and the finest lieutenants and captains and majors in the world, but if you have not got a well-trained and educated General Staff, which will see to it that the soldiers get to the right place at the right time, and that their ammunition, their clothing, their supplies, and the hundred and one things that an army needs also get there at the right time, your army is no good. You are simply wasting your splendid material, you are wasting your splendid soldiers, you are wasting your splendid subordinate officers.

The staff must be the head center of the brains of an army that shall manage a great force of men with all its impedimenta, all its equipment, and do it in such a way that the army will meet the enemy at the point where the commanding officer wants it to meet the enemy.

So we have established in this bill a provision for an eligibility list for General Staff officers, and until an officer of the permanent personnel can, by going through the schools provided in the Army, secure a position as an eligible on the General Staff list, he can not be detailed for duty with the General Staff. In the first instance, of course, in order to start the eligible list, we provide that officers who during this last war distinguished themselves as General Staff officers shall continue as General Staff eligibles; but from now on no new officer can serve upon the General Staff of the Army of the United States until he has been trained and educated to that particular duty. Furthermore, we provide that when those officers are detailed to the General Staff, one out of each seven years must be served in command of troops. We do not allow a General Staff officer to continue indefinitely on General Staff duty. He must serve one year out of seven in command of troops, so that he will be in constant touch with the needs of troops in the field. Then, if the department so wants it, he may go back to the General Staff and resume his work there.

I think there is nothing more important than this matter of the General Staff. It has been mystified. It has been misunderstood. Some of it is due to the fact that it is new to this country. Other countries have had educated and trained general staffs for some years. Prior to this war we had few officers in our Army who understood what a general staff really was and what it was supposed to do.

Another reform which we intend to suggest in this bill is one which will result in the elimination of unfit officers. There has been a good deal of contention about that. It has been contended that you can not eliminate officers; that a board of officers convened to examine into the efficiency of an officer in the Army hesitates to order his discharge and to send him back to civil life. We provide for promotion and elimination in this way:

All the officers in each grade, for instance, all the colonels or all the majors or all the captains in their respective grades of the entire permanent personnel, are to be grouped annually into three groups.

Class A, the first group, are those officers who, in their grade, are deemed fit for promotion to the next higher grade; and when a vacancy in the next higher grade occurs upon that single list of promotion, the ranking officer in class A will be promoted. That is by seniority.

Class B, the next one, is the group which will contain those officers whom the examining boards decide are not yet fit for promotion. In other words, they may be said to be on probation.

Class C are those officers in the grades whom the examining boards decide should be eliminated. Then we provide in this bill that those officers who are recommended for elimination shall be eliminated upon a graded retirement system—2½ per cent of their pay multiplied by the number of years that they have been in the service, the maximum not to exceed 70 per cent of the full pay of the grade. In other words, by such a system as this we do not ask a board of officers to eliminate one of their fellow officers and throw him out on the cold world without a cent, or perhaps only with one year's pay. We provide that if he is to be eliminated he shall be placed upon the graded retirement list and get a certain percentage of his former full pay, based upon the number of years of service he has spent in the Army. In that way we believe that the unfit officers can be gotten off the active list and their places taken by younger and more enterprising officers from the lower grades.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, is that pay for life?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That graded retirement pay is for life, of course.

To-day, as the result of years of legislation, it is astounding what a fearfully complicated machine we have in the Regular Army, particularly in the matter of the enlisted grades. We have 49 grades of enlisted men in the Army to-day. That number has been piled up through the years by little special acts adding a sergeant here, a quartermaster sergeant there, a special electrical sergeant there, a technical sergeant in some other place, all with different ratings, all with different insignia, complicating the pay schedules, complicating the whole administration of the service. This bill, by consolidating these different noncommissioned grades, reduces the number from 49 down to 7 and simplifies the whole administration of the service in doing so; and in order to give pay to men who become skillful mechanics, electricians, telephone operators, and telegraph operators, we establish a series of specialist ratings, where the man instead of being given a noncommissioned rank or grade is given a little extra pay to reward him for the skill which he has acquired in these mechanical and technical operations. By that we eliminate a large number of noncommissioned officers who should not by rights be wearing chevrons, but are to-day wearing chevrons in order that they may get the pay that goes with the chevrons. We want to wipe those out and give them the pay for the work they do, and we call them enlisted specialists, and the ratings are fixed in the bill. There is no difference in the cost one way or the other, but the proposal under our bill is infinitely more simple.

Senators, I have no doubt, remember the fearful time we had at the outbreak of this war, and during the first six or eight months of the war, in solving the problem of production in the War Department. Certainly the Senate Committee on Military Affairs will never forget it. We went through some very trying days, and indeed some very trying months, in our efforts to prepare to fight after the fight commenced; and one of the biggest efforts, of course, was producing the equipment for this great Army of 4,000,000 men. The problems of production were enormous. Some of the people who were in charge of it had spent 30, 40, or 45 years in the Army, had never come in contact with industrial life or with big business undertakings, did not know the language of the business man, and found it very difficult to sit down with a business man or a group of business men and talk business, and, as they say in business, legitimately make a deal and put it through and get the goods. Of course, there was a good deal of red tape and a good deal of restriction and a good many regulations which tied the hands of the officers of the War Department. There was a good deal of inefficiency—we might just as well say so, because there was a good deal of it—and within six months the whole thing broke down. We spent billions and billions of dollars, and it was not until within one month of the armistice itself that the industries of the United States had finally been mobilized and were turning out the goods for our Army. Prior to that time they had turned out a great deal, to be sure, but we had to borrow from the French and the British, and buy goods in France and in Spain and in Holland, and anywhere we could get them.

This bill attempts, for the first time in the history of military legislation, to inject into the War Department the civilian business mind, and to do it by statute, and yet to do it in such a way as not to make it too rigid, not to make it too binding upon the Secretary of War or the Army itself; in a word, to do it in such a way that the typical business and industrial mind can come into intimate contact with this problem of production in the War Department.

So we establish the office of Undersecretary of War, and we charge him with the general supervision of all the procurement and production activities of the Army. He will have general supervision of the Ordnance Department in its procurement and production activities, the same for the Quartermaster Department, the same for the Signal Corps, the same for the Engineers, and all those branches of the service whose duty it is to go out and buy goods and make contracts. We experienced during the first six months of the war a horrible condition of affairs because of the fact that those different procurement branches were competing with each other in the market. There was no teamwork between them. Finally the President, by strong-arm methods which he was authorized to exercise under the terms of the Overman Act, managed to weld them together under the chairman of the War Industries Board; but the delay was so great that we lost millions of dollars and months of time before our Army was fit to fight and equipped with its own equipment.

We hope by this provision to organize the business end of the War Department in such a way that when the strain of war comes and a tremendous volume of goods and equipment is needed to fit out an army or to supplement the equipment on hand, the War Department can easily expand and meet the crisis. The Undersecretary of War, in a sense, is given equal prestige with the Chief of Staff. As a matter of fact, we make him the immediate successor of the Secretary of War himself in the event of the absence of the Secretary from his duties. He is to meet with the Secretary of War, as the presiding officer, the Chief of Staff, and the General of the Army, in what is known as the war council. That war council will be presided over by the Secretary of War. On one side of the table will sit the strictly military chief of the Army, the Chief of Staff, and on the other side of the table will sit the industrial and business chief of the Army in the person of the Undersecretary of War. The General of the Army, in this case Gen. Pershing, will act as a sort of balance wheel between the two. That council of war will decide upon the general business problems and policies of the War Department, and the Secretary of War, after advising with the council, will issue his instructions as to how the millions and millions of dollars are to be spent in the procurement of rifles, of cannon, of clothes, of shoes, of hand grenades, of wagons, of carts, of automobiles, of trucks, of horses, of mules, and of everything needed to equip a great army.

It is the business end that has never been systematized in the Army of the United States, and it is in the business end, Mr. President, where the billions are spent.

I doubt if there is anything more in connection with the permanent personnel that is important enough to touch upon at this time. If there is, it probably will be brought out in the discussion which will undoubtedly take place on the bill from now on.

We have contrived a system of filling vacancies in the Regular Army created by this act. It may interest the Senate to know that we provide that at least half of all the vacancies created in the Regular Army, or the permanent personnel, by this act shall be filled by the appointment of citizen officers who have seen service in the recent war and have done creditable service. In other words, we are seeing to it that the splendid type of citizen officer that has been evolved in this war shall be injected in as great numbers as is possible into the permanent personnel or Regular Army of the future. We are trying to make a great combination of them—to make it more and more an Army which in its commissioned strength, and especially in its staff and services, shall represent the best of both the former Regulars and the recent emergency or citizen officers.

We provide also, Mr. President, that reserve officers of the Army of the United States generally shall be appointed with reasonably liberal provisions as to examinations. Any person practically is eligible, and if a citizen living the life of a civilian cares to become a reserve officer in the Army of the United States, especially if he has been an officer in this recent war or an officer in the National Guard, he may do so. His record will show whether he is fit to be a reserve officer. The entrance into the reserve army in the commissioned personnel is made as easy as it is safe to make it, in order that we may get this great piece of machinery started quickly and promptly upon the passage of this bill or any kind of bill which establishes a citizen army in reserve of the Regular Army.

I have already discussed, I think, Mr. President, the National Guard and our treatment of the guard in this bill. I want to refer to it again just for a moment, because I am perfectly well aware that there are some adjutant generals of the States who do not view with enthusiasm this proposal of ours to take the guard out of the militia clause and put it under the Army clause of the Constitution. Adjutant generals in some of the States in effect command the National Guard of the State. They do it in the name of the governor, but in many cases it is actually the adjutant general in command. It is quite natural that some of the adjutant generals of the States do not like to lose command of the guard.

Mr. President, we discussed this matter, in fact, we discussed this whole bill, with two committees named by the American Legion—two separate committees of the legion. We spent many, many hours with the first committee, and on that committee there were four National Guard officers, all veterans of the war, and on the second committee there were four other National Guard officers, all veterans of the war. They were a unit in saying that the National Guard would never become an effective force, to the extent that its progressive members wanted it to be effective, until it was brought in under the Army clause of the Constitution and the personnel put upon an equal status with the officers of the Regular Army. The guard can never have its day in court until it is made a part of the same Army to which the Regular belongs. So long as the guardsman is a militiaman he does not "belong to the club."

Those officers to whom I have just alluded were unanimous in saying that it will be of tremendous benefit to the guard to bring it under the Army clause, and to do it under this bill, without depriving the States of the protection which the States must have against internal disorder.

I was intensely interested in an incident which occurred a week ago last Monday. I think I am justified in saying that the National Guard of the State of New York is larger than that of any other State, and certainly there is none more efficient. It contributed an entire division in this war, a division which was under the command of a National Guard major general, who was the only non-Regular major general in command of troops in France; and it is fair to say that the records of the Army show that that National Guard division distinguished itself in a very high degree.

Those men have come home. They, like the other national guardsmen in the Forty-second or Rainbow Division, the Thirty-fifth—Kansas and Missouri troops—and many of the other splendid National Guard divisions, are exceedingly proud of what they accomplished. Their faith in the citizen soldier is higher and deeper than ever before.

The National Guard Association of the State of New York met in its annual convention at Albany a week ago last Monday, with about 400 officers present. The overwhelming majority of them are veterans who have been through the thick of the fighting. With only three or four dissenting votes, they passed a resolution begging the Congress to put the National Guard under the Army clause, and get it away from the militia clause; and they give their reasons. No man who has read the reasons given by that group of officers can deny that such a change would be for the benefit of the guard itself, and that without such a change the guard can never come into its own.

This bill, Mr. President, provides that 25 per cent of the General Staff here in Washington shall be composed of reserve or guard officers. I doubt very much whether that can be done if the guard officer remains a militiaman, if he is liable to only one kind of service, to wit, to repel invasions and to suppress insurrections. At least, there is a grave question whether you can assign a militia officer to active duty with the Regular Army in time of peace. But there is no question that you can assign an officer of the reserve army of the United States to active duty in time of peace, because that officer holds and wields his authority, flowing downward from the President, under the Army clause of the Constitution, which authorizes and empowers the Congress to raise and support armies.

Nor do I believe it is entirely clear that you can put a National Guard officer, a militiaman, as head of the National Guard Bureau of the War Department. You may be able to do it, but it is a close legal question which I would prefer to leave to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] or the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. While he is a militiaman, you can not invest him with the authority of an officer of the United States and authorize him to give orders. If you can, it is a peculiar situation and, to say the least, his is an anomalous position. But under this bill, by bringing the guard officers into the Army of the United States and making them a part of the reserves, in full standing, you can take any guard officer, with his consent, and assign him to any kind of duty, in peace or war. You can send him anywhere, with his consent, and there is no doubt about it that when he reaches his post of duty and displays upon his shoulder, we will say, the oak leaf of a major of the reserve army of the United States, he is on an equal footing and has equal authority with the man who is a major of the Regular Army. And until you bring the guardsman into the Army he can never operate on an equal footing with the Regular Army officer. He will always be known as a militiaman, in a separate category, as only half a soldier of the United States; and what the progressive guard officers want to-day is to be known as soldiers of the United States. When you give them that privilege and bring them into intimate contact with the General Staff, and permit them to go to the schools of the Army at Fort Riley, at Fortress Monroe, and the other schools, on an equal footing with Regular officers, you are not only going to help the guardsmen, but you are going to help the Regulars, for there is nothing that will more surely help both of these factions—and they have been divided into factions—there is nothing that will do them more good than to come into intimate contact on equal terms.

Mr. President, I think that covers my description of the salient features of the bill.

Let me suggest once more that this bill sets up a military policy which emphasizes the dependence of the country upon the citizen soldier. It would not seem that such emphasis were necessary, in view of the history of our past wars. And as past wars have proved that it is the citizen soldier who must compose at least seven-eighths of the fighting Army of the United States, the Senate Committee on Military Affairs suggests that the citizen soldier be given a chance by his Government and his country to train himself and to organize with his fellows in his local community in such a way as that when he is compelled by circumstances to go into battle in defense of his country he will have a decent chance for his life.

Mr. NELSON and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question? Are the officers of the National Guard who are thus to be transferred and put under control of the Federal Government, as the Senator has so ably described, to be appointed by the governors of the States or by the President of the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are to be appointed by the President of the United States in this way: They must be primarily reserve officers, appointed by the President. If a reserve officer desires to become an officer of the National Guard of the United States, he assumes the additional obligation of obeying the commands of the governor of the State in which he lives, for the specific purposes set forth in the bill, and he accepts a commission from the governor secondary in importance to the commission which he has from the President, and reserve officers who are to officer the units of the National Guard of the United States stationed within a given State must be recommended by the governor of the State.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand it, if the Senator will allow me, the appointment of officers of State guards, or national militia, or whatever you might call it, is, under the Constitution, vested in the States and not in the Federal Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true to-day.

Mr. NELSON. Your plan, accofding to your statement, contemplates that these Federal Guard officers will have a double set of commissions; they will be commissioned first by the President of the United States, and, in the second place, they will have commissions from the governors of their States. Will not that lead to some embarrassment, and is not that contrary to the spirit of the Constitution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I think not. I think I can give instances to show how this is in line with the present practice. The Senator undoubtedly remembers that upon more than one occasion an officer of the Regular Army has in effect been loaned to a State and has accepted a commission as colonel of a State regiment. That has happened upon several occasions. I know that Col. Haskell, of the Regular service, who at the time of the Mexican border mobilization was a captain in the cavalry of the Regular Army, was permitted by the War Department to accept a commission as coloned of the Sixty-ninth New York Infantry. This bill is in line with that practice.

Mr. NELSON. That was by mutual consent of the War Department and the governor of the State or the State authorities?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and this is by mutual consent, likewise. That is what the bill provides—mutual consent. It is all voluntary. The reserve officer in the Army of the United States is a United States officer in the first instance, deriving his commission from the President. If Congress so authorizes, that officer can accept a secondary or subsidiary commission from the governor of a State and thereby assume an obligation permitted by the act of Congress itself. That is the idea.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from New York another question? The Senator speaks of the fine and creditable record of the New York division of the National Guard.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There were many others, too.

Mr. NELSON. It was a fine division and they deserve all the praise the Senator has given to them. Were all the officers of that division appointed by the governor of the State or were they appointed by the President? My understanding is they were all appointed by the governor of the State of New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Those who had been in the National Guard for any considerable length of time prior to the German war were so appointed, but they all lost their commissions in the National Guard as soon as they were drafted into the Federal Army. They came back and found themselves belonging to nothing because they were originally included in that absurd militia clause. They were all drafted at the outbreak of the German war under that provision of the national defense act; they had to be drafted, or they could not be sent out of the United States, because they were militiamen.

Mr. NELSON. That is, they were transferred from the State guard or the State militia and brought directly into the same category as the drafted men who had never been in the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly.

Mr. NELSON. And they then ceased to be members of the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and when they got back they found themselves belonging to nothing, their units broken up, and all their traditions gone. That is one of the most cruel experiences that could be inflicted upon brave soldiers.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KIRBY. Under the dual character of the National Guard as proposed, if the President appoints an officer—and he has the right clearly to appoint an officer—suppose the governor shall not consent and does not appoint the same officer, or does not appoint any officer, then the National Guard would become practically and exclusively under the control of the Government-appointed officer?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not under the terms of the bill.

Mr. KIRBY. That is the point I want to get at. The guardsman owes a duty both to the Government and to the State. If the President has the right to appoint an officer, and the governor may appoint an officer, too, and does not appoint the same officer or refuses to appoint any officer, it would be exclusively an organization in the Regular Army? Would it not amount to that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; there could not be any organization. The bill does not work that way.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have just received a letter from a man in my State who was a captain in the Army during the late war. I have not had time to examine the bill to see whether it covers the point to which he refers. There are some matters to which he refers and in which he gives page and section that do not appear in the Senate bill. So I am inclined to think he has gotten hold of the wrong bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He may have a copy of the House bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be. This is what he says:

> Veterans want to see State units organized and recognized. We think that in reorganizing the Army the first 10 divisions, numbered from 1 to 10, inclusive, should be assigned to the Regular Army. Then every State to have a division named for the State, such as the Washington Division; the Idaho Division; the Oregon Division, etc., the strength of the divisions would vary with the population.
> This gives 10 divisions to the Regular Army, 48 divisions to the States.

Is there anything along that line in the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill contemplates that very thing. The bill contemplates the reestablishment of the famous divisions that came out of this war. The bill invites the veterans of these famous divisions to "take on," as they say in the Army, for a year in the reserve. They will not have to do much but to get the old crowd together, and then around them will gather the young men who are trained and who will be assigned to those famous divisions. Out in the Senator's country I think one of the famous divisions was the Forty-first. Out in that section of the country, under the terms of the bill, the veterans of the Forty-first Division are invited to get together and take on for one year in the organized reserve. They will not have to do much; they are all trained men anyway, and they are only invited to do that in order to start the game. Then the young men who are trained from time to time in that part of the country are assigned to the famous old Forty-first Division, and that division will live down through history with its traditions, made up of citizen soldiers, all leading the lives of civilians in Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane, and other cities and towns in that great northwestern country.

Mr. THOMAS. I may suggest that the use of the names of the respective States for different divisions might prove very impracticable in the smaller States of the Union, since they would not be able to furnish a sufficient quota.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The matter of names of the units in this citizens' army, whether they be National Guard units or organized reserve units, the matter of their location, and all that sort of thing, are left to be determined by committees formed in different parts of the country, and on those committees must be a majority of veteran citizen officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does the bill provide that there shall be first a certain number of divisions of Regular troops?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not. It merely provides for 280,000 enlisted men.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This correspondent writes with reference to another provision regarding promotion, that he calls the promotion list, and he says:

In the Army bill section 24a provides for a promotion list. This section should be added.

I do not find any section 24a that covers the matter. So I assume he is referring to the House bill. However, he says:

In the Army bill section 24a provides for a promotion list; to this section should be added: "On declaration of war by the President of the United States all officers of the Regular Army up to the rank of lieutenant colonel shall be promoted one grade, such promotion to apply exclusively to officers on active duty at the time of the declaration of war. They shall then, after such promotion, occupy their proper number on the promotion list. All promotions on this list shall be made without discrimination between Regular Army, National Guard, and reserve officers, all officers regardless of the origin of their commissions being considered equal. No citizen shall be commissioned into the Army in time of war with a rank higher than that of major." If this section can not be added the bill affords no real protection to the National Guard and reserve officers. Please note that no civilian is to be commissioned at a higher rank than major.

Then he says, further on:

The Senate should see that section 24a is made a rigid rule in time of war, and that lines 17 to 20 in section 127a be stricken; 127a, lines 17 to 20, if allowed to stand, officers will be promoted temporarily from lieutenant to colonel under this clause. This clause is the "nigger in the woodpile," and, of course, is inserted at the end of the bill, where it has a very harmless appearance.

I would like to know whether there is anything like that in this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He is talking about a different woodpile. This is the Senate woodpile, and he is talking about the House woodpile.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senate woodpile has no provision of that kind in it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think this matter has been called to my attention before where it was claimed that under the bill a Regular Army officer, a lieutenant, for instance, could be promoted to a colonelcy outright, and I take it this is to cover and prevent anything of that sort. Is there anything in the Senate bill that, at the outbreak of war, permits a lieutenant, for instance, of the Regular Army to be promoted to a colonelcy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He can be given the temporary rank, but not the permanent rank.

Mr. JONES of Washington. A temporary rank as colonel?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no limit.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Or that of a brigadier general?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. In time of war that has always been the case.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know there is a good deal of opposition to that proposition because of the way it worked out in the last war, especially on the part of the guard organization and the citizen soldiers. It seems to me that the Senator ought to put something in the bill which would take care of a situation like that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator please give me his estimate of the cost of this system?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had hoped to have a chart large enough to be seen by the Senate, and that I could hang it on the rear wall of the Chamber, but it is not finished. I hope to have it here to-morrow or the next day, but I can give the Senator the approximate figures.

Mr. POMERENE. What I want particularly to know is the cost of the Army itself as constituted, plus the cost of the system of universal training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The permanent personnel of the Regulars, starting in the year 1921, with 18,000 officers and 280,000 men, will cost $503,000,000. I am going to give merely the round figures. At the end of six years, through which period it will suffer a reduction of 5 per cent a year for five years, it will cost $399,000,000. That is the permanent personnel reduced to 210,000 enlisted men and 16,200 officers six years from date.

Now, for the training. To train 100,000 men for four months in a military training camp will cost $26,000,000, and we will have approximately 500,000 to train in that way. That does not cover them all, but I just want to get that item. That will make in the neighborhoood of $135,000,000 per year. Then we estimate that 100,000 men will be trained annually in the National Guard. They will cost $42,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Will that expense be paid by the Federal Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the National Guard is going to be under the Federal Government in the matter of training for the first time.

Then there will be the men who serve in the National Guard in addition to those who are taking their training in the guard. Therefore the total estimated expense of the National Guard, which we figure will reach a maximum strength of 350,000 men, will be $124,000,000 per year. That, however, includes the $42,000,000. Now, if the Senator will add the $399,000,000 for the Regulars and the $135,000,000 for the four months' training camps——

Mr. POMERENE. But $399,000,000 is the cost after the expiration of six years, as I understand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. After six years; but it is the ultimate cost that we are working to.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's statement, as I understand, was that the first year's expense would be $503,000,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but there will not be any training expense then, because we shall not be able to train any men in the next year. I am speaking of the time when the training system gets in working order—when it is in full operation. Then the expense will be $399,000,000 for the Regulars, $135,000,000 for the four months' training, and $124,000,000 for the National Guard, and we shall have $654,000,000 as the total cost. That may be further reduced, Mr. President, I may say, if Congress thinks it wise.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think I saw a statement purporting to come from one of the House leaders some time ago to the effect that this plan would cost the Government about $1,250,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have never been able to get the authority for those figures.

Mr. POMERENE. And though I have read rather casually the report submitted by the minority, I find it gives the total figures as running about $1,314,000,000. I refer to page 19 of the report. I should like to have the Senator from New York explain why there is this very great difference in the estimated cost. What are the elements constituting this difference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will tell the Senator all I know about it. The figures presented by the committee were worked out after weeks of exhaustive effort in the offices of the General Staff in the War Department and with the assistance of the finance department under Gen. Lord. They have given us these figures after a long study, all based on present prices. They include, let me say, items such as these: The cost of transportation of the men to go to and return from training camps; the per diem allowance for subsistence of the men while in course of transportation; the cost of subsistence while undergoing training. Then, again, the cost of clothing while undergoing training; the cost of their laundry while undergoing training; the cost of medical attendance; the cost of the upkeep of quarters, and for heat and light; for equipment at an annual cost figured out in advance; and their pay as provided in the bill; then the extra cost for the additional 15 days which are permitted under the terms of the bill. Then the cost of administration through the local boards of registration in connection with the registration of these young men. That is all included. In fact, the estimates which we have are itemized with the greatest care and they have been presented to us as the very best figures the War Department can give us. I have given them to the Senator from Ohio. Where the Senator from Tennessee got his figures, I do not know, so that I can not explain the difference between the two estimates.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think it can be explained in this way: In all probability the young men whom we train will put in a claim for a bonus of $50 per month for service. That would run it up to the amount which is mentioned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I should like to ask a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement and then I will yield to the Senator. I merely wish to say that the basis of estimate that is contained in the minority report was obtained in this way: We estimated that the cost for the young men who go into the Army for four months would be just about the cost of keeping a regular soldier for the same length of time, and that is what it is going to cost. If there is any difference, to train the recruit for four months, to take him from his home and carry him back, it will cost more rather than less than to keep a soldier in the Army for the same length of time; in other words, the expenditure per man will be $600 for four months, estimating the cost of a soldier for a year as being $1,800, which is undisputed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely have to say that that is an utterly fallacious way to estimate the cost of anything.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether in the estimate which he has given there is taken into consideration the maintenance of the cantonments and camps?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is.

Mr. LENROOT. On what basis?

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the basis of the upkeep as estimated by the department.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not mean the running of the camps, but the depreciation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Maintenance and repairs are included in this estimate.

Mr. LENROOT. At 8 per cent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know at what percentage. Eight per cent of what?

Mr. LENROOT. I have not found from the testimony that that item has been included at all in the estimates, I may say to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I put the whole table in the RECORD some time ago, and one of the items was maintenance, repairs, and upkeep.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from New York know what the 16 cantonments cost the United States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not remember, Mr. President; but may I say to the Senator that the cantonments are not the only places that may be used for the purpose of traihing men?

Mr. LENROOT. We should have to use the present cantonments or build others.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; we should not have to build others.

Mr. LENROOT. Why not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have a large number of Army posts that can be used and Coast Artillery posts near great centers of population at which not a penny of money will have to be spent for extensions for the purpose of training troops as planned by the department. We would not have to use all the cantonments to their full capacity.

Mr. LENROOT. The plan contemplates using 16 of them, does it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not necessarily. The plan does not say what shall be used.

Mr. LENROOT. I was referring to the plan for universal training, submitted by the department; the plan as to how they should be trained. They would be put into 16 or 20 divisions, I think it was.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was in the original War Department bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that inevitable if we are going to have a system of universal training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely want to say, in connection with that, that the Government is now possessed of a tremendous establishment. Some of it, it is true, is of comparatively temporary construction, and the cost of maintenance and repair is much greater than that of permanent construction; but people are constantly thinking that the 16 cantonments are the only places which we possess where men may be trained; as a matter of fact, there are many other places. Right in the vicinity of New York City there are three or four—at least three—large Army posts which for purposes of training can take care of some thousands of men.

Mr. LENROOT. Permanent Army posts?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; and the coast fortifications. All the men who are going to be trained for the seacoast artillery can be trained at the present seacoast fortifications. Fortress Monroe could accommodate large numbers, and the forts at Boston, forts at the entrance of Long Island Sound, forts at San Francisco, including the Presidio, can take large numbers. It will not be necessary to use the wooden cantonments for all these men. Army posts, like Fort Sheridan outside of Chicago and Fort D. A. Russell in Wyoming, which are brigade posts, can accommodate a good many men and relieve the strain on the cantonments.

Mr. LENROOT. Fort Sheridan has been greatly enlarged and is now in the same position as a cantonment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; but before it was enlarged it was a large post.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think some of the largest cantonments, such as Camp Dix and some of the camps in the South, originally had a much better class of buildings than other camps, and they have been improved under subsequent appropriations, so that they contain a great many permanent improvements that could be utilized. If they had to be reconstructed under present conditions it would cost an extreme amount of money for such improvements, for instance, as roads, artesian wells, and the ordinary equipment of a cantonment. I think the Senator will find that there is an adequate number of these cantonments sufficiently well constructed to house the number of men annually that would be called out for training under this bill, and I do not think that the cost of repair will be excessive if the War Department assigns the men to be trained to those points. I have made no study of the cost of maintenance.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask either the Senator from New York or the Senator from New Jersey this question: Is it not true that with universal training we will not be able to abandon anything like the number of posts that we would be able to abandon if we did not have it?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; I do not think that we will.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, that will be a very heavy item of expense. Then I wish to ask the Senator from New York, on another branch of the matter, whether in the estimated cost of this system there has been taken into consideration and estimated for the equipment, the ordnance, the aeroplanes, and everything that will be necessary as a preparedness measure on the basis of an Army of 3,000,000 men?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In part, yes. And that brings up a rather interesting matter. If we do not have that material in time of peace, we will have to have it in time of war. So why not have it in time of peace and be ready for war? There is a great deal of it which will continue——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator does he, then, take the position, as to the equipment necessary to put an Army of 3,000,000 men into action, that in time of peace we shall be so prepared as to immediately go into war?

Mr. WADSWORTH. With that entire Army, no; I do not insist upon that. I do not think we would ever put such an army in the field.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, so far as preparedness is concerned, military training is not necessary except to such extent as we have equipment, artillery, ordnance, and everything that is necessary to put an army into action? It is not necessary except in so far as we provide those things.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. I speak from the preparedness standpoint; I am not speaking from other very important standpoints.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I want to be fairly understood. Men can not be trained without equipment.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no estimate here for heavy ordnance, for instance, in connection with universal training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not necessary to have an estimate for heavy ordnance, for we have over 5,000 pieces of such ordnance now.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes; but, as the Senator knows, perhaps in three years or five years that ordnance will be obsolete, as our airplanes are obsolete to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not know anything of the sort.

Mr. LENROOT. I say it may be obsolete. The Senator knows that is true as to airplanes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was speaking about ordnance. We have not any airplanes, anyway; so what is the use of talking about them?

Mr. NELSON. We ought to have a billion dollars worth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair.) Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York stated that the estimates of the minority as to the expense of universal military training were fallacious. With the exception of the pay of the Regular soldier and the pay of the man in training, as to which there is a difference, will the Senator object to explaining what other differences there are between the cost of training a man to be a soldier and in the cost of keeping a soldier after he is trained?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, Mr. President, I will.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the first place, the overhead is very much less. It does not require as many officers to train 100,000 young men as it does to command the same number of men in the Army of the United States, including the overhead. There is a tremendous difference there; and then, in addition, the training will take place at a time of the year in the different parts of the country when the buildings will not have to be heated to the same extent that the buildings in which the Regular Army lives the year round are heated; the heat and light bills will be much less in proportion per thousand of men trained—infinitely less.

The Senator has referred to the difference in pay. That difference is greater than appears upon its face. The men in training are to receive while taking the four months' training $5 per month. People are apt to compare that with $30 per month for the Regular soldier, but as a matter of fact the Regular soldier gets more than $30 per month on the average. The average pay of the Army will run closer to $38 per month or $40 per month, to say nothing of the pay of the officers. There are elements of that sort that work in.

If the Senator denies the substantial accuracy of the estimates made by Gen. Lord and the committee of the General Staff, after weeks of preparation, I wish he would point out the inaccuracies.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it is necessary to do that, for this reason: I have never seen any estimates that were not always exceeded by actual expenditures. We see that every day. That, however, is not what I rose to say. I wanted to ask the Senator this question:

Is it not a fact that the difference in the cost of just clothing a man four months of the year—or four months in three years, it would be—would more than account for the difference in the heat and light, for instance, and would not the increased cost of putting a man into service—his railroad fare into service and out of service every four months—be very much greater? When it comes to inducting him into the service for the three years or for just four months, my figures are based on the proposition that one-third of the admitted cost of maintaining a soldier is $600. My belief is that the cost of training a recruit for four months would be certainly as much as $600 and perhaps more. This is relatively the same as the cost of keeping the soldier.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This estimate includes the railway fares to and from the camps and all the clothing. That is all I can say.

Mr. McKELLAR. The answer to that is that it costs the Regular Army $1,800 a year, and, of course, for four months it would be $600.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 19 on page 2.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not know what the disposition of the Senate is in handling a bill of this size and length. I had anticipated asking that the bill be read first for committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New York if he will not let the bill go over until to-morrow? There are certain matters that I want to look into, and it is getting late now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not disposed to bring to the attention of the Senate and press for adoption any important amendments. There are some committee amendments printed in the bill, and there are quite a few that have been found necessary since the bill was reported, to correct errors and to fill in little places where the meaning of the language is not entirely clear. It will not involve anything in which the Senator from Tennessee is interested.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no desire whatever to delay the bill at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I assume, of course, that it will be read in full, with opportunity for offering amendments afterwards to the text.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be so made.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the desk three amendments to the pending bill that I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and printed and lie on the table.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. About how many officers will be required for handling the compulsory universal military training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That number has not been estimated separately from the others. As I explained in my remarks, the commissioned personnel of the Army are all put in one pool, and assigned to duty by the President and Secretary of War where they are most needed. I might give the Senator this comparison: The House bill provides for 17,200 officers. This bill provides for 18,000 officers. This bill also contemplates that number being reduced to 16,200, 1,000 less than the House, and still having the training.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understood that the House bill provided for the necessary officers for training, and that the House committee appointed a subcommittee to examine into the question of training so as to report a subsequent bill, and that the officers necessary for putting it in force another year would be on hand and already appointed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not aware that the House had provided in their bill for anything for military training. That may be so, but I was not aware of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have not. The House did not estimate for the cost of military training, but it did put in such a sufficient number of officers as would be able to take care of the military training when it was adopted, if it should be adopted another year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not aware of that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator states that no estimate has been made of the number of officers necessary to provide for the compulsory military training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, they are not definitely allocated in this bill. I have heard several different suggestions made as to the number of officers it would take to train 100 men, but it depends so largely upon the assistance in that training that is received from the enlisted strength itself and from reserve officers that it is almost impossible to make a definite and final estimate as to how many officers there must be in the training forces.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was going to inquire how you could possibly arrive, then, at 18,000 officers as the proper number.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, we have arrived at that number by taking 280,000 enlisted men, and, allowing for their normal organization into normal tactical units according to modern military practice, they will require 18,000 officers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; but the House bill, which is 20,000 larger in enlisted men, is nearly 1,000 officers less. How do you reconcile those figures?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Eight hundred officers less. I shall have to confess I have not examined all the different provisions of the House bill which would account for the difference in officers. I may say to the Senator that the difference in officers in its effect upon the cost of the bill is infinitesimal compared with the difference in enlisted men.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am rather surprised that no estimate has been made of the number of officers required for this important work of compulsory training. Certainly that is an item which has to be taken into account; and I can not understand the discrepancy between the two bills—why this bill, with a smaller enlisted personnel, should require 800 more officers.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that the number of officers, except medical officers, in the House bill is 15,030, and in the Senate bill it is 15,293.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the discrepancy between the two bills is almost wholly in medical officers?

Mr. WARREN. That makes no discrepancy. There is a difference here of about 250 men. That is the difference.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On the face of the estimates made, the Senate bill, with a smaller number of enlisted men by 20,000, has 800 more officers. Now, the Senator from Wyoming gives figures showing that there is little difference in the number of officers, exclusive of medical officers.

Mr. WARREN. There is a difference of about 250 in officers, aside from medical men, and I do not think there is very much difference in that line. They very nearly offset each other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, wherein does this difference of 800 officers consist?

Mr. WARREN. Where does the Senator get the figures of 800?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from New York gave the figures.

Mr. WARREN. I take the bill as it finally passed the House, and, as it lies before me here, the bill of the Senate; and unless I have made some error—and I have the particulars as to every grade right down through—the figures will be as I have given them. As to the medical officers, I have not estimated them, and there may be some difference there which, added to this, might enlarge the number.

Mr. McKELLAR. About 17,200 are provided for in the House bill and 18,000 in the Senate bill.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator means, including all of the medical officers?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a difference of 800. The House bill provides for 17,200 and the Senate bill for 18,000.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is difficult to calculate on the medical officers, because that is usually done by percentage of the number of enlisted men.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What I am trying to discover is what is the cause of the discrepancy between the House bill and the Senate bill? There certainly is a big discrepancy there. The Senate bill provides for a smaller Army than the House bill, and yet it provides for 800 more officers.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator must remember that they might make a difference in the computation as to what they would allow for the officers of each subdivision, such as the adjutants and quartermasters, and so forth, and, on the other hand, there is a certain number—a quite larger number—of extra officers, and I am not certain that that number is the same in the two cases. I have not investigated the matter that far, but it is not unusual that there might be that difference. Of course, in this bill undoubtedly the number has been made liberal enough to cover the details necessary for the training, and on the House side they provide also for officers' training and for officers to train officers, and so forth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does not the Senator think that if we were increasing the number of officers by 800 we ought to know where the increase comes and why it comes? Certainly we are in no condition to plunge into an unnecessary expense and not be able even to explain why it is done.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will take the figures as they appear in the bill and compare them, he will be able to discover that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am taking the figures given by the chairman of the committee. He states that his bill, as reported here, provides for 800 more officers than the House bill, although the House bill provides for an Army 20,000 larger than this bill. There must be some reason for that, and I was seeking, first, to ascertain whether the reason was to be found in the provision for compulsory training, and the Senator indicates that it is not to be found in that. Now, I ask, where is it to be found?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I did not quite indicate it that way. This bill, of course, as the Senator will see in reading it, does not allocate the numbers of officers to the combatant arms or to the training forces. If the Senator will be patient, to-morrow I will give him an estimate of the number of officers it is expected will be assigned by the President, when the times comes, to the training forces.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the question I expected to ask.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not give the Senator the information now. I can not lay my hand on the figures now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Those figures will be given to-morrow, I understand.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 8, page 4, the last paragraph read being as follows:

The reserve personnel shall include reserve officers, reservists, and recruits. The reserve officers shall include all persons who, on the date of the passage of this act, held commissions or appointments in the Reserve Officers' Corps or, subject to the provisions of section 62 of this act, in the National Guard, and such other persons who shall hereafter be commissioned or appointed therein as hereinafter provided for in this act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a correction to be made in that last paragraph, which might as well be made now. On page 4, line 4, the term "Reserve Officers' Corps" is used. The words "Reserve" and "Officers'" should be transposed, and it should read "Officers' Reserve Corps."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that change will be made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend also in line 5, on the same page, to strike out the words "section 62" and insert in lieu thereof "sections 45 or 64."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to the end of section 3, line 16, page 4.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the chairman of the committee with relation to the Officers' Reserve Corps, what is the number of officers now in that corps?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information is that there are about 60,000 officers who have accepted reserve commissions. Of course, the Senator will remember that they are not attached to any units or organizations. They have no commands anywhere. They have no reserve units to command, but they hold those commissions.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 5, line 18, page 5.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator from New York whether there is any limit anywhere in the bill upon the number of officers who may be assigned under the provisions of this and the preceding section?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only the limitations imposed by appropriation bills.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator, then, if there be no limitation in appropriation bills, there being certain lump-sum appropriations, whether there would be any limitation on their coming in with a deficiency?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My own opinion is that they have no right to create deficiencies in that way. The annual Army appropriation bill will state how much money can be paid to reserve officers serving temporarily with the permanent force.

Mr. LENROOT. That would be provided for separately?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it ought to be. I will say to the Senator that it is about the cheapest way to educate soldiers.

The reading of the bill was continued, and section 6 was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. The training forces: The training forces shall consist of such commissioned officers, enlisted men, and civilians of the permanent personnel and such reserve officers and reservists as may consent to serve for limited periods under regulations to be established by the President as shall be required to train and provide for the recruits called out annually for military training, and, together with the recruits so called out, shall be organized into such training units as the President may direct in accordance with the requirements of the service: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the assignment of such of the permanent or reserve personnel of the training forces as the President may direct in accordance with the requirements of the service to units of the National Guard of the United States to train or to assist in the training of reservists enlisted in such units as hereinafter provided: Provided further, That until the system of military training hereinafter provided for shall become effective, the President is hereby authorized to organize the training forces into such units as he may direct and to employ such units in accordance with the requirements of the service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a sentence was left out of the section just read, which it was the full intention of the committee to insert. It has been suggested that if it is inserted it would make the meaning entirely clear, in connection with other provisions of the bill, and so I offer the amendment with that idea in mind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 6, line 9, after the word "provided," insert:

But no officer of the permanent or reserve personnel assigned to a unit of the National Guard of the United States under the provisions of this section shall command such units unless assigned to such command with the approval of the governor of the State concerned, as provided in section 64 of this act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We believe that that really is covered by section 64 and other provisions, but this makes it absolutely clear.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that finishes section 6. I understand that an executive session is desired, and I am perfectly willing to yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 6, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 5, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Eternal God our Father, for that push from within which has ever been moving Thy children onward and upward to a larger conception of Thee, of life and its eternal values.

O sometimes gleams upon our sight,
Through present wrong, the eternal Right;
And step by step, since time began,
We see the steady gain of man.

Through the harsh noises of our day
A low sweet prelude finds its way;
Through clouds of doubt and creeds of fear
A light is breaking calm and clear.

So we pray that that push may continue until the song of angels shall be heard and the light of heaven shine in every man's heart; that selfishness, greed, profiteering, and unholy discontent shall pass away; fatherhood, brotherhood, reign supreme, through the spiritual leadership of Thy son Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 1, 1920, was read and approved.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. CANNON reported the bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, together with the accompanying report, ordered printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I give notice at this time that at the earliest opportunity, considering business pending or to be pending before the House, I shall call the bill up for consideration.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4173. An act to amend section 69 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1918; and

S. 1699. An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) to readmit Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten to the status and provileges of a citizen of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 12711) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1699. An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

S. 4173. An act to amend section 69 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1918; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution authorizing the Department of Commerce to participate in the National Marine Exposition to be held in New York in April, 1920; and

S. J. Res. 134. Joint resolution to readmit Augusta Louise de Haven-Alten to the status and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. To-day is unanimous-consent day, and the Clerk will call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

AQUEDUCT BRIDGE, POTOMAC RIVER.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10328) to amend an act approved May 18, 1916, entitled "An act to provide for the removal of what is known as the Aqueduct Bridge, across the Potomac River, and for the building of a bridge in the place thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11307) to amend section 5146 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to the qualifications of directors of the National Banking Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS PEARL RIVER, MISS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11877) granting the consent of Congress to Madison and Rankin Counties, in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across the Pearl River between Madison and Rankin Counties.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Madison and Rankin Counties, State of Mississippi, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Pearl River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of said bridge being in Madison County and the other in Rankin County, State of Mississippi, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "Mississippi," insert the words "at or near Meeks Ferry."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLLIER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, ILLINOIS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10187) to change the place of holding the United States district court for the western division, northern district of Illinois, and for maintaining the clerk's office therein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. It is not in the form which the committee has followed in reporting similar bills, and it should be materially amended so as to provide for amending the Judicial Code.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to amend the section of the Judicial Code?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that has been the practice of the committee, and this was inadvertently reported in this form.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman wishes to do so, that could be done by amendment to the bill on the floor.

Mr. WALSH. I prefer to have it done in the other way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill may be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CHALMETTE NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5918) with reference to a national park on the plains of Chalmette, below the city of New Orleans.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not see the gentleman from Louisiana present who answered some questions in respect to this the other day.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REQUIRING CEREMONIAL MARRIAGE IN GRANTING OF CIVIL-WAR PENSIONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12012) concerning the administration of the pension laws with respect to pensions of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and the widows of such persons.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get some information respecting the bill from the chairman of the committee. This bill was discussed some time ago with very intelligent observations by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], particularly with reference to section 2 of the bill.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, this bill is reported in different form from the committee. There is a committee amendment which covers the objection then made, which amendment provides that there must have been a ceremonial marriage in addition to cohabitation for the period of seven years.

Mr. GARD. Then the committee proposes to amend the bill by inserting on page 2 a provision requiring ceremonial marriage. Is that the amendment the gentleman refers to?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I presume the purpose of that amendment is not to leave the section open to the imputation that what is known as a common-law marriage would be sufficient.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. GARD. I think it is very proper that we should include in the bill a provision for a ceremonial marriage. But if you do that in the form in which it now is you make the bill, on page 2, after the word "claimant," read "lived and cohabited with the soldier, sailor, or marine for a period of seven years or more." If there be a ceremonial marriage, why is it necessary that she should live with the soldier, sailor, or marine seven years or more?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Perhaps there ought to be an amendment as to the length of time of cohabitation. I do not know that there should be a limitation, but that was in the original bill.

Mr. GARD. The original bill was intended to provide that a practical recognition of marriage would be sufficient to establish the fact that they were married. Unfortunately that might be characterized by some as a mere common-law marriage. I think the ceremonial amendment which the gentleman proposes to put in the bill is a proper amendment, but I call attention to the additional language that, notwithstanding the ceremonial marriage, you have the requirement that they shall live together seven years and have been recognized as man and wife all that time. If the marriage was ceremonial it seems to me that there should be no limitation needed to establish the claim of widowhood.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It was not intended that they should be required to live together for seven years if there was other proof establishing a legal marriage; but it is difficult to prove a marriage or divorce that took place 40 or 50 years ago, and the bill proposes to do away with the necessity for making such proof to establish legal widowhood.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman if this condition might not arise, that if you have a ceremonial marriage the ceremonial marriage might take place to-day and a separation the next day, and then the widow would have a pensionable status?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That could not occur under this bill.

Mr. GARD. The old law provided that the marriage must have taken place before a certain time, which had the purpose of making the marriage more than a mere form of marriage, which the gentleman from Texas very properly calls attention to.

Mr. BEE. Suppose the marriage was one which is commonly denominated a forced marriage. The widow would be pensioned for the rest of her life by a marriage forced upon the soldier not necessary to detail. It occurred to me that there ought to be a limitation of time in which the woman would be entitled to claim a pension beyond the mere fact that a ceremony was performed.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have just read the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois will recall the objection I made at a prior time. I understand it is the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois to offer an amendment that in order to prove widowhood it shall be necessary to establish a ceremonial marriage. With that understanding, I shall not object. I agree with the observation, however, of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that if that amendment is offered it will be unnecessary to have this language in the bill which requires the husband and wife to live together for a certain number of years.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I may be in error, but it was my understanding that the committee amendment should have been "was ceremonially married to or."

Mr. BLACK. If that is the understanding, I should object to the bill, because that would take in a common-law marriage.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The amendment proposed by the committee is as I have stated, and requires that there must have been a ceremonial marriage as well as cohabitation.

Mr. BLACK. I believe that would be placing a more burdensome condition than ought to be placed, and I do not insist on that language, but if I understand that you are to make this a mere ceremonial marriage I should object because that would be a recognition of a common-law marriage.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman think it desirable to carry any term of years as to which the husband and wife must live together. This carries the term of seven years. That seems to me too long.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I do not think it was the intention that they must live and cohabit for seven years, but that that would be sufficient. I do not think it would prevent granting a pension to anyone legally married. But this does away with the rule of the Pension Department that they must have been legally married according to the laws of the State where they reside.

Mr. GARD. But here you propose to say that they must have been ceremonially married and lived together for seven years. If they did not establish the fact that they were ceremonially married, but that they had lived together seven years, it would not be sufficient proof, as I take it.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. No; it would not. There would have to be a ceremonial marriage, in addition to living together as husband and wife.

Mr. GARD. And they would have to live together seven years——

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The bill would do away with the proof now required by the bureau, which is that they must have been legally married, and that there was no impediment to such marriage. It is almost impossible for a widow to prove the divorce or death of a former wife 50 years or more ago.

Mr. GARD. I think it is too great a burden to require them to prove that they lived together seven years.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It is not intended to do that.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that he should offer an amendment making it two years?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I will accept an amendment of that kind, or without any limitation whatever—simply show that they have been ceremonially married.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. I think there ought to be a limitation as to time in which they have lived together.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman be willing to amend by making it two years?

Mr. BEE. I believe I shall be impelled to object if it is limited to seven years. I would not object to five.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Five would cover any possible case where there is now a claim for a pension, because they are not pensionable unless married before June 27, 1905.

Mr. BEE. I shall not object.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I think it would be hardly fair to the widows who under existing law are denied a pension because they were not married previous to June 27, 1905, whereas the Fuller bill, pending in the Senate, raises the limit to 1915.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Make this five years and it will be all right. This bill would not change existing law where legal widowhood was otherwise proved. It only waives the necessity of requiring proof that no impediment existed at the time of the marriage.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I hardly think it is right or fair to treat widows having established marriage relations to soldiers better than widows who were legally married, but are barred by reason of the law.

Mr. BEE. I do not think so, either. I will not object if they make it five years.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule that it will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws in claims for pension of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and in claims for pensions of widows of such persons, the term honorable discharge shall be held to mean an honorable discharge from the latest service during said war, and such honorable discharge, the service having been for 90 days or more, shall be held to be an honorable discharge from any former service, during said war, in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States.

SEC. 2. That in any claim for pension by any person claiming to be the widow of a person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War it shall constitute sufficient proof of widowhood to establish by competent testimony that the claimant lived and cohabited with the soldier, sailor, or marine, on account of whose service she claims, for a period of seven years or more and continuing until his death, during all that time being recognized as the wife of the soldier, sailor, or marine: Provided, That there is no other person claiming to be the legal widow of the soldier, sailor, or marine.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following committee amendment: Page 2, line 7, after the word "claimant," insert the following: "Was ceremonially married to and."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, after the word "claimant," insert "was ceremonially married to and."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Does the gentleman offer that in lieu of the committee amendment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer a further amendment. Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "seven" and insert the word "five."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FULLER of Illinois, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INQUIRY INTO COMBED COTTON YARN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. Res. 451) requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make certain inquiries into the prices of combed cotton yarn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I make the reservation of the objection to this resolution for the purpose of learning first if it comes from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with a unanimous report?

Mr. WINSLOW. It does, after a hearing.

Mr. GARD. What hearings were had on the bill? How extensive were the hearings had under the bill?

Mr. WINSLOW. One hearing.

Mr. GARD. One hearing?

Mr. WINSLOW. One hearing.

Mr. GARD. I note that the communication made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] very frankly states:

> As I stated to the committee on yesterday, I do not anticipate that any action you may take upon this resolution or that Congress may take as a result of your recommendation will of itself materially change or affect the condition complained of. Neither will an investigation by the Federal Trade Commission or any possible proceeding on the part of the Government itself prevent profiteering or bring down the high cost of living, but I do hope that by reason of all these several activities a certain amount of publicity may be given and public opinion aroused, which, after all, is the most potent factor in a self-governing community.

So it seems to me there is very little to be gained by the proposed legislation, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who I know can inform the House, of the necessity and proposed benefit from this joint resolution?

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, the committee, after a hearing on the joint resolution introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], came to the conclusion, regardless of whatever he may have said to them, that the evidence ought not to be overlooked. The public should have the benefit of an investigation of the claim which he set forth. I believe I am not incorrect in stating that the committee was of a mind that a demonstration could be easily made of the fact that the prices of cotton yarns have been advanced all out of proportion to the price of raw cotton. Further, they concluded that if this was one of many possible instances where unusually high prices were being charged for commodities it was well worth while for the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and know the facts in order that they may establish here one instance where an extremely high rate of profit was probably being made on an article of general consumption.

Mr. GARD. The committee thought this, with other bills of like character, would create at least a public sentiment of protest which may knock old high cost of living on the head.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think the idea of the committee was that the evidence seemed to be so reasonable and so well founded that an investigation would be valuable and would be worth while, that the public generally might know whether or not in this instance excessive profits were being made.

Mr. WELLING. Was an inquiry made of the Federal Trade Commission as to when they could begin this inquiry?

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman refers to the committee?

Mr. WELLING. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. Not as far as I know.

Mr. WELLING. I happen to know the Federal Trade Commission was directed last fall to investigate the price of sugar and the report of that investigation had not yet reached the point where it could be acted upon, and I am wondering if they have the force to go ahead and make an investigation in time to do any good.

Mr. WINSLOW. Really, I am not prepared to answer the question. It is to be hoped they can attend to this business.

Mr. SIMS. Reserving the right to object, although I do not expect to do so, I wish to say that I am a member of the committee and was present when the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] offered the resolution and made a statement of facts as to the necessity for the investigation provided in the resolution, and I want to say that I never heard a stronger presentation made in support of what many cotton growers have already claimed, to the effect that the manufactured product from cotton was extremely high in proportion to the cost of the raw material. The gentleman from Connecticut showed that during a period, I think, of six months the advance in cotton out of which cotton yarn is manufactured was relatively small, almost inconsiderable compared to the advance in the price of cotton yarns during the same period, showing clearly that the contention of cotton growers is true—that the spinners have always made a profit out of all proportion to the cost of raw cotton. It will not take the Federal Trade Commission very long to show that the cost of cotton out of which cotton yarn is manufactured is relatively very low compared with the prices of cotton goods. There is not a bit of doubt that cotton mills, so far as the cost of cotton is concerned, have not been embarrassed or hampered in the slightest, and that they have made wonderful profits during the time that the cotton has been high by reason of getting a much higher price for the yarn or the manufactured product than is warranted by the cost of the material. I hope no gentleman, especially from the cotton-growing States, will have the slightest objection to the passage of this resolution. I want to compliment the author of it. He comes from New England, and he is showing that he does not want to stand in the way of presenting the facts, even when his own constituents, or some of them, may be shown to be making a pretty large profit so far as they are concerned. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of the resolution and that it will be passed by a unanimous vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 451.

> Whereas the prices of combed cotton yarns have increased several hundred per cent during the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, more than 100 per cent of which was during the last six months of the year 1919; and
> Whereas this increase has been greatly in excess of the increase of the cost of the raw cotton and the labor entering into the manufacture of such yarns and can not therefore be attributed to such increases: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby requested to inquire into the increase in the price of combed cotton yarns during the years 1914 to 1919, inclusive, and especially during the last six months of the year 1919; to ascertain the cause or necessity for and the reasonableness of such increase; to ascertain the difference between the increase in the price of the yarn on the one hand and the increase in the cost of raw cotton and the labor entering into the cost of the manufacture of such yarn and to report to the House at the earliest practicable date the result of the investigation, together with such recommendations as the commission may deem advisable and proper.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

> Page 2, line 5, after the word "investigation," strike out the words: "together with such recommendations as the commission may deem advisable and proper."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TILSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SANDPOINT, IDAHO, WATER-SUPPLY SYSTEM.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9702) granting certain lands to the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, to protect the watershed of the water-supply system of said city.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I note from a reading of the report on this bill that the proposition is to authorize the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, to purchase some 2,846.34 acres of land located in four townships, as a protection of the water supply of the city of Sandpoint, which has a population of approximately 5,000 people, this purchase at an agreed price of $1.25 per acre. I note further that the same gentleman has another bill, possibly two other bills, one for the village of Downey, which provides for the purchase of something like 100 acres of watershed, I believe. I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to why so large a tract as 2,846 acres of land is necessary to protect the watershed to secure water from creeks known as Sweitzer Creek and Little Sand Creek?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. In the case of the bill authorizing the sale of land to the city of Downey, to which reference is made, there are 640 acres required instead of 100 acres, as suggested by the gentleman. In the vicinity of Sandpoint the country is less mountainous, and for that reason the watershed is larger and more land is required as a basin for the water supply. The proposed reservoir for the village of Downey is situated in the mountain and covers a smaller area and not nearly so much land is required. It is because of the difference in the topography of the country that less land is required for Downey than Sandpoint.

Mr. GARD. Is that watershed of 2,800 acres necessary for the city of Sandpoint?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. GARD. How far is the watershed from the city of Sandpoint?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I think in the neighborhood of 12 miles, and the country up there is more level than down in the southern section, where the village of Downey is located.

Mr. GARD. Does the acreage in question take in all the territorial limits of Sandpoint to the watershed?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No.

Mr. GARD. What means of access is there from the watershed to Sandpoint?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The water comes down in the natural channel to the reservoir near the city.

Mr. GARD. What is the name of the channel?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not recall just the name.

Mr. GARD. It comes down the Little Sand Creek or Sweitzer Creek. How does it come?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It comes down from both creeks, according to the statement contained in the bill and in the report.

Mr. GARD. Is there an artificial flume created or does it come down through the natural course?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It comes down through a natural channel near to Sandpoint, where it is delivered to the city through pipe lines.

Mr. GARD. Has the channel any name?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Sand Creek and Sweitzer Creek. Those creeks come together near the city of Sandpoint.

Mr. GARD. And from these creeks the water is diverted into the reservoir?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. How far is the reservoir from the city of Sandpoint?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am not able to say. This is in my colleague's district, and I am not very well acquainted regarding the location of the reservoir there, but I presume it is within a few miles.

Mr. GARD. I do not want to stand in the way of affording an ample supply of pure, clean, fresh water to the people of any community. I would suggest, however, an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "issue," inserting the words "in his discretion."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The amendment will be accepted, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9702) granting certain lands to the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, to protect the watershed of the water-supply system of said city.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue patent to the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, for certain public lands in the Sand Creek and Sweitzer Creek Basins for the protection of the watersheds furnishing the water supply for the said city, the lands being described as follows: Lots 6, 7, and the south half of the north half of section 4; lots 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and the south half of the north half of section 5; lots 1, 2, 3, and 8 in section 6, all in township 57 north, range 2 west, Boise meridian; also lots 3, 4, 5, 7, and 8 in section 2, township 57 north, range 3 west, Boise meridian; also the east half of section 34, the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 28; the west half of the southwest quarter and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 28; the east half of the southeast quarter, the east half of the northeast quarter, the northwest quarter of the northeast quarter, the east half of the northwest quarter, the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and lot 1 in section 30; the south half of the southwest quarter, the north half of the northwest quarter of section 20; the east half of the southeast quarter of section 18, all in township 58 north, range 2 west, Boise meridian; also all of section 36 (unless this be school land); the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 35, all in township 58 north, range 3 west, Boise meridian.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "That," insert "the city of Sandpoint, Idaho, is hereby authorized to purchase, and."

In line 9, after the word "six," insert the word "and," and after the word "seven," strike out the word "and."

In line 10, after the word "the," where it first occurs, strike out the words "north half" and insert the words "northwest quarter and the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter."

On page 2 strike out all of lines 18, 19, 20, and 21 and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the said conveyance shall be made upon the payment by said city for lands purchased at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the conveyance hereby authorized shall not include any lands which at the date of the issuance of patent shall be covered by a valid existing bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found on the lands so granted and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: And provided further, That said city shall not have the right to sell or convey the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described; and if the said land shall not be used for such municipal purpose, the same, or such parts thereof not so used, shall revert to the United States; the conditions and reservations herein provided for shall be expressed in the patent: And provided further, That the grant herein is made upon the express condition that within 30 days of the receipt of any request therefor from the Secretary of the Interior, the mayor of said city shall submit to the said Secretary of the Interior a report as to the use made of the land herein granted the city, during the preceding period named in such request showing compliance with the terms and conditions stated in this act, that in the event of his failure to so report or in the event of a showing in such report to the Secretary of the Interior that the terms of the grant have not been complied with, the grant shall be held to be forfeited, and the Attorney General of the United States be instructed to institute suit in the proper courts for the recovery of said lands."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment as it appears in section 2 by inserting, on line 23 of page 2, after the word "of," at the end of the line, the words "not less than." I do that, Mr. Speaker, because I realize that $1.25 per acre is what is called the agreed minimum price. I should think that should not be less than the arbitrary price.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 2, line 23, after the word "of," at the end of the line, insert "not less than."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the amendment. That $1.25 is the usual price.

Mr. GARD. That is the minimum?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is the price at which public land of this character is sold. I have no objection to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "issue," to insert the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 5, after the word "issue," insert "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 82, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3813) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain, between the towns of Shoreham, Vt., and Ticonderoga, N. Y.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill,

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the reason for the committee amendment, in line 6, striking out the word "railroad." Is this to be a joint railroad and highway bridge?

Mr. ESCH. No. We have made it the practice in the committee not to designate the character of the bridge, because that would be left anyhow to the Chief of Engineers in administering the general bridge act.

Mr. WALSH. In fact, it will be a railroad bridge?

Mr. ESCH. Yes. It is really a reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Addison Railroad Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the States of Vermont and New York, its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across Lake Champlain, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between the town of Shoreham, in the State of Vermont, and the town of Ticonderoga, in the State of New York, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 1, line 6, strike out the word "railroad."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The Senate bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

VILLAGE OF DOWNEY, STATE OF IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11004) to grant certain lands to the village of Downey, State of Idaho, for the protection of its water supply.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I notice that this bill makes a grant subject to the legal rights heretofore acquired. Are there legal rights heretofore acquired that are subject to this grant?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No. There are no legal rights heretofore acquired, but a gentleman by the name of Day attempted to have this land designated under the 640-acre homestead law; but that attempt on his part did not give him any right or claim to the land. Later the Secretary of the Interior withdrew the land from entry in order to protect the water supply of this village of Downey. There are no legal rights or claims to this land.

Mr. WALSH. What was that language in the bill intended to safeguard?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is the usual phraseology of bills of this character. There are no rights there, so far as I know, and no one is attempting to get any except the individual I have mentioned.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman state that this first proviso, which is found at the top of page 2, is the usual language carried in bills of this sort?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is my understanding; that it is the usual phraseology in legislation of this character.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the gentleman would have no objection to an amendment in line 11 of page 1, after the word "of," to insert the words "not less than," the same as was carried in the previous bill as an amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As I remarked to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] when the other bill was being considered, I have no objection to that amendment. It will not do any harm. The $1.25 is the usual price for land sold by the Government to towns and villages that desire to use it for water supply purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but the price of Government land, when we are practically giving it away, is one of the few things which have not advanced. The price has not changed in 30 years.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. We are not giving the land away.

Mr. WALSH. We are giving it away for $1.25 an acre.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Over a thousand people are to be benefited, as the bill provides a reservoir site for water for their village.

Mr. WALSH. That is all right. Other cities have to buy at the market price.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; they do not, except where they buy from individuals.

Mr. WALSH. I say other cities that are not so fortunately situated as to have Government land in the vicinity that they can get for little or nothing have to purchase at the market price, and it would seem that perhaps some of these cities ought to be able and willing to pay the Government more than $1.25 an acre for land. If this is particularly valuable land for Government purposes, I thought with these words included they might be willing to pay a little more.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The people who are attempting to build up the western country and establish homes and communities are a good deal less able to pay for land than people living in the more populous and prosperous sections of the country.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes——

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. And the Government is not being injured by selling this land to them at this price or even giving it away.

Mr. WALSH. I doubt, however, if that is the class of people who are building up the great West. There may be a few of them.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. You do not find the prosperous people leaving this section of country to go out West. Most of the people who go West are those who go there to better their condition.

Mr. WALSH. The prosperity of those people is pretty well known and recognized. They are prosperous, thrifty people.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They are thrifty, undoubtedly.

Mr. WALSH. And they have built up a great country and are doing it. Now, it would seem that if the land which is sought to be granted to them may have some peculiar value for other governmental activities, they ought to be willing to pay for it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It has been the policy of the Government for the last hundred years to give public land to people who want to make homes upon it, and here we propose to pay for the land in order that the people living in the village of Downey may have the benefit of an uncontaminated source of water supply.

Mr. WALSH. If we should listen to some of these gentlemen it would continue to be the policy of the Government for the next hundred years to give away the land that it owns.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If they make homes on it, yes.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is time that policy was changed a little.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice that in lines 10 and 11 the area described is referred to as 160 acres. I will ask the gentleman from Idaho if there are not more than 160 acres described.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I think there is a mistake in the bill in that regard.

Mr. MONDELL. There are much more than 160 acres described.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The amount is 640 acres.

Mr. MONDELL. Then it seems to me it will be necessary to amend the words "160 acres" in line 10, page 1.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; it will be necessary to amend that. I thought it had been amended.

Mr. WALSH. The first class in fractions will stand up.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will allow me, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I do not know that the particular form of this grant is important, but I should hope that the Committee on the Public Lands would not get in the habit of passing bills containing grants in this language. I think it would be necessary to set forth in the patent all the language beginning with line 11, page 1, down to line 13, page 2, in order to describe the character of the transfer. I do not recall the use of just that language in any transfer that we have ever made heretofore. It is not a fee. It is not even a fee conditioned on use. It is a fee conditioned on use and conditioned on prior claims, and it goes to patent notwithstanding a prior claim, and a tract covered by a prior claim might go to patent with a fee and still leave this patent covering the land to which such unconditional patent was issued. It is a very peculiar form, and as a general practice I would not say that it was a good form. I do not know but what it is all right to use it in this particular case.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is the language of other bills of this character.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think we have ever made just such a transfer as this, beginning with the good old words "to have and to hold," and providing that the grant shall be expressed in a patent but shall be subject to existing legal rights. We ordinarily make a grant of all the lands within a certain area, excepting from them those to which some legal right may be found to have attached; but this is a patent of the entire area described, with the provision that the grant shall be subject to other legal rights. In other words, if there is any of this land held under a title that can not be defeated by this legislation, eventually a patent would issue to that tract notwithstanding this grant, and it creates a confusing condition in patents.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I think one reason this amendment was suggested was because of the fact that occasionally land reverts because it is not used for the purpose for which it was intended to be used when conveyed by the Government.

Mr. MONDELL. I was not referring to the limitation on the use contained in the second proviso. I have reference to the first proviso that limits the grant; that is, it is a grant made subject to the legal rights that may have been acquired, but it is a grant nevertheless. If the language used had been "hereby grant all of this described land except land to which legal rights have attached," then the situation would be very different, and the patent when it issued would have described only the land to which there was no legal right. The question of the legal right would be determined before the patent was issued. In this case the patent could issue at once to this entire area, and then later, under the terms of the first proviso, the claimant holding a legal right which attached prior to the enactment of this legislation could assert and through that right secure a patent.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Strike out that proviso. I will accept such an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would be better to have the first proviso stricken out, because if there are legal rights there they could not be affected by any grant we make. We could not grant land to which a legal homestead right had attached. We might presume and assume to do it, but we have not the power to do it.

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, it seems to me that this bill is not properly safeguarded, and I am glad to have the word of the gentleman from Wyoming about the matter. I note, in addition to that already mentioned, that the Sandpoint bill that we passed had a proviso that there was reserved to the United States all of the coal, oil, and other mineral deposits. There is no such a reservation in this bill. When we had the Sandpoint bill up the gentleman told me on inquiry that the Downey bill was for 640 acres, and yet in the bill it carries 160 acres.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The land described aggregated 640 acres, and that is a mistake in the bill making it 160 acres.

Mr. GARD. I think the bill should be rereferred.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no occasion for sending it back to the committee.

Mr. GARD. There are several amendments that ought to be made besides the reservation for the protection of the mineral deposits.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Those amendments can be offered from the floor. There is no possibility of any oil being on this mountain top.

Mr. GARD. I know nothing personally about the country; have never been there and am in entire ignorance about it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am willing to accept the amendment reserving the oil and mineral deposits.

Mr. GARD. Did the gentleman accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts about the minimum cost of $1.25 per acre?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Did the gentleman also agree to an amendment after the word "directed," in line 4, "in the discretion," page 1?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; I will accept that amendment.

Mr. GARD. And it is intended to correct the 160 acres, making it 640 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. PARRISH. No, Mr. Speaker; the gentleman from Ohio has covered the suggestion I was about to make as to oil and gas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the village of Downey, in the county of Bannock and State of Idaho, the northeast quarter, north half southwest quarter, southeast quarter, section 8, west half southwest quarter and northwest quarter, section 9, in township 11 south, of range 38 east, Boise meridian, in said county and State, containing 160 acres, in consideration of $1.25 per acre, to have and to hold said lands for the protection and promotion of the water supply and waterworks system of said city: Provided, That the grant hereby made is, and patent issued thereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises or any part thereof and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States: Provided further, That the lands hereby authorized to be conveyed as hereinbefore set forth, and all portions thereof, shall be held and used by or for the said grantee for the purpose herein specified; and if the said lands shall cease to be so used they shall revert to the United States, and this condition shall be expressed in the patent to be issued under the terms of this act.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "the," insert the words "board of trustees of the."

": And provided further, That the grant herein is made upon the express condition that, within 30 days of the receipt of any request therefor from the Secretary of the Interior, the chairman of the board of trustees of said village shall submit to the said Secretary of the Interior a report as to the use made of the land herein granted to the village during the preceding period named in such request showing compliance with the terms and conditions stated in this act; that in the event of his failure to so report or in the event of a showing in such report to the Secretary of the Interior that the terms of the grant have not been complied with, the grant shall be held to be forfeited, and the Attorney General of the United States be instructed to institute suit in the proper courts for the recovery of said lands."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to grant certain lands to the board of trustees of the village of Downey, State of Idaho, for the protection of its water supply."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word to get some information from the gentleman from Idaho. What is the difference between issuing a patent to the village of Downey and authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the village of Downey certain land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not know that there is any difference, simply the choice of words.

Mr. WALSH. In the Sandpoint bill we directed the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the city of Sandpoint for certain public lands. In this bill you authorize him to convey to the board of trustees certain public lands.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The Sandpoint bill was introduced by my colleague and is in different phraseology, but it means the same thing.

Mr. WALSH. I think the usual phraseology in this class of bills is that the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue a patent to the board of trustees of the village of Downey for the northeast quarter, and so forth. That is the language used in this class of bills. I wondered if the gentleman would have any objection to modifying the language in that respect.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. No; it means the same thing.

Mr. WALSH. But we usually authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent when we are getting rid of land in this way. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, line 4, page 1. I will wait until after the committee amendments are agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment.

The first committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the second committee amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, page 3, line 2, strike out the period after the word "lands" and insert a colon and the following words: "Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found on the land so granted and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 3, line 2, after the word "land" strike out the period and insert a colon and add the following: "Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found on the land so granted and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. The matter of these western lands is one that I have given considerable thought to as regards the proposition that they are liabilities instead of assets to the United States Government. The sooner the Government makes an express grant of all these so-called public lands, within the boundaries of the several States in the western country, to the States wherein they lie, the better off the people of the United States will be. I am informed that when we undertake to sell some of these lands the cost and expense of disposing of them far exceed the sale price, and the quicker we get rid of the land the better off the Treasury will be.

We have coal and oil lands out there and when they are subjected to lease disposition the people in those communities get the benefit of them and the Government of the United States never gets any return for them. The rentals derived are absorbed by cost of maintenance and expenses of sale. The quicker we dispose of them by donation, by granting them in fee simple absolute, and without conditions of reversion, the better off we are going to be. Therefore I oppose the amendment offered by my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I feel that an absolute gift to the States—if they can be induced to accept the gift—is the thing to do. I am even opposed to the covenant providing for a defeasance, the terms being that if the land shall not be used for the purpose for which the grant is made there shall be a reversion back to the Government. The quicker we dispose of all these lands the better off this country will be. The cost of maintaining the so-called forest reserves, which in many cases are mountains that are as bleak and as barren as any that ever existed, is money that is thrown away. Men are employed from month to month and year to year fighting fires, building roads, doing police work, surveying, prospecting for minerals, protecting game, exterminating bugs and grubs, looking up bootleggers, and at the same time taking out of the coffers of the Government of the United States not only thousands but millions of dollars. The sooner this kind of business is ended the better off we will be. I am in favor of the great bill to give the Western States everything. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio in this respect. I do not know a thing about the situation with respect to the water for this town, but I am advised that there is a reservoir there, and we are reserving the mineral and oil rights to the United States, with the express provision that any man can go in there and prospect. Of what value is that reservoir or of what value is this land as a water supply for this city if some man can go in and dig an oil well? I do not believe in doing anything in that way. I believe there ought to be a grant giving this land to this city for water purposes unreservedly, with an express provision that it can not be prospected for oil or minerals.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be a reservation in case it is abandoned as a water reservoir that it shall revert to the Government?

Mr. BEGG. That is already in the bill.

Mr. BEE. That the gentleman does not object to?

Mr. BEGG. No; but this amendment expressly provides that I or any other person can go in there and prospect and dig around and do anything I want to under the pretense that I am prospecting for minerals or oil. Let us assume that I do strike oil. You will have absolutely ruined the water supply for a city of a thousand people, and there will be more people come to that city as time goes on.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman know that the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] himself sponsored a bill containing this same thing for a city of 5,000 people?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The bill to which the gentleman refers was introduced by my colleague [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. GARD. It is in the same territory.

Mr. BEGG. Whether it is in the same territory or in another community does not make any difference. Here is a bill to take care of a water supply for a village, and then we turn around and give the gentleman, or myself, or any other citizen the right to go in there and muss around under the guise of prospecting for minerals, and if we should find oil we will have damaged the water supply. I understand they have made quite an investment in that city already, and I think it would be unwise to adopt the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] means well in the amendment that he offers. Here is the great State of Idaho with 84,000 square miles. There is not a coal mine or an oil well within the boundaries of the State. There is not one chance in ten thousand that minerals would be found on these lands, and yet the mineral reservation is a constant and continuous menace, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG]. We can very easily go too far in our desires to protect whatever rights or interests all the people have in the public domain. Let us see what it is we are doing. We are not making a grant to an individual. We are saying to a community, consisting now of 1,500 or 1,000 people, which may eventually be a community of five or six thousand, "Here is a piece of rough, rocky, broken land which no one has ever thought worth while to settle upon and assert a claim to, although for years anyone could have acquired a right to 640 acres of it by simply settling there." It is land of purely nominal value. We are granting a community the right to use it for the protection of their water supply and rather foolishly, I think, making provision that if for any reason they should abandon it for that purpose it shall revert to the Federal Government. Just what the Federal Government would want with it I do not know; but, at any rate, that provision is in the bill. The gentleman from Ohio now comes in with another provision which further limits the title, which authorizes anyone to go in and prospect, dig for any purpose, good or bad. I think if we are to make these grants at all we should make them more freely than we do. If we grant them to protect the water supply of the communities we should grant them without restriction, and particularly without such restrictions as are proposed here.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note the impression created upon the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] by the very thrilling speech by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ], namely, that now that we are granting these lands to cities of a thousand people in the great West we would better let down the bars and turn over the land and establish a new precedent. But a few moments ago we passed a bill for a similar purpose containing this very reservation, and the gentleman from Wyoming says there is not one chance——

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. The gentleman knows that these communities are 350 or 400 miles apart and that an entirely dissimilar situation exists in respect to them. There must be oil on the Sandpoint location, but everyone who knows the community of Downey would know that there is no conceivable possibility of obtaining oil there.

Mr. WALSH. Well, there might be minerals there, might there not?

Mr. WELLING. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that is what this reservation is for, to reserve to the Government the oil and minerals and the other usual rights that are retained in the Federal Government, and I do not think we ought to establish a precedent for a city of a thousand people that we are going to continue to grant these lands, especially when they are taken up by unanimous consent, and pass legislation without the usual reservations until the Committee on the Public Lands has a chance to investigate and look into the matter and determine upon the exact method.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Does the gentleman believe it is possible to be too careful of the water supply of the city, and if this amendment be adopted it is absolutely thrown open to anybody to go in there under the guise of prospecting.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the gentleman is correct there. The city will have the control of this land in that if this grant is made the city will have control of its water supply, and before anybody can go in there and acquire any rights it will have to be done under some regulations of the Interior Department, just the same as it is always done. This is a 640-acre tract. That is a pretty good sized village in some sections of the country. Of course, it is nothing but a playground out in the West in this great State, which is progressing and prospering, and in which we are all willing to help.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman consider more important the water supply of a thousand people or the possibility of finding some coal or oil down under a certain little tract of land?

Mr. WALSH. Well, the gentleman asks a question that is rather perplexing. There may be times when the coal is more important and the oil more important, because if the water supply is frozen up they can get the coal and keep it warm and pump it out.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The gentleman realizes the consumption of water is greatly increasing?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it is increasing every day.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Increasing every day, and it must be provided for.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, certainly; I will agree to that.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not feel that this thought is worth considering: Every time the House adds a nagging, unnecessary, and unwise amendment it puts an unjust cloud upon the title to property out there, and especially where it pertains to a whole community. People feel that Congress is not giving them the plain rights that the city ought to have. This kind of an amendment invites some irresponsible fellow to come along and make trouble. And the Government has not really reserved anything that is of any value or consequence or substance. I am not much concerned about this particular amendment. It is this harsh, incredulous, superstitious, and utterly inexcusable and unwarranted policy of the House toward every little bill that affects the West. That ought not to be the policy of Congress toward the Western States that are a part of its great western public portion of our country. I have repeatedly remonstrated and complained about this critically skeptical and cruelly unfair attitude toward nearly all western measures and its people and they bitterly resent it.

Mr. WALSH. I appreciate that the people interested——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They have that feeling.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, when they are going to get something practically for nothing, they do not want to have any conditions attached to it; that is natural; and they ought not to have any unnecessary conditions attached. Now, if this is not a necessary condition, it ought not to be put on.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me suggest that if this land were worth anything at all for any other purpose it would not now be vacant, unoccupied public domain. Some one would be on it. Hundreds and possibly thousands of people have traveled over it for 75 years and nobody has ever wanted it. Now, this little city asks to have this land set aside for the purpose of protecting its water supply against pollution and against irresponsible persons trying possibly to hold up the town for something. This piece of worthless land will allow them to protect their town water rights, and there can be no higher use for worthless land than to protect a city's water supply from pollution and assist the town in getting and forever holding pure, wholesome water for its inhabitants. How can any sensible or decent person want to prevent that?

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have had a great many of these same kinds of bills, and have nearly always been harassed this same way by various kinds of obstructive amendments and objections. Now, it does seem to me that this policy of Congress toward such matters is not only unwise and unfair but wholly uncalled for, and it is naturally exasperating to the people of that country. Congress ought to take a new tack. We ought to court the good will instead of the ill will of the pioneers on the public domain and try to build up that country rather than retard its growth, as Congress has done by this course for a number of years in the past. It is not only this bill. It is these petty, nagging, restrictive, and useless amendments that are put on practically all such bills that come from the Public Lands Committee affecting the West.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that the city would have control of the question of prospecting for mineral or oil if this property were turned over by the Government?

Mr. WALSH. No; I did not say that. I said that a prospector for coal or oil or mineral would have to come under the regulations of the Interior Department.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman understand that anybody would have the right to go onto this land if it had been set aside by this act under authority of the Interior Department and commence prospecting for oil or minerals on that identical spot? Does not the gentleman think under these circumstances in order to protect these people against that sort of condition that the question of mineral rights ought to be so protected as not to put them in danger of having the Government issue a permit so that they themselves would have no control in reference to protecting themselves in this water right?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not think so, because this establishes a new precedent and departs from any of the usual conditions attached, and unless the proponents of this legislation can give some particular reason——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It seems to me that objection to bills of this kind overlooks the fact that this little or any city is part of the people of the United States, part of the whole population that compose this country. Now, I do not care much what amendment you put on bills pertaining only to a corporation or individuals, or to prevent a person from abusing a right or infringing upon the Government; but when you are dealing with a State or a county or city or any public part of this country of ours, it seems to me that they are entitled to due respect and to be treated as if they were honest and law-abiding citizens of our country and given credit with being an integral portion of our country, a part of "its people," and ought to be treated accordingly, even when they live out in that arid country. You gentlemen should also remember that those people are 2,000 miles from the markets which you have here at your doors; that we are handicapped all the time by frightfully high freight rates, great shrinkage, and all kinds of adverse conditions, and I can not resist a feeling that the fair-minded Members of this House ought to exhibit more of a spirit of encouragement rather than the obstructive course so much exhibited here in regard to the most self-evident, plain, honest, and necessary matters. I hope some day to see some administration in power in Washington and some membership of this House, regardless of what party it may be, that will be broadgauge enough in its statesmanship to treat the pioneer builders of the West much more humanely and fairly than they have been treated during the past 15 or 20 years.

I am appealing only for a square deal, only for fair play. I resent any sentiment that savors of sectional animosity.

That country has not developed during that period the way it should have done, and it has not developed as it would have done if the Government had exhibited a more liberal and encouraging spirit toward its development.

Mr. WALSH. I have heard the gentleman make that argument several times. It is a stock argument of his. If anybody gets up here and even asks a question about one of these bills from the Public Lands Committee, he is "nagging" and "trying to discourage the development of that country." Congress could not develop it. The people there only can do that. If you encourage these people who are going out and taking up these lands in this program of development, if you encourage them to keep coming to Congress and begging and asking for special legislation all the time, you will not encourage the development of the country but discourage it.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman complains because the people come to Congress to secure land titles. Where would they go, inasmuch as the Government is the proprietor of the land?

Mr. WALSH. I did not mention land titles. But the people are running here for special legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. The only way a town can secure this land is either by "skullduggery" and the violation of some law in collusion with some entrymen, which no one would justify, or come to Congress and ask for a grant of a sale, as in this case. Uncle Sam, unfortunately from some standpoints, is still the owner of a little more than half of the land of the great State of Idaho, and if the people who are developing that State, or the communities, need some of that land for the development of the community, of course they must come to the owner and make a purchase, which they are proposing to do in this case. And certainly no one should complain of that.

Mr. REAVIS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Idaho if there is not a large lake there at Sandpoint?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Lake Pend Oreille adjoins the city of Sandpoint.

Mr. REAVIS. Is not the water in that lake sufficient for human consumption?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is not as pure as the water from the mountain tops, and, in addition, it would be more expensive to pump the water than to bring it down by gravity from the mountains.

Mr. KNUTSON. The chances are that this land is not worth a dollar an acre.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is not.

Mr. KNUTSON. And we have taken up a thousand dollars' worth of time talking about it.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. While I am a friend of the West, and I want to see them given every advantage and opportunity that is justly theirs and will throw nothing in the way of their progress, prosperity, and development, yet at the same time I believe, in view of the fast diminishing supply of oil, gas, and other minerals, it is time for the United States Government to retain the oil, gas, and mineral interests in all the land it now owns, and in making these conveyances, such as is attempted to be made here, I feel it would be unwise for us to set a precedent that would forfeit our right to these minerals. If you waive it on this particular tract—and you have not waived it on the one you passed a moment ago of 2,600 acres—if you waive it on this tract, the next man that comes along will say, "You waived it on the other tract and you should waive it on mine," and the next thing you know you will be waiving the reservation on behalf of the Government for the retention of these minerals. It is true that there may not be any prospecting for minerals. If so, it will do no harm to make the reservation. The gentleman from Ohio has said that it will throw open the door for people to come in and to file on the land and make investigations with reference to speculating for oil or gas right in the town site we are granting, which is covered by a pool of water. It would seem very strange, where no oil or gas has been found in any part of the State, that a man would come along and prospect under a pool of water that had been saved up for the benefit of the city. I do not believe in practical operation that this reservation will hurt the good people of that city. I do not believe it will interfere with the use by the city of the reservoir. I do not believe it will do any more than protect the Government. If perchance in the distant future it should be discovered, as has often been done in unexpected territory, that there was a large oil, gas, or mineral field, the Government would have this valuable deposit there which would probably mean thousands and thousands of dollars to the Government, and the Government would be protected by making this reservation. I believe in all such grants as this the reservation should be made as suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, may we have the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio again reported?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was read.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WALSH. Line 4, strike out the word "convey" and insert the words "issue patents," and in line 5, after the word "Idaho" insert the word "for."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 4, strike out the word "convey" and insert in lieu thereof the words "issue patents," and in line 5, after the word "Idaho" insert the word "for."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment on page 1, line 4. After the word "directed" insert the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 4, after the word "directed" insert the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment. On page 1, line 10, after the word "containing" strike out "160" and insert "640."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMITH of Idaho: Page 1, line 10, after the word "containing" strike out the words "one hundred and sixty" and insert in lieu thereof "six hundred and forty."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment on page 1, line 11, to insert after the first word "of" the words "a sum not less than."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 11, after the word "of" insert the words "a sum not less than."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended in accordance with the text.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF HOMESTEADERS ALONG SNAKE RIVER, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12626) for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands along the Snake River in the State of Idaho under an erroneous survey made in 1883.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I note from the reading of this bill what seems to me to be a twofold purpose. One is to authorize the commissioner of the General Land Office to sell certain lands for $1.25 per acre, and the other purpose is to adjust the title to lands heretofore claimed, occupied, and improved under surveys which are found to be erroneous. The report which I have—and I shall be glad to have the gentleman's word about it, because he is no doubt much better advised than I—seems to indicate that the character of legislation recommended by the department is legislation which would correct the erroneous survey. I do not know that it refers especially to the first part of the bill H. R. 12626, relative to the sale of this land.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. My attention was diverted and I did not understand that this bill had been reached. Will the gentleman please restate the inquiry?

Mr. GARD. The inquiry I made was for the gentleman's information as to what seems to me to be a twofold character of the bill. I note from the report that the department—that is, the General Land Office in the Department of the Interior—favors legislation correcting what is said to be an erroneous survey. That is right, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The second part of the bill, as it appears on page 2, after the semicolon on line 5, seems to carry out that purpose, but I do not see the necessity of authorizing the sale of 4,000 acres of land at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is simply this: When the resurvey was made it was discovered that the land which was occupied by the owners was outside of the land described in the deed under the resurvey, and in view of the fact that those people had been occupying this land, most of them for 30 years, and supposed they were on the land described in that patent, it was necessary, in order to protect them, that they be permitted to purchase any excess land that may be found to be in the public domain which they are occupying.

Mr. GARD. I do not gather that from the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. As the report indicates, this land is in a canyon 600 or 800 feet deep. The walls are very precipitous, and when the survey was made in 1883 it was done under a contract with private surveyors. It was in such a remote section of the country that these surveys evidently were never checked up by the Government surveyors.

Mr. GARD. From reading the report I gathered that this is what occurred: When the survey was made they ran what they call a meander line.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And the meander line was supposed to run along the river edge, I expect?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Because the lands immediately next to rivers are commonly called bottom lands, and are usually of greater value than other lands. I do not know whether that is true out there or not.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes.

Mr. GARD. If that is true and the survey had been erroneously made, then it would seem to me, as stated here, a resurvey was made showing that the area between the recorded line and the river would be 4,000 acres?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. But this land extends along the river for 24 miles; a narrow strip of land along the river, which is embraced in probably 20 different homestead entries, and this land is now ascertained to be public land under this resurvey.

Mr. GARD. What I am trying to arrive at—and I am seeking information—is this: Has not the Commissioner of the General Land Office the power under the second section of this bill—if it may be called a second section, beginning on line 5—to correct by a resurvey the old survey and make rules and regulations necessary to carry out the justice of the situation, as applicable to what was the apparent intent of the persons who settled on the land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That was a suggestion that I made to the Commissioner of the General Land Office when the matter was first called to my attention a year ago. I thought that he could issue amended patents under existing law so as to properly describe the land under the resurvey. But he thought that he should have direct authority from Congress, and require these people who are living on this land to pay for that portion of it which appeared to be in the public domain, regardless of the fact that some of it is very much improved and many of them have their houses on this land that is now thrown out of the area described in the former deeds under the new survey and is public land.

Mr. GARD. That authority that he seems to have had conferred upon him by legislative action, is not that authority sufficiently conferred in the language following, in line 5 on page 2, and is the other part, about the purchase of the land at $1.25, necessary for the proper consideration of the entire situation?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I think so. This report was drawn by the legal officers of the Interior Department with a view to meeting these conditions.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GARD. Surely; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. GANDY. It has been the policy of Congress in all of these matters, whether passing title to cities for waterworks purposes or doing what we are doing in this case, to place a requirement of payment at $1.25 an acre in the bill. If that has not been done when a bill is introduced, it has been done on the floor.

Mr. GARD. That is what is called a minimum price?

Mr. GANDY. Yes. That is what is called a minimum price, and that is the reason why it was placed in this bill.

Mr. GARD. I understand about that; but what I want to know is why there is any necessity for putting in any authorization for sale if we confer the authorization upon the General Land Office to correct the surveys in accordance with the facts?

Mr. FRENCH. Because there is a little bit larger area included in some of these subdivisions to which patents have been issued than the patents themselves would show, but it is land that the Government supposed it had parted title with and did part title with. The owners acquired the lands under the various land laws some thirty-odd years ago, and they and their successors have been occupying and improving those lands ever since; but, in view of the fact that the lands in some instances are in excess of the lands described in the patents, it seems that it is necessary to confer this additional authority.

Mr. GANDY. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. GARD. Yes; surely.

Mr. GANDY. This river lies very low as compared with the mesa or the hills on each side, and it appears that the surveyor estimated the distance from the top of the mesa to the river below, for there is no other way under which you can account for the mistake having been made. When the settler came upon the land the plat in the United States Land Office showed that this tract was the only tract between the hill and the river. The settler took the United States Land Office plat for it. Afterwards when this resurvey was made and they really got down into this valley, which the former surveyor evidently did not do, it was found that there is a discrepancy in the survey, leaving out a narrow strip that runs up that valley, as has been explained, for about 24 miles.

Now, as the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] stated, some of these tracts on the resurvey will have a larger acreage in them than they had in the old survey; so that it is but right and proper, inasmuch as the people who settled on the land have been occupying it for 30 or 40 years, that the title pass as the Government originally intended it should pass, as the settlers thought they were getting it, and as they have occupied and improved it.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman from Idaho have any objection to the incorporation of the language that we have put in these other bills? For instance, in line 5, before the words "one dollar and twenty-five cents," put in the words "not less than"?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I do not think that should be accepted, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact these people should not be required to pay anything for this land, because they have been living on it for 30 years under the impression that they owned it.

Mr. GARD. I do not think so myself.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. They had title to the land, but on the resurvey it is found their patents do not properly describe the land according to the new survey.

Mr. GARD. If it is simply a readjustment of a survey, I do not think they should pay anything; but why is it carried at $1.25 an acre?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Simply because, as has been explained by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. GANDY], that is the policy of the Government—to require that payment when public land is offered for sale.

Mr. GARD. Yes; that is the minimum price that the department has set in the matter of transfers, or the matter of sales of arid and desert lands, but it is not an arbitrary price in any way.

Mr. FRENCH. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. These people ought not to pay anything additional, because they have complied with the original requirement for the acquiring of the land.

Mr. GARD. It says $1.25 an acre. I think it ought to carry the language of the other bills. If it does not mean anything, at least it establishes a precedent and shows that we are playing fair with the other bills when we put in the language "not less than," as we have in other bills.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman insists on that amendment, I will not object.

Mr. GARD. I do not think they ought to pay anything.

Mr. FRENCH. Why not strike it out and provide that the owners shall not pay anything? If they acquired the land under certain of the United States land laws they have already paid for it, or if they did not pay for it, they have lived on it the required number of years that the law specified. In either event they ought not to have to pay anything more.

Mr. GARD. Why would it not be better to amend this bill by leaving out that provision and providing for the transfer of the land in accordance with the facts on this resurvey.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is what I suggested to the commissioner, but he seemed to be under the impression that we should not change the policy of the Government to charge $1.25 per acre.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman from Idaho says that language is apparently not acceptable to the lawyer of the department in the General Land Office who drafted the bill. I myself do not see, if a man is suffering from an erroneous survey, why the survey should not be corrected without additional cost to him.

Mr. FRENCH. It ought to be, and there ought not to be any charge.

Mr. GARD. That is what I think.

Mr. FRENCH. On the other hand, these settlers are willing to do almost anything in order to have this problem settled.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. As I understand, there are 4,000 acres of this land outside of the meander line. Is that correct?

Mr. GARD. In the line along the river that was not included in the old survey.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. And that that land never has been paid for by anybody. I understand the meander line was back from the river bank.

Mr. FRENCH. But if it had not been for that little amount of bottom land, and if the land that the settlers were trying to take had been correctly described, they would never have taken the land on the canyon sides. The land that induced them to go there was the land that does not seem to have been surveyed. That is the land that the settlers actually entered upon, and upon which they made their improvement, so as a fact the more worthless land on the canyon sides is what would be in the nature of the surplus land. They are not the surplus lands; the surplus lands are the ones that did not induce them to go there at all. They were on the canyon sidehill.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. They are getting 4,000 acres of land in addition.

Mr. FRENCH. Four thousand acres of land they settled on; built improvements upon 30 years ago. If you hold the settlers to the survey made 30 or 40 years ago, it would show that they acquired land on the deep canyon side.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What is this land worth?

Mr. FRENCH. It is worth nothing at all; you could not give it away.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is it not used in connection with the bottom lands to some extent?

Mr. FRENCH. It could not be used, except here and there a pocket that might be used for agricultural purposes. As to the most of it, I doubt if it could be used for satisfactory pasturage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I have two amendments that I want to offer.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman from Ohio insists on his amendment of inserting the words "not less than," I have no objection to it.

Mr. GARD. I wish also to amend by inserting after "the Commissioner of the General Land Office," the words "in his discretion."

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the further right to object, I want to ask if this land has been occupied as claimed by these people as individual lands for how long?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Over 30 years, most of it.

Mr. PARRISH. Does the gentleman think, in view of the fact that they claim this particular land under the impression and belief which was justified that it is their own land, it would be unfair to make a reservation for oil, gas, and mineral rights?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; because the patent to the land was issued to them 30 years ago, and it would certainly be unfair to put that restriction on land that they have been occupying for 30 years and cultivated for 30 years.

Mr. GANDY. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that this land was proved up under the quarter-section homestead law and a patent issued, and no man in the history of this Government who ever got a quarter section under the homestead law before oil and gas was known to exist at the time they proved up has had the mineral rights reserved. There has never been a mineral reservation on one of those patents. These lands were proved up a long time ago.

Mr. PARRISH. I only wanted to bring out the difference between this case and the other two cases that preceded this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, subject to the supervisory authority of the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office is authorized to sell for cash, for $1.25 per acre, any unsurveyed public land which may, on resurvey, be found to exist in townships 9 south of range 14 east, 9 south of range 15 east, 9 south of range 16 east, and 9 south of range 17 east of the Boise meridian along Snake River in the State of Idaho, to those persons who in good faith, by themselves and their predecessors in interest have heretofore acquired, occupied, and improved under the public land laws in accordance with a Government survey made in 1883; and said commissioner may, in like manner, on principles of equity, adjust, settle, and confirm by patent the title to any lands in said townships heretofore claimed, occupied, and improved under descriptions which on resurvey are found to be erroneous; the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make any rules and regulations necessary to carry out and effect the purpose of this act, and any person claiming the benefits hereof shall make the required payments and perform such other acts as may be required within the time fixed by the Land Department, otherwise any right or advantage claimed under this act shall be forfeited.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

Line 4, page 1, after the word "office," insert a comma and the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "office," insert a comma and the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. I also move to insert, in line 5, after the word "for," the words "not less than."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "for," insert the words "not less than."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment, on page 2, line 14, after the word "fixed," insert the words "in the regulations."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, after the word "fixed," insert the words "in the regulations."

Mr. GARD. Does that refer to the Department of the Interior?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. The regulations of the department referred to in lines 9 and 10.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF LANDS IN GREGORY COUNTY, S. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2786) authorizing the sale of lands in Gregory County, S. Dak.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell for cash, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, the unallotted, unreserved, and unentered lands in Gregory County, S. Dak., formerly in the Fort Randall Military Reservation.

Mr. GANDY. Mr. Speaker, in line 5 the word "prescribe" is misspelled. I move to amend by making it "prescribe."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 32 ayes and 3 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GANDY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS PENTWATER RIVER, MICH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12869) for the construction of a bridge across the Pentwater River, or Pentwater Lake, Mich.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of learning whether this grant is to be made to the township or to the Pere Marquette Railroad Co. The bill recites that it may be made to either. Does anyone know about the conditions up there, and who is going to build this bridge?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is going to build the bridge. Negotiations are going on now between the people of the village and the Pere Marquette Railroad Co. Agreement will be reached as to who shall build the bridge, but it depends somewhat on the kind of a bridge the Corps of Engineers will demand and also upon the expense. This bill, if it becomes law, will simply permit and enable that community to have a bridge to be constructed as the people and the railroad company may determine, subject, of course, to the direction of the Engineers.

Mr. GARD. The reason I ask that is not to put myself in an attitude of opposition to the bill, but what I particularly want information about is as to whether it is proper in a bill of this kind to couple up these grants, one to a township and the other to a railroad corporation?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. They are working together, and my impression is that if the character of bridge demanded by the Corps of Engineers is such that the railroad company will feel justified in building it and incurring the expense, the company will build it. If, however, a more expensive bridge is demanded by the engineers, it will be necessary for the people there to cooperate in some way with the railroad company, and it was for the purpose of leaving open the opportunity to those two interests to cooperate that the bill was drawn in this way.

Mr. GARD. Then the idea primarily is for the railroad company to build the bridge?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And if the company does not wish to expend the entire amount of the money to build the kind of a bridge the engineers say should be built, it may wish to call on the township for help?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is the situation.

Mr. GARD. What is the use of associating the township in the grant? Why do you not make it to both by striking out the word "or" and inserting the word "and"?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It may be that the railroad company will feel, on account of the expense and conditions imposed by the engineers, that it will not do it, and that the people themselves will take it up under this permission and do the work and pay the expense themselves.

Mr. GARD. If that be true, would there then be any danger of the railroad company coming in at a later time under the alternative provisions of the grant in building another bridge?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think one bridge only can be constructed under this grant. If one of the parties builds a bridge, I think the other will not claim the privilege of spending its money to build another.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is satisfied with this language?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I prepared it myself, knowing the situation and believing it is the only thing that will meet the situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the township of Pentwater, Mich., or the Pere Marquette Railroad Co., a corporation, to construct a bridge, with approaches thereto, across Pentwater River or at the outlet of Pentwater Lake in the State of Michigan, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING CERTAIN TRIBES OF INDIANS TO TAKE CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 157) authorizing the Indian tribes and individual Indians, or any of them, residing in the State of Washington and west of the summit of the Cascade Mountains to submit to the Court of Claims certain claims growing out of treaties and otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been up once or twice before, and I do not think the measure ought to be considered by unanimous consent. I will reserve the right to object if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] desires to make a statement.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do not desire to make any statement, except to say that this bill has been up on four different occasions, when we have been asked to get further information, and each time that information has been brought back. It seems to me that all the information possible on the bill is now before the House, and I would like to have the bill acted upon.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman some additional information in his possession at this time?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have a statement that has not as yet been presented upon this question, which seems to me to sum up the whole situation with reference to these tribes, made by R. H. Milroy, superintendent of Indian affairs for Washington Territory, in his annual report for 1872. He describes the situation as follows:

These tribes when first discovered by the white men were in peaceable possession of and had the just right to all the country around Grays Harbor and from about 10 miles north of that bay south 60 miles along the Pacific coast to the mouth of the Columbia River, the rich valley of the Chehalis and all the country south of that valley to the Columbia River, the valley of the Cowlitz and all the country west of it to the Pacific, embracing the present counties of Pacific, Wahkiakum, Cowlitz, west half of Lewis, south half of Chehalis, and the southwest quarter of Thurston, in all nearly 2,000,000 acres of land, which our Government, without treaty, purchase, or contract, or right of any kind save that which is governed by might, took from these weak, powerless barbarians and appropriated to her own use. After years of complaining the protest against the injustice of this wholesale absorption of their country was so far heeded that, in 1860, Supt. Geary directed to be set apart to them a tract of about 5,000 acres, then a country justly their own, which constitutes the present Chehalis Reservation. The Cowlitz, Chinook, Showalter Bay, and Humboldts have never recognized this reservation as their home and refuse to come and reside on it, nor have they ever consented to receive any presents of any kind from the Government which might be construed into payment for their lands.

That is from the agent in charge of the affairs of the Indians of Washington Territory at that time. This bill provides that we shall allow these Indians to go into the Court of Claims and present their claim for adjudication, and that it shall be decided by the Court of Claims. The Secretary of the Interior has requested that such action be taken, and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, also. Every party concerned has said that the only possible way to get settlement is to have the whole matter referred to the Court of Claims. This bill is unanimously reported by the Indian Affairs Committee of the House, as well as the Indian Affairs Committee of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

KLAMATH TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5163) authorizing the Klamath Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington, who introduced the bill, is not here, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to that, but I have no objection to the bill going to the foot of the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman so modify his request?

Mr. HERNANDEZ. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill going to the foot of the calendar?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER OF THE NORTH, MINN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12581) granting the consent of Congress to the village and township of Shelly, Norman County, Minn., and the township of Caledonia, Traill County, N. Dak., and their successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North on the boundary line between the said States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the village and township of Shelly, Norman County, Minn., and the township of Caledonia, Traill County, N. Dak., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River of the North at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the section line between sections 13 and 24, township 146 north, range 49 west, fifth principal meridian, on the boundary line between Minnesota and North Dakota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

YOSEMITE, SEQUOIA, AND GENERAL GRANT NATIONAL PARKS, CALIF.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12044) to accept the cession by the State of California of exclusive jurisdiction of the lands embraced within the Yosemite National Park, Sequoia National Park, and General Grant National Park, respectively, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is quite a comprehensive bill, consisting of 10 or 11 pages and as many, if not more, sections, and it seems to me that the legislation should require a little more time and attention than can be devoted to it under unanimous consent.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will permit this statement to be made. In 1914 we passed similar legislation for the Glacier National Park, Mont., and this bill is practically the same except that it relates to California. It refers to the act of the legislature and then provides a provision relative to allowing the Secretary of the Interior to enforce the rules and regulations in the various parks. Similar legislation was passed June 30, 1916, in regard to Mount Rainier, Wash., and later, on August 24, 1916, we passed similar legislation for Crater Lake, Oreg. The Legislature of California, at the request of the Department of the Interior, National Park Service, asked this legislation ceding jurisdiction to the Federal Government. I want to call attention to this: At one time we find as high as 6,000 people in Yosemite National Park. It is a sort of municipality, people coming in there from all parts of the world, and under the present rules and regulations there is no method by which you can properly police and protect the lives of the people and protect their health, and this is for the sole purpose of preventing infractions of law, the enforcement of proper sanitary and automobile regulations, as well as other regulations relating to the various parks.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. RAKER. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The previous legislation to which the gentleman has referred touching the Glacier National Park, Mount Rainier Park, and Crater Lake—do they carry police jurisdiction?

Mr. RAKER. May I say to the gentleman this, that on all three of these bills I was chairman of the subcommittee that went over them carefully, and it was through my suggestion that we put in this regulation as to the commissioner, so we might get a real enforcement of the regulations promulgated.

Mr. WALSH. So this bill, as near as circumstances will permit, is identical?

Mr. RAKER. As near as possible it is drawn the same as the other three bills.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That all hunting or the killing, wounding, or capturing at any time of any wild bird or animal, except dangerous animals, when it is necessary to prevent them from destroying human lives or inflicting personal injury, is prohibited within the limits of said parks; or shall any fish be taken out of any of the waters of the said parks, or either of them, in any other way than by hook and line, and then only at such seasons and such times and manner as may be directed by the Secretary of the Interior. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make and publish such general rules and regulations as he may deem necessary and proper for the management and care of the park and for the protection of the property therein, especially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of all timber, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks, natural curiosities or wonderful objects within said parks, and for the protection of the animals in the park from capture or destruction, and to prevent their being frightened or driven from the said parks; and he shall make rules and regulations governing the taking of fish from the streams or lakes in the said parks or either of them. Possession within said parks, or either of them, of the dead bodies or any part thereof of any wild bird or animal shall be prima facie evidence that person or persons having same are guilty of violating this act. Any person or persons, of stage or express company, or railway company, who knows or has reason to believe that they were taken or killed contrary to the provisions of this act, and who receives for transportation any of said animals, birds, or fish so killed, caught, or taken, or who shall violate any of the other provisions of this act, or any rule or regulation that may be promulgated by the Secretary of the Interior, with reference to the management and care of the said parks, or either of them, or for the protection of the property therein from the preservation from injury or spoliation of timber, mineral deposits, other than those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks, natural curiosities, or wonderful objects within said parks, or either of them, or for the protection of the animals, birds, or fish in the said parks, or either of them, or who shall within said parks commit any damage, injury, spoliation to or upon any building, fence, hedge, gate, guidepost, tree, wood, underwood, timber, garden, crops, vegetables, plants, land, springs, mineral deposits other than those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks, natural curiosities, or other matter or thing growing or being thereon, or situated therein, shall be subject to the penalty provided for the violation of rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior authorized by section 3 of the act of Congress approved August 25, 1916 (39 Stat., p. 535), entitled "An act to establish a National Park Service, and for other purposes," which section is hereby amended by striking therefrom the words "and any violations of any of the rules and regulations authorized by this act shall be punished as provided for in section 50 of the act entitled 'An act to codify and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, as amended by section 6 of the act of June 25, 1910 (36 U. S. Stat. L., p. 857)," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "and any violation of any of the rules and regulations authorized by this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or both, and be adjudged to pay all cost of the proceedings": Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as repealing or in any way modifying the authority granted the Secretary of the Interior by said section 3 of the said act approved August 25, 1916, to sell or dispose of timber in national parks in those cases where, in his judgment, the cutting of such timber is required in order to control the attacks of insects or diseases or otherwise conserve the scenery of the natural or historic objects in such parks and to provide for the destruction of such animals and such plant life as may be detrimental to the use of any of said parks, or the authority granted to said Secretary by the act approved April 9, 1912, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to secure for the United States title to patented lands in the Yosemite National Park, and for other purposes," as amended by the act approved April 16, 1914.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the bill is being read by sections for amendment.

Mr. RAKER. It is being read now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This section has been read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer an amendment. In line 16, page 4, strike out the word "of" and insert the word "or." This is just a clerical error, which I desire to have corrected.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman's colleague has been recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recognized later.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Speaker, I was going to call the attention of the gentleman from California, the author of the bill, to the very matter that he has just mentioned. The word "of" apparently had been used in place of the word "or." I also would like information relative to the language used on page 5, lines 10, 11, and 12, where it refers to mineral deposits, as follows:

Other than those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks.

We have another bill on this calendar, No. 195, I believe, affecting Sequoia National Park and enlarging its boundaries. It provides that mineral claims and mining shall be permitted in the proposed enlarged park. It seems to me that the language in the bill under consideration would restrict mining in all parks affected to such claims as were located at the time the parks were created. The other bill, Calendar No. 195, does not create the Sequoia National Park, but proposes simply to extend or enlarge it, and it occurs to me that the language should be amended so as to permit——

Mr. RAKER. Where does the gentleman find that particular language?

Mr. BARBOUR. I stated it was at page 5, lines 10, 11, and 12, where, with reference to mineral deposits, it says, "other than those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks."

Mr. RAKER. Now, the purpose of that is, like the other acts, that all applications for locations that were made prior to the establishment of those parks, they could go on and complete——

Mr. BARBOUR. But if this language is maintained in this bill will it permit the location and development of mining claims in the future? Under the language of the Roosevelt or Sequoia National Park bill——

Mr. RAKER. It will prohibit the filing of mineral claims because they are all prohibited under the present law.

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; but under the Roosevelt Park bill, which follows right along on this calendar, it is provided that the mineral and coal land laws shall be in force as to the additional lands that are being taken into the park. This bill seems to tie up all mining to the act which created the park. Calendar No. 195 permits the filing and development of mineral claims in the added area. I offer an amendment so as to bring the matter directly to the attention of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARBOUR: Page 5, line 10, after the word "than," strike out "those legally located prior to the passage of the respective acts creating and establishing said parks" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "proper development work thereon and removal of minerals therefrom."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. I get the connection.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will admit that it is a little involved.

Mr. RAKER. The idea of the gentleman is to permit, by virtue of another bill pending, the enlargement of the Sequoia National Park by changing its name to the Roosevelt National Park, and enlarging its territory to include about a million more acres, and to permit the mining in that territory?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes. And it seems that this language would restrict mining in all these parks, including the Sequoia National Park, to claims located prior to the creation of the parks. The bill referred to does not create the Sequoia National Park. It merely extends the boundaries or enlarges the area.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why should not the gentleman have excluded from it mining operations if it is going to be a national park?

Mr. BARBOUR. Because it is reported that some of the greatest copper deposits in America are located in this great area that it is proposed to add to Sequoia National Park. The idea of providing for the future development of those valuable deposits was determined to be practicable and feasible.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why should not the bill leave out Sequoia Park and have it attended to separately, as was done with the other national parks?

Mr. BARBOUR. With the exception of the matter I have mentioned and one other the same condition, so far as this bill is concerned, prevails in the Sequoia as in the General Grant National Park and in the Yosemite National Park.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You want the park, but you want the mining, too?

Mr. BARBOUR. I want the mining if the mining is more valuable for public purposes than the park. If there are valuable mineral deposits there and it is in the interest of the public to have them developed and more in the public interest to have the minerals developed than it is to have this great area preserved for scenic purposes, then I want the minerals developed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who will determine whether or not it is to the public interest? You say it is to the public interest. In some States you lock up the great parks in a forest reserve, and the commissioner or some one in charge says how it shall be used, and then you come along and increase the number of the parks and increase the area. California comes forward with a proposition different from the other States, and wants not only the parks but the mineral deposits, too.

Mr. BARBOUR. Certainly, if there are valuable mineral deposits locked up in the parks, the public should have the right to develop those deposits.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not believe such parks should have their areas extended at all.

Mr. RAKER. So far as the minerals are concerned, they are in the parks now and under the park law, and so we are not attempting to change any of that. The gentleman is trying to cover something that may occur in the future, and I see no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman had best take it out, if he wants to carry the next bill.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. If I understand the full purport of your amendment, it will permit them to prospect for anything—coal, oil, copper, iron, or any other minerals? It will become a common preserve, over which the Government furnishes police protection, but you can mine for anything you want?

Mr. BARBOUR. You can go in there and prospect for minerals. Now, what I am trying to do is this: I am trying to prevent the tying up of great valuable mineral deposits in national parks, where they will not do anybody any good, and preventing their future development and then providing that you shall protect all claims filed prior to the creation of the parks. You will permit one class of mineral claims to be developed but no others, no matter how valuable they may be.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The territory the gentleman seeks to open to the public is principally in this territory the gentleman seeks to open up as parks?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is in the area that it is proposed to add to the Sequoia National Park by another bill.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Why not leave the law that is satisfactory to the present park as it is, and when you add the territory make the bill to suit the territory included?

Mr. BARBOUR. In the proposed bill it is provided that the existing mineral land laws and coal land laws shall apply to the area that is added to Sequoia National Park. Now, if that permits the development of valuable mineral deposits that may be in Sequoia National Park, and I believe it does, that is all I want. However, if in this bill you tie up all mineral deposits except those on which claims have been filed prior to the act creating the park, then you simply prevent all future mineral development and permit mining without restriction on the old claims.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Is not this the situation: Your legislation provides that the territory will be specially in your care and will protect you against the general provision, while if you adopt the amendment you now suggest you open up parks for prospecting for all kinds of minerals?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am interested, as I stated a moment ago, in these reported large copper deposits in the area which it is proposed to annex to the Sequoia National Park.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They have not been attached yet?

Mr. BARBOUR. No; they have not been attached yet, but there is a bill following along this afternoon which has that purpose in view.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am inclined to think that this proposed amendment fixes it just as has been indicated here, so that the Federal Government may have the right to go after people for fishing and other things in a national park, but makes certain regulations as to mining, and makes endless confusion that will permit the department to haul men before commissioners for everything under the sun, and in addition to all its bad features it is trying to fix a very careful provision to prepare the way for another bill that is coming up soon.

Mr. BARBOUR. It is simply an endeavor to make the two bills consistent. That is all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am thoroughly opposed to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on page 4, line 16, before the word "stake," I move to strike out the word "of" and insert the word "or." It is a clerical mistake.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 4, line 16, strike out the word "of" and insert the word "or."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any such commissioner within his jurisdiction shall also have the power to issue process as hereinbefore provided for the arrest of any person charged with commission within said boundaries of said parks, or either of them, as specified above in this act, of any criminal offense not covered by the provisions of section 5 of this act, to hear the evidence introduced, and if he is of the opinion that probable cause is shown for holding the person so charged for trial, he shall cause such person to be safely conveyed to a secure place of confinement within the jurisdiction of the United States district court in and for the judicial district to which he belongs, and certify a transcript of the record of his proceedings and testimony in the case to the court to which the park is attached as above specified in this act, which court shall have jurisdiction of the case: Provided, That the said commissioner shall grant bail in all cases bailable under the laws of the United States or of said State.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, a little while ago we had before us a bill which provided that the Federal Government should grant to a municipality in Idaho a section of land—640 acres—for water purposes. I directed the attention of the House then to the fact that these public lands were liabilities instead of assets, and that this public domain in the western country ought to be turned over to the States wherein it was situated, for the reason that it was continually, persistently, everlastingly, and eternally involving this National Government in great expense.

Now, here we have another bill somewhat different in its line. This is a bill authorizing and requiring the Federal Government to accept the cession by the State of California of the exclusive jurisdiction of lands embraced within certain parks situated in that State. Having carefully read this bill, I can not find that the State of California is proposing to grant to the Federal Government these properties, but that the simple scheme is to enable the Federal Government to extend its jurisdiction over that country, to keep down crime, and to be at a continual cost and expense in preserving law and order in those territories. In other words, this is the case of a State reserving the property rights, but simply conveying to the Federal Government the right of jurisdiction, which carries with it the complement of enforcing the law. In other words, we propose for the use and benefit of the State of California to appoint a commissioner to take charge of these properties, and to be at the charge and expense of keeping them up for the benefit of the people of the State.

I do not know, but I have an idea that these national parks, the Sequoia and the General Grant and the Yosemite, are all contiguous to one or more big cities, and that the people in those municipalities expect the Federal Government to police the parks, to build roads in them, to beautify them, to keep them up, and to protect their forests against fire, and all that sort of thing, just simply for the private use and benefit of the people of these municipalities.

I am thoroughly opposed to our Government assuming mere jurisdiction over certain territory and being at the cost and expense of keeping it in order for the exclusive use and benefit of some particular community.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman will understand that there are a number of national parks whose areas have been turned over to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government has the title to those parks and is given the privilege of building roads there, controlling the parks, charging admission, and taking care of them. This bill from the State of California purports to be a cession by the State of jurisdiction to the Federal Government, which will result in conferring upon the Federal Government the duty of policing the parks and acting through a Federal commissioner.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. If this domain be the property of the Federal Government, I am unable to see why it is necessary for the State of California to undertake to confer any jurisdiction on the United States, because the latter's jurisdiction would be plenary and exclusive.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Some years ago an effort was made to enforce the liquor laws in a certain western State which had voted itself "bone dry." The national parks and forest reserves belonged to the United States and at that time the United States was still "wet." That involved an intricate problem which has now been happily solved.

A MEMBER. Unhappily solved. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. The Volstead enforcement act by its own express terms applies to the national parks and forest reserves. This legislation, I think, has some other object in view. The only point that I have to make here now is this: I think it is a well-known fact that these western lands constitute a great burden of expense upon the Federal Government. The rents and royalties accruing from lands which are leased, say, for oil and coal development are absorbed by salaries of officials. A lot of the lands are barren and poor; perfectly useless and utterly worthless. The Federal Government has nothing to gain by holding these properties, and should therefore surrender them to the States wherein they are situate and let the States take, use, and dispose of them and pay the expense of maintaining them.

The appropriation bills carry millions of dollars annually to cover the expense of policing these lands, protecting the forests against fire, protecting the game, prosecuting timber thieves, surveying, and finally, when the Government undertakes a sale of the property, the costs of selling exceeds the sale price.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill for amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAKER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by my colleague, Hon. CHARLES C. KEARNS, of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing therein a speech made by his colleague [Mr. KEARNS]. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. What is it about?

Mr. THOMPSON. Reminiscences—a speech delivered at a McKinley Day banquet at Canton, Ohio, on January 29.

Mr. GARD. January 29 last?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; January 29, 1920.

Mr. DYER. It must be a good speech.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IGOE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the peace resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the peace resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

TRANSMISSION OF POISONS THROUGH THE MAILS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 9781) to amend section 217 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I think there ought to be more explanation of this measure than is contained in the report. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] will kindly clarify the situation, that may be satisfactory.

Mr. STEENERSON. I will be very glad to explain the purpose of the bill. It reenacts word for word the existing law as found in section 217 of the penal code except that it adds the words in italics in lines 10, 11, and 12, on page 2—

From the manufacturer thereof or dealer therein to licensed physicians, surgeons, dentists, pharmacists, druggists, and veterinarians.

The original act contained after the word "prescribe" in line 13, the words—

As to preparation and packing.

Those words are omitted from this bill. Those words were construed in Two hundred and second Federal Reporter, in the case of United States against Bruce, in such a way as to make the section ineffective. The section itself prohibits the transmission of poisons and other dangerous substances in the mails, but the original act provided that—

The Postmaster General may permit the transmission in the mails, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe as to preparation and packing.

It was supposed by the department that the section authorized the Postmaster General to prescribe who might mail these articles and to whom, and he issued rules and regulations to the effect that they might be mailed by manufacturers or dealers to physicians, surgeons, dentists, pharmacists, druggists, and veterinarians; but when a man was indicted for a violation of these regulations the court held that the authority to prescribe rules and regulations related only to preparation and packing and not to the persons to whom they might be mailed. Therefore it was defective.

Mr. WALSH. What was the idea of the Post Office Committee—whose jurisdiction of this bill I doubt, although it has now jurisdiction because it took it—in further restricting the persons from whom these articles might be shipped and to whom they might be sent?

Mr. STEENERSON. In order to carry out the idea of the Postmaster General, which he prescribed in his regulations originally. The statute is proposed to be amended so as to include manufacturers and dealers.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that is in the committee amendment; but this would exclude a physician from mailing a remedy to his patient if it contained some poisonous drug.

Mr. STEENERSON. The section excludes that now.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think so.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes; absolutely.

Mr. WALSH. The section now gives the Postmaster General authority to make rules and regulations as to the preparation and packing of the medicines?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, you have limited the persons who may mail them and the persons to whom they may be sent.

Mr. STEENERSON. But the section itself prohibits the transmission of any of these articles in the mail. Nobody can ship or send these articles in the mails.

Mr. WALSH. The Postmaster General could permit the mailing under such rules and regulations as to packing and preparation as he might prescribe.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; and he made the regulations just exactly as we have them in the bill, in the words in italics, permitting the mailing from manufacturers or dealers to licensed physicians, dentists, and so forth, and the court held that the words "as to preparation and packing," after the word "prescribe," in line 13, in the original law, limited the power of the Postmaster General to prescribe rules and regulations as to the packing and preparation, and that he could not say that they might be mailed by a manufacturer or dealer to a physician or dentist. So that unless this is enacted into law these articles are absolutely excluded from the mails.

Mr. WALSH. As long as you are going to tinker with it at all, why should not a licensed physician be permitted to send a medicine by mail to a patient if the medicine contains a poisonous substance? For instance, if he wanted to send a country patient some strychnine tablets, why should he not be permitted to do so?

Mr. STEENERSON. This is as far as the department desires to go. It applies to manufacturers and dealers in those articles. Of course, we could broaden it so as to allow physicians to mail them, but there is no call for that. The Post Office Committee have received a large number of letters concerning this bill, and not a single protest. These letters are all from physicians, dentists, surgeons, and veterinarians living in smaller places, where they can not go and buy these articles but have to get them by mail. Dentists, especially, have written several letters. I do not think there is any necessity for the change that the gentleman suggests.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Beginning with line 7, on page 1, the law now specifies that all kinds of poisons and all articles and compositions containing poison, and so forth, are excluded whether sent in sealed or unsealed mail. So that part is already taken care of, as the gentleman has explained. But why should this be carried further? That is the question which the gentleman asks. Now, the report shows that the Postmaster General undertook to make a regulation. The gentleman understands that?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. This is to do the thing the Postmaster General undertook to do, but was not permitted to do under existing law. It is extremely important. A physician may not be convenient to the express company, and the only way he can receive drugs without great inconvenience is by their going through the mail from the manufacturer or the druggist in some of the larger towns. So it is a great convenience that the law should be amended as herein indicated, and there is every reason why we should not go beyond that.

Mr. WALSH. That is from the physician's point of view. Now, I am speaking for the patient who may not be convenient to the express office or the drug store and who may have been visited by a physician who may wish to send back medicine he has prescribed for his patient. We are amending this law, and I am suggesting that we submit this amendment to be made.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. There is considerable force in the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts, for sometimes in the country districts it would be very convenient, but the disadvantages are so many that I believe the average physician, or the great majority of physicians and veterinarians, would rather have the law remain as it is.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; so that he can charge for another visit when he carries the medicine back.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I hardly think the physician would visit the patient for that purpose.

Mr. STEENERSON. There would be more danger under the gentleman's proposal that the drug addicts might get it from physicians that were not particularly careful. That is the theory of the department in not extending it further to druggists.

Mr. WALSH. Unscrupulous physicians could get drugs from manufacturers under this amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. They could not get them by mail; they have got to be sent by the manufacturers and dealers, and these manufacturers and dealers are already regulated in sending habit-forming drugs.

Mr. WALSH. I am not talking about dealers. The gentleman said that unscrupulous physicians might send these drugs through the mails.

Mr. STEENERSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I did not say that; I said that a physician might get the drug from the dealer and then he might send it by mail, and therefore we have not extended it. This is an extension that the department, in its experience, has found necessary.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. An unscrupulous druggist in some city may desire to send out to the public some preparation which is a habit-forming drug. He may send it 3,000 miles away, and perhaps could get a large patronage for the article. If you amend this in the way suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts there would be no way to prevent his building up such a trade.

Mr. WALSH. This would only permit it to be done where the regulations of the Postmaster General would prevail, and a single complaint would result in withdrawing the permit from this unscrupulous druggist. But in view of the explanation made by the chairman of this committee and the gentleman from Washington, familiar with drugs and medicines and the practice of physicians, I will enter no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 217 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stats. L., p. 1131), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 217. That all kinds of poison, and all articles and compositions containing poison, and all poisonous animals, insects, and reptiles, and explosives of all kinds, and inflammable materials, and infernal machines, and mechanical, chemical, or other devices or compositions which may ignite or explode, and all disease germs or scabs, and all other natural or artificial articles, compositions, or materials, of whatever kind, which may kill or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, whether sealed as first-class matter or not, are hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or station thereof, nor by any letter carrier; but the Postmaster General may permit the transmission in the mails, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, of any articles hereinbefore described which are not outwardly or of their own force dangerous or injurious to life, health, or property: Provided, That all spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors of any kind are hereby declared to be nonmailable, and shall not be deposited in or carried through the mails. Whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail, according to the direction thereon or at any place at which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, unless in accordance with the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be prescribed by the Postmaster General, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than two years, or both; and whoever shall knowingly deposit or cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery, or shall knowingly cause to be delivered by mail, according to the direction thereon or at any place to which it is directed to be delivered by the person to whom it is addressed, anything declared by this section to be nonmailable, whether transmitted in accordance with the rules and regulations authorized to be prescribed by the Postmaster General or not, with the design, intent, or purpose to kill or in any wise hurt, harm, or injure another, or damage, deface, or otherwise injure the mails or other property, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "mails," insert "from the manufacturer thereof or dealer therein to licensed physicians, surgeons, dentists, pharmacists, druggists, and veterinarians."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STEENERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

IOWA TRIBE OF INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 806) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Iowa Tribe of Indians against the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection until I can state the pressing necessity of this claim?

Mr. WALSH. I am willing to concede the pressing necessity without any explanation.

Mr. McKEOWN. This bill has passed the Senate. It has been reported favorably in other Congresses several times. The amendments suggested by the Interior Department have been agreed to. If the gentleman has examined the report he will see that it has great merit and is not one of the usual class of claims that have been designated here as claims without merit sent to the Court of Claims.

In 1890 the United States made an agreement with these Indians. They wanted to procure their surplus lands, and in order to get an agreement that would induce other tribes to come in they told the Iowa Indians that if they would agree to it as an entering wedge to get other agreements, they would be accorded the same treatment as they would give the adjacent tribes of Kickapoos and Sacs and Fox. Relying on that agreement, the Indians agreed to an allotment of 80 acres of land, and the United States Government paid them 38 cents an acre for their surplus land, amounting to 207,000 acres.

After securing an agreement with the Indians as an inducement to the adjoining Indians, they allowed the Kickapoos 160 acres allotment and $1.25 an acre for the surplus lands. And the same treatment was accorded to the Sacs and Fox; they were likewise allotted 160 acres and paid $1.25 an acre for their land. All that the Iowa Indians are asking is opportunity to go into the courts to establish their rights to the difference; that they may be treated as the United States agreed they should be treated in the first instance; that they should be given amounts equal to those given the other tribes adjoining them. This bill has had the closest scrutiny of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House, and it was reported out favorably in the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. It passed the Senate. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes; and was reported out on the recommendation of Senator CURTIS, who, I think, scrutinizes the Indian claims very carefully, and who would not have given us this report if it was not a claim of merit, and one that appeals to the fairness of Congress. I hope the gentleman will reconsider his objection to the consideration of this bill at this time.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will reserve his objection on this bill. I have had hopes that the bill might be allowed to pass. The territory affected does not lie within my congressional district, but I have some personal knowledge of the situation that exists. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on March 3, 1889, a bill in the form of a rider on an appropriation bill was passed providing for the opening of the first land settlement in Oklahoma. It provided that a certain area of land, comprising about three or four counties in the center of Oklahoma, should be opened on the proclamation of the President within 30 days. Those lands had no Indians settled upon them at that time. I settled at Guthrie, Okla., at the first opening on April 22, 1889. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this was the beginning of Oklahoma, it was the birthday of Oklahoma, and from that little beginning we have now a state of 2,000,000 people with eight Representatives in this House and a representation equal to that of the other States in the Senate. There are few States that contribute more to the support of the National Government than does Oklahoma. More than half of them are contributing less in national taxes than the State of Oklahoma. That great State has grown in that way. All of the other lands in the State, now comprising, as it does, a large area, belonged to the Indians or were possessed in some title by the Indians. It was impossible to build a State there unless those Indians would enter into some kind of an agreement by which their surplus lands should be given to the white settlers. Congress by this same act authorized a commission of three men to go down into this territory and negotiate with these various tribes of Indians to surrender their surplus lands and make allotments. There was one tribe of Indians called the Iowa——

Mr. WALSH. How many in that tribe?

Mr. MORGAN. I think only about 100 or more. They were a docile tribe of Indians, good natured, pretty well developed. Here was this great commission, appointed by the authority of the United States Government to go into that terriory and plead with these Indians to get them to consent to give up their surplus lands in order that we might build a great State there and add to the strength of the Union. To whom did that commission first go, to what tribe? Not to the hostile and the backward tribes, but to the tribes they thought they could deal with most easily. They went to the Sac and Fox Tribes, within 2 miles of Guthrie, where I lived at that time. The gentleman knows the advantage the United States had over those Indians, untrained as they were. They said to the Iowa Indians, "We have come from the Great Father, who has sent us down here to ask you to give us your surplus land." They had 200,000 acres.

The commission gave them only 80 acres to each individual, and gave them 38 cents an acre for the surplus land. Those Indians, in their simplicity and innocence and their lack of training, entered into such an agreement. The Indians claim that there was certain talk outside of the written contract or agreement they made, by which, if the commission did better by other Indians, they would afterwards make recompense to them. I do not know how true that is, but necessarily there was much talk on the side, which the Indians, in their innocence, accepted as part of the contract.

Mr. WALSH. Much Indian talk.

Mr. MORGAN. I expect so; and I imagine also that the commissioners talked a great deal. I was personally acquainted with them, and I know they wanted to make a beginning, and they were in a situation where they could take advantage of the Indians. After they had made the start they went to the Sac and Fox Indians, living just beside them, and later on gave them a dollar and a quarter an acre for their land, with an allotment of 160 acres each. Then there are the Kickapoo Indians, living to the south, and some other tribes with whom they did likewise, though I think they gave the Kickapoo $1.50 an acre. Then, on the north were the Pawnees, and they treated them in the same way. Years go by, and these lands which the white settlers, citizens of the United States, obtained by paying a dollar and a quarter an acre, for which the Government gave 38 cents an acre, are now worth from $50 to $100 an acre. Those people have built up great institutions, equal, perhaps, to any in this Union, all because of the fact that the Government was capable of inducing this little Indian tribe to dispose of their lands at the ridiculous sum of 38 cents an acre. I know it is true that the Indian Department claims that the Iowa Indians did not have the same title to their lands that the Sac and Fox Indians had, but I do not think there is anything in that. These Indians had been induced to go from one of the Northern States, and had been transferred by the Government down into the Indian Territory, and a tract of 200,000 acres had been set apart for them.

This bill simply provides that a court of the United States—not a court of the Indians—can take this case and do what is right and equitable with these Indians. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], in view of all of these facts, will reconsider his decision to object to this bill. I have no interest in the matter; it is not in my district. I was living there at the time, and I know these men, and I did business with the people who settled that country. I think the gentleman would be doing an injustice to put this bill off the calendar and not allow it to be considered. I appeal to him in all sincerity and earnestness not to object to the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold his objection for an additional moment or two?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, broadly viewing the situation, the white man has just about got the Indian's scalp. Now, when we started the Indian held as his own practically everything in the United States. By chicanery, by force, and by treaty to-day the white man has practically everything the Indian had. We finally made a settlement with him, put him down into the Indian Territory, and said, "Now, here is where you have a final home. You are now in a country where the climate is fine, where the prairies are splendid, where there is plenty of game and plenty of water. Everything is just right for the Indian." That has not been so very many years ago, and to-day the Indians are practically euchered out of every foot of land in the Indian Territory. The Indian has no more right down there now than the white man. He has been beaten out of practically everything that he had except in isolated cases. In this particular instance the Indians have such a case that if any white litigant had it against the Government of the United States or against another State he would have had an opportunity to litigate it long ago. I think they should have a chance to litigate their rights in respect to this matter in a court of competent jurisdiction. There ought not to be any objection to this bill.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold his objection for a few moments?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold for the gentleman from Oklahoma to offer a suggestion.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, I suppose I voice the sentiment of almost all Oklahomanians when I say they very much desire these Indian matters shall be settled with the Indians, but nothing is settled until it is settled right. A part of the land in controversy here is in my district and I have taken particular pains to investigate this claim. I guess there have been 20 sets of people approaching me asking me to advocate and urge that certain claims of this nature be submitted to the Court of Claims of the United States for settlement. I have uniformly refused to do so, but in this case after a making a full investigation I am of the opinion it is one case in which there ought to be an exception made. When such a man as Horace Speed, formerly United States attorney of my State, a man whom I know personally——

Mr. MORGAN. And Horace Speed was secretary of this commission that went down there and knows all about the facts.

Mr. HARRELD. Knows all about the facts, and was afterwards United States attorney for that State. I am personally acquainted with Mr. Speed, and I do not believe he would misrepresent anything, and in this report there is a letter from him, in which he says that these representations outlined here by Mr. MORGAN and by Mr. MCKEOWN were actually made in his presence in order to induce that tribe to sell its lands for 38 cents an acre; and when a man like that, without any interest in the controversy, makes such a solemn statement of fact like that it convinces me there is something right and righteous about this claim, and I believe it is the one claim that ought to be excepted from the general rule.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the gentleman think, too, that this claim ought to be adjudicated when a man like Horace Speed, who was secretary of the commission, is still alive, and when his testimony can be secured? Most members of the commission, if not all, are dead, and pretty soon it will be urged that this is an old, stale claim. It is not the fault of the Indians, because they have been knocking at the doors of the Congress for a number of years trying to get the right to go into their own court for the purpose of having the matter adjudicated. Hence it is not the fault of the Indians that the claim has not been adjudicated, and it is not the fault of the Indians that the claim is stale, because they have been trying to have it adjudicated ever since these lands have been disposed of. I also desire to say, in my colleague's time, if he will permit, that this is a bill favorably reported by the Secretary of the Interior. They made some suggestion of an amendment when it was pending in the Senate, and that amendment was added to the Senate bill. So the bill now reported by the House Committee on Indian Affairs is the bill that passed the Senate with the amendment added which was suggested by the Secretary of the Interior. If I may be permitted one moment further, to say that this little tribe of western Oklahoma Indians was treated with by this commission in 1890, and they asserted from that time down to the present time that the representatives of the Government of the United States only gave them approximately 38 cents an acre, but promised to give them whatever it gave to the other tribes around them, and those adjacent tribes were paid $1.25 an acre. That is what they really want to have adjudicated. That is what they want to take to the Court of Claims. I thank my colleague for permiting me to inject these remarks in his time.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to add this word. Mr. MORGAN has had more experience, perhaps, in this particular instance than many of us. Mr. HASTINGS had had a varied experience in Indian Affairs.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, of course no claim against the United States is ever settled right until it is settled in favor of the claimant in the full amount of the claim, whether there is any justice to the claim or not and——

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield for a question or an observation.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is only almost persuaded, I want to suggest that there are other distinguished gentlemen from Oklahoma who could probably furnish whatever else that is necessary to convince the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to know the gentleman is interested in the matter. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

BRIDGE ACROSS MAHONING RIVER, YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12889) granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, at or near Division Street, in the city of Youngstown, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mahoning River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Division Street, in the city of Youngstown, in the county of Mahoning, in the State of Ohio, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman agree to allow the bill S. 806 to pass to the foot of the calendar, so that we may make further investigation.

Mr. WALSH. I will permit it to go to the foot of the calendar, but it is not necessary for me to make any further investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill objected to go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

VACANCY ON BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 167, providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the purpose of this bill of whomever has it in charge.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution to provide for the reelection of a gentleman, Mr. Charles F. Choate, jr., now a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, who, I think, has served for 12 years. He was unanimously chosen by the Committee on the Library.

Mr. BLANTON. It merely reelects him?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not provide for the filling of future vacancies?

Mr. LUCE. No. It is just a reelection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, that will occur on March 19, 1920, by reason of the expiration of the term of Charles F. Choate, jr., Massachusetts, be filled by the reappointment of the said Charles F. Choate, jr., for the ensuing term.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was read a third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

UNITED STATES DAUGHTERS OF 1812.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 10104) to renew patent No. 25909.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a certain design patent issued by the United States Patent Office of date August 11, 1896, being patent No. 25909, is hereby renewed and extended for a period of 14 years from and after the passage of this act, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to the same as of the original patent, being generally known as the badge of the United States Daughters of 1812.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, how long has this patent lapsed?

Mr. WALSH. It does not lapse until August 11, 1920.

Mr. GARD. There has been no lapse of the patent? It does not expire until August, 1920?

Mr. DYER. This is to prevent a lapse.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was again reported.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LANDS FOR POOR FARM, JOHNSON COUNTY, WYO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13157) authorizing the issuance of patent to Johnson County, Wyo., of lands for poor-farm purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I just want to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if this tract of 1,904 acres will be the only poor farm in the great State of Wyoming if this patent is authorized?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can accurately answer that, but I think this is one of the very few poor farms in the State.

Mr. WALSH. I am a little bit surprised, because in the great industrial States it has been claimed, and I think with some justice, that one of the beneficent results of the Volstead law has been to close up some of the poor farms, and we find now that as the result of the enactment of that legislation we must create a 2,000-acre poor farm in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. DYER. Wyoming has been prohibition for many years.

Mr. WALSH. Possibly that explains it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. That explanation is satisfactory.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I note in the report from the Secretary of the Interior he states that the northwest quarter northwest quarter section 7, as described in the bill, was sold and patent issued and could be eliminated from the description of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. After the Secretary's report was received it was discovered there was an error in including that 40-acre tract, and also an error which the commissioner had not called attention to in the description of another 40-acre tract, and in order to make the descriptions agree a new bill was introduced.

Mr. GARD. Has this bill, H. R. 13157, been so amended in the description as to meet the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. It has.

Mr. GARD. What is the purpose of making an addition to a poor farm? I presume by that term you mean a farm connected with the county infirmary—what is the purpose of putting an addition of something like 1,904 acres, more or less, to a poor farm, and how much acreage has the present poor farm?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the present acreage is perhaps upwards of 200 acres, possibly as much as 300 acres. The county has a tract adjacent to a little mountain stream, something less than 100 acres of which is worked. The land which they now desire to acquire is the rough, rocky, broken, brush-covered hill land lying back of this little mountain stream, land which they have used as a grazing ground for the small herd of cattle they have had in connection with this farm.

Mr. GARD. How are these poor, lame, and halt people who have met with adversity in the State of Wyoming going to get the cattle in on this reservation of 1,904 rocky acres?

Mr. MONDELL. It is not a difficult thing to drive the cows home.

Mr. WALSH. They will roll down hill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had had the great good fortune, as most of us did have, of having been born on a farm, he would know that the cows come home in the evening.

Mr. GARD. Is it the purpose to pasture the cows on this reservation?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; to pasture the stock and some sheep that are kept in connection with the poor farm.

Mr. GARD. Is there anything on these 1,900 acres that the cows can eat?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; grass. While it is sparse, it is good.

Mr. GARD. Have you to arm each cow with a searchlight to find the sparse grass?

Mr. MONDELL. No. They find it.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Ohio does not think that the State of Wyoming would want this land if it were useless.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not useless. It will make an excellent pasture for these cows, but it takes a good many acres to support one of them.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state to the gentleman from Wyoming that the cows, as well as the politicians in Wyoming, are energetic and vigilant, and if there is any grass there they will find it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARD. I will suggest to the gentleman along the same line, that we have adopted amendments to other bills providing certain amendments relative to the price of $1.25 per acre. Has the gentleman any objection to incorporating such a provision here?

Mr. MONDELL. Relative to what?

Mr. GARD. Other bills that we have passed fix the nominal price at $1.25 an acre. Amendments have been offered to other bills by adding the words "not less than."

Mr. MONDELL. This land was appraised by the Government appraisers. It was part of an old military reservation that was abandoned some 35 years ago, and some years ago appraised formally. These lands were appraised at $1.25 per acre. They could be bought by an individual at $1.25, and the bill simply provides that the county shall pay the appraised price, the price at which the gentleman from Ohio can buy these lands.

Mr. GARD. If I had the money I would. The report says, "It appears that Congress has been liberal in the disposal of land within the Fort McKinney Military Reservation to the city of Buffalo and county of Johnson in the State of Wyoming, but if Congress sees fit to authorize the sale of 1,500 acres additional land on this reservation to Johnson County I have no objection to such action provided the bill is amended," so and so.

Mr. MONDELL. He knew he could not have any objection to selling to the county what any individual could buy at the same price.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, individuals are not running around buying poor farms.

Mr. GARD. That amendment that I spoke of, and an additional amendment providing that that discretion shall be vested in the Secretary of the Interior, as we have adopted heretofore on other bills, would make the bill satisfactory to me. Has the gentleman any objection to that?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not object to that; but I do not know how the Secretary would interpret the words "not less than." If Congress does not expect him to sell at $1.25, which is the appraised price which his agents have placed upon it, then I think Congress should put in some other price.

Mr. GARD. That is the minimum price that is paid.

Mr. MONDELL. No. That is the sale price. That is the price at which this land can be bought. It is the price they fixed upon it. I do not know just how the Secretary would construe that language.

Mr. GARD. I do not think there would be any trouble in the construction of the language. I have no objection to the passage of the bill if these two amendments are agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to Johnson County, Wyo., upon said county paying to the United States the sum of $1.25 per acre, patent conveying the following lands contiguous to the county poor farm, containing 1,904 acres, more or less, to wit: Southeast quarter southeast quarter section 2; south half southwest quarter, southwest quarter southeast quarter, and lot 4, section 1; east half northeast quarter, section 11; northwest quarter, west half northeast quarter, west half southeast quarter, and lots 1, 2, 3, and 4, section 12; lot 3, section 13, all in township 50 north, range 83 west; south half southwest quarter section 6; northeast quarter northwest quarter, south half northwest quarter, southwest quarter northeast quarter, southwest quarter, northwest quarter southeast quarter, south half southeast quarter, section 7; north half northwest quarter, north half northeast quarter, and lots 7, 8, 9, and 10, section 18; southwest quarter southwest quarter, south half southeast quarter, section 8; southwest quarter southwest quarter section 9; north half northeast quarter and lots 5, 6, and 8, section 17, all in township 50 north, range 82 west, sixth principal meridian, containing 1,904 acres, more or less.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, on line 3, page 1, of the bill, after the word "hereby," I offer to amend by inserting the words "in his discretion."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 3, after the word "hereby," insert the words "in his discretion."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, just what is the gentleman's purpose in offering that sort of an amendment?

Mr. GARD. Why, the purpose in that sort of an amendment is to provide discretionary action to be vested in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MONDELL. But the Secretary is directed by this bill to sell this land. You can not direct the Secretary to sell the land and then say the direction shall be in his discretion.

Mr. GARD. I realize that it is a direction, and that there may be certain——

Mr. MONDELL. But it is confusing to say that "the Secretary in his discretion is hereby directed." It does not seem to me the logical thing to do. I think the Secretary would have a hard time determining just what it was that the Congress expected of him. Here are lands that the agents of the department have said were worth $1.25 an acre. The Congress has concluded to sell them to this county, which can not go into the market and buy them as an individual could. We have directed him to sell them. It does not seem to me it is logical to use the words which the gentleman has suggested.

Mr. GARD. Well, if I am mistaken about it, I will be very glad to have it corrected. I do not desire to offer anything that would be illogical or confusing to the Secretary. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ROOSEVELT NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5006) to add certain lands to the Sequoia National Park, Calif., and to change the name of said park to Roosevelt National Park.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over and remain on the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object. It ought to go to the foot of the calendar if it is passed over at all. If the gentleman will consent to its being placed at the foot of the calendar, I shall not object.

Mr. ELSTON. I am in rather a helpless position.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its going to the foot of the calendar?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

STREET PAVING, ETC., IN FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11024) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914," approved June 30, 1913.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay, out of any funds of the Creek, Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, the proportionate cost of street paving, construction of sidewalks and sewers abutting on unsold lots belonging to any of said tribes and as may be properly chargeable against said town lots, said payments to be made upon submission of proof to said Secretary of the Interior showing the entire cost of the said street paving, sidewalk, and sewer construction, and that said improvement was duly authorized and undertaken in accordance with law: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that the charges made are reasonable and that the lots belonging to the above-mentioned tribes against which the charges were made have been enhanced in value by said improvement to not less than the amount of said charges.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PRICES OF OIL AND GASOLINE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House resolution 501, authorizing and directing the Attorney General to investigate the price of oil and report to the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. HOWARD. I will reserve it.

Mr. DYER. This is not a resolution directing the Attorney General to investigate. It has been amended so as to provide that the Federal Trade Commission shall make the investigation.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the reason I object. I have not seen any results from these investigations, and I think that business has been harassed about enough by some of these investigations. Therefore I object.

Mr. DYER. There is great need of this investigation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL MILITARY PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12502) providing for a report on the cost of improving and maintaining the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of ascertaining the cost of improvement and maintaining in proper condition for travel the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, from the north end of said road, near East Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, Tenn., to Rossville, in Walker County, Ga. (a distance of 7 or 8 miles), the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause an examination of said road to be made, and a report to be made by the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park Commission of the approximate cost of such improvement and the manner in which it can be and should be done. The said commission shall report estimates of the cost of said improvement by concrete surface, and other proper methods. The cost of concrete surface, gutters, excavations, and fills wherever necessary shall be reported, and the cost of graveling excavations and fills, if that method shall be deemed best; and the maintenance of such road, per annum, by oiling and other means, shall also be reported.

No material change shall be made in the line of the road as now established, nor shall the cost of any excavations or fills be considered except where it may be absolutely necessary for a first-class boulevard; but estimates for the cost of widening the road wherever it shall be necessary shall be made.

It shall also report what the cost of concreting the road in its present condition, without additional fills or excavations will be; and the cost of graveling and maintenance per annum would be, including oiling and the difference between the cost and maintenance of a concrete road per annum and the graveled and oiled road.

The commission shall report to the Secretary of War, as herein provided, within four months from the passage of this act, and the Secretary of War shall transmit this report to Congress with his recommendations in the premises.

The cost of such examination and report shall not exceed $1,000, and so much of said sum as is necessary to make such examination and report is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MOON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12466) authorizing the granting of certain irrigation easements in the Yellowstone National Park, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Unless it goes to the foot of the calendar, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I modify my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill go to the foot of the calendar. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WOMEN'S BUREAU IN THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13229) to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the Women's Bureau.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it; yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to use any strong-arm methods to secure the passage of a bill that ought to pass by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In a moment. This bill simply provides authority of law for the establishment of a bureau which is now carried in the Department of Labor by the Committee on Appropriations from year to year. The appropriations for the maintenance of this bureau can be objected to by any Member of the House and must go out of the bill on a point of order.

When the Congress finally adjourns this bureau will be provided for by the Committee on Appropriations. The bureau should be established and secured under authority of law. There are many thousands of women now engaged in the active industries of the country. This bureau was created during the war.

It was found that it could and did do a work that was worthy of its creation. The fact developed that there was much to be done at that time by the bureau. Thousands of women employed in the industries of the country during the war are continuing in their employment, and as the years come and go in the future more and more women will be employed in the industries of the country. It is hardly compatible with the attitude of the American people toward those engaged in the industries of the country that they should not have some sympathetic way of reaching the authorities and of bringing to the attention of the country any special needs they may have. It is for that purpose that this bill was introduced and reported favorably by the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman might help the situation some by mentioning the almost unanswerable arguments made by Mrs. Bass in the hearings on this bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes. I had not thought of going into all the details of this bill at this time. It is inconceivable that Congress will not enact this bill into law. It should be done by unanimous consent. If it is not, it will be enacted. I wish the gentleman from Massachusetts would withdraw his objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it for a minute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say that there are 12,000 women engaged in industry. The bureau was established in 1918, and has been carried along by the Appropriation Committee, and there is no extra expense involved further than what we appropriate from year to year. I will say that among the associations and orders that are asking for this appropriation is the Russell Sage Foundation, the director of the industrial study——

Mr. WALSH. I have read those names; they are all in the report, including the Republican national committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the Democratic national committee.

Mr. WALSH. The woman's bureau of the Democratic national committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Women are asking for it all over the country, and as long as they have this organization for men it occurs to me that, inasmuch as the sun is shining a little and the clouds are clearing away for the women, this little small bureau, without any extra expense to the Government, ought to receive this recognition.

Mr. BLANTON. And Delaware might reconsider.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It might be that they would see the light.

Mr. RAKER rose.

Mr. WALSH. I am afraid that somebody will say something that they might hereafter regret, and I think we had better not prolong this debate. I do not know what the gentleman from Kansas referred to when he alluded to strong-arm methods. I felt rather secure, however, because the majority leader happened to be sitting between us. [Laughter.] But if there is anything ferocious in that action I would probably be persuaded to yield, although this is not the first time that strong-arm methods have been threatened, and in fact used in connection with the demand of the women of this country. They got suffrage through Congress by strong-arm methods, as is well known, to which many sensible and calm gentlemen yielded. But I am opposed to continuing these bureaus that were created during the war. Now, the 12,000 women in industry——

Mr. HERSEY. Twelve million women.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Michigan said 12,000. Well, we will admit it is 12,000,000, which is overstating the number—they can get along without this bureau.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I will yield for a question if the gentleman asks a question, which he usually does not.

Mr. RAKER. If—and it can be done—— [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it can be done in the way the gentleman is starting out. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Would not it be better to let this go through by unanimous consent rather than to bring all the people up before the Committee on Rules and get a rule to put it through?

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from California think that is what the gentleman from Kansas meant by strong-arm methods?

Mr. RAKER. I do not speak for the gentleman from Kansas. I am asking a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. It might be better to let it go through by unanimous consent if you get the unanimous consent, for those interested in it, including the women, rather than to make those interested in it, including the women, go before the Committee on Rules and insist on getting a rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I imagine that is what the distinguished gentleman from Kansas meant when he referred to the strong-arm methods—that he probably had a rule in his hip pocket, as he usually does.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Texas has a vivid imagination which is working and in good running order. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN FLOOD CONTROL WORK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3263) to authorize the construction of flood control and improvement works in Minnesota River and Big Stone Lake between the States of Minnesota and South Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I understand this bill is the beginning of authorization of work by the Committee on Flood Control in the matter of controlling the flood waters of the Minnesota River and rivers in the Northwest, and that this project is to be without Government expense.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no Government expense connected with it; it is simply an authorization permitting the States through various drainage districts to carry out certain improvements.

Mr. GARD. I think this is one of the best bills I have seen. It recognizes not alone the rights of the States but the duties of States in protecting their own territory.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Minnesota Valley Drainage and Flood Control District, organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, and the Big Stone Lake Drainage and Flood Control District, organized and existing under the laws of the State of South Dakota, are hereby authorized to construct a dam across Minnesota River at the foot of Big Stone Lake, together with such dikes, spillways, diversion channels, and other works in said river and lake as the said districts may agree upon as necessary for the prevention and control of floods, the improvement of navigation, and the drainage of land: Provided, That plans for the works hereby authorized shall be submitted to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Engineers for their approval, and unless, and until, approved by them no part of the said works shall be built or commenced.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DRAINAGE OF INDIAN ALLOTMENTS, FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 517) amending an act to provide for drainage of Indian allotments of the Five Civilized Tribes, approved March 27, 1914 (38 Stat., 310; Public, No. 77).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] give me a little more explanation than is covered in the letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. McKEOWN. This simply amends the present act and permits an increase from $15 to $25. It permits drainage districts to be created, which is the present law, but on account of the increased cost of material and labor, and because under the present circumstances no drainage district can be formed at the price of $15, this permits an increase to $25. There is no charge against the United States.

Mr. WALSH. It is an enlarged assessment against the members of the drainage of the district?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And that is the only change in existing law?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That public act No. 77 (38 Stats., 310), approved March 27, 1914, an act to provide for drainage of Indian allotments of the Five Civilized Tribes, be and is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"That whenever a drainage district is organized in any county in the Five Civilized Tribes of the State of Oklahoma, under the laws of that State, for the purpose of draining the lands within such district, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to pay from the funds or moneys arising from any source under his control or under the control of the United States, and which would be prorated to such allottee, the assessment for drainage purposes against any Indian allottee or upon the lands of any allottee who is not subject to taxation, or whose lands are exempt from taxation or from assessment for taxation under the treaties or agreements with the tribes to which such allottee may belong, or under any act of Congress; and such amount so paid out shall be charged against such allottee's pro rata share of any funds to his credit under the control of the Secretary of the Interior or the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, before paying out such funds, shall designate some person with a knowledge of the subject of drainage, to review the schedules of assessment against each tract of land and to review the land assessed to ascertain whether such Indian allottee, or his lands not subject to taxation, have been assessed more than their pro rata share as compared with other lands located in said district similarly situated and deriving like benefits. And if such Indian lands have been assessed justly when compared with other assessments, then, in that event, said funds shall be paid to the proper county in which said drainage district may be organized, or, in the option of the Secretary of the Interior, to the construction company or bondholder shown to be entitled to the funds arising from such assessment: Provided further, That in any event such assessment on any Indian allotment shall not exceed $25 per acre, and no such assessment shall be made unless the Indian allottee affected, or his legal guardian, shall consent thereto: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive any allottee of any right which he might otherwise have individually to apply to the courts for the purpose of having his rights adjudicated."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCKEOWN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS WHITE RIVER, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3779) to authorize the Ozark Forest road improvement district of Baxter County, Ark., to construct and maintain a bridge across the White River near Norfork, Ark.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted to the Ozark Forest road improvement district of Baxter County, Ark., created by act No. 570 of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas of the session of 1919, its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the White River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, near Norfork, Ark., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TILLMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF ISOLATED TRACTS, FORT BERTHOLD INDIAN RESERVATION, N. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 13139) for the sale of isolated tracts in the former Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the amount of land proposed to be included in this bill, and just what does the bill mean by extending the provisions of section 455 of the Revised Statutes to land within a portion of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation has been all allotted, and also all of the surplus land after the Indian allotments were made has been disposed of under the homestead, mineral, and town-site act, a special act; but it did not provide for the disposal of isolated tracts. This reservation being cut by the Missouri River, there are left small tracts of 40 acres or less, and the purpose of the bill is to dispose of these small meandered tracts. The bill has been recommended by the Department of the Interior, and it was at their suggestion that it has been introduced.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is any of this land occupied by the settlers?

Mr. SINCLAIR. No; the tracts affected are too small to be homesteads and nobody wants them for that purpose. It is merely to clean up all of the remaining lands of the reservation.

Mr. McKEOWN. Just little odds and ends.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes; that is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. GARD. These small pieces are supposed to be purchased by people who own lands contiguous thereto?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes.

Mr. GARD. They are not large enough to make homestead tracts of them?

Mr. SINCLAIR. No.

Mr. GARD. And the purpose of this bill is to enable the General Land Office to sell these small tracts to people who may own land immediately adjacent thereto?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that the number of the faithful here has dwindled now down to 23. Does the gentleman want to go on with that number?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I would like to pass this to-night.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman understands that 23 is a rather ominous number.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by the act of March 28, 1912 (37 Stat. L., p. 77), relating to the sale at public auction of isolated tracts of the public domain, be, and the same are hereby, extended and made applicable to lands within the portion of the Fort Berthold Indian Reservation, N. Dak., opened under the act of June 1, 1910 (36 Stat. L., p. 455): Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to lands which are not subject to homestead entry: Provided further, That purchasers of land under this act must pay for the lands not less than the price fixed in the law opening the lands to homestead entry.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "sale," insert the words "at public auction."

Page 2, line 2, after the word "act," strike out the word "must" and insert the word "shall."

Page 2, line 4, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "such."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments..

The committee amendments were agree to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINCLAIR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISPOSITION OF CERTAIN CROW INDIAN LANDS IN MONTANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 30) to permit the disposition of certain lands in Montana ceded by the Crow Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DYER rose.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] There is no quorum present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering a call of the House.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HOWARD) there were—ayes 17, noes 3.

So a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

PRICE OF GASOLINE.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House resolution 501 with a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves to suspend the rules and pass House resolution 501 with a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 501.

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to make an immediate inquiry and investigation into the causes of the recent advances in the price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products and to report to the House not later than June 1, 1920; and in reporting the foregoing the Federal Trade Commission is requested to take into consideration and to report the sources of oil supply for the United States and the profits of said business, and what, if any, combinations in restraint of trade exist between those engaged in this business, and what effect, if any, the same have upon the market price of fuel oil, kerosene, gasoline, and other petroleum products with reference to the price charged to the ultimate consumer.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma demands a second.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Oklahoma to 20 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution presented from the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously, and asks that the Federal Trade Commission be requested to make an investigation with reference to the increased price of gasoline, fuel oil, kerosene oil, and other petroleum products. During the past few months these products have increased very greatly, and they have become a burden to thousands of people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to apologize to the Members of the House for having called them back here at this time of the evening, and I should not have done so had I not considered that the resolution which is now attempted to be considered by this House, without very much consideration elsewhere, was of greater importance, perhaps, than many of us realized. I want a full and fair consideration of this matter, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that it has been my observation that for the last four or five years there has been in this country too much handicapping of business by interfering with it for political and every other reason that some one might surmise to bring forth to harass people who are engaged in legitimate business. The resolution which you are asked to consider at this time will bring about, gentlemen, no further result than possibly some political benefit that might accrue to some few Members of this House in the fact that they had part in an investigation that will bring to one of the most extensive industries of this country harassment and probably depreciation of stocks and properties, and might result in financial misfortune to many of our citizens. I would have no objection to a legitimate investigation of a business which would bring us some results, but I say to you that it has been my observation that such proposed investigations amount to nothing more nor less than harassment to business for a few months and an expenditure of a large amount of the people's money. I want to pause to suggest here, my friends, that if you want an investigation of profiteering, if you want to go into matters that are not luxuries but matters which are necessities to every man and woman and child in this country, come and go with me into the district of the author of this resolution who is seeking to harass the oil business and you will find that the shoe for which you used to pay $1.55 a pair manufactured in his district now sells for $4 a pair, when there are just as many hides, just as much material, and many less people to wear them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did my colleague say $4 or $14?

Mr. HOWARD. Four dollars at wholesale.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought you made some mistake. I thought you meant $14.

Mr. HOWARD. They probably sell at that at retail.

But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the Congress, I am confident that you will pass this resolution. It has been a great habit for years to talk against the oil business. I want it understood in my discussion of this matter and in my position on it that I represent in my own district over a thousand independent oil companies who, in a liberal, honest manner, are carrying on their business. In the State of Oklahoma are over 125 little refineries that have been almost choked to death already by these political investigations and by political legislation. And I say to you as business men, as Members of the Congress of the United States, that the time has about arrived in the history of this country for us to extend some relief to legitimate business instead of hampering it with high taxation and harassing it with such investigations as this, and let business move, and let the world get back to normal conditions.

Let us see what has been the condition of this oil industry, which has been such a bugaboo to some of our friends. The oil industry, I want to emphasize, my friends, has no fear of a legitimate investigation, and I am not objecting by reason of fear but objecting in the interest of business and in the interest of letting this country get back to normal conditions as quickly as possible.

Yet, to those most familiar with that business, the question presents itself, "Why an investigation of the one industry which distinguished itself above all others during the war and up to the present time in efficiency, promptitude, and patriotic endeavor to supply the petroleum needs of the allied world, when other industries, not so distinguished, are permitted to pursue their unpatriotic course of profiteering through manipulation of prices and deliberate limitation of production?"

Whatever may be said of the oil men, it can not be successfully maintained that they have ever loafed on the job. When we entered the war and the Government was hurriedly taking over one industry after another, great anxiety was expressed concerning the supply of gasoline and oil for the allied armies at the western front. Representatives of the oil industry were called in to see what could be done to secure such a supply. There was talk of taking over the oil business. But the prompt answer of the oil representatives was that already, and in advance of the American Army, in advance of Government action, there was an adequate supply of American gasoline and oil at the western front and more of it was on its way across the Atlantic in American-owned tankers, while a continuous further supply was being transported across the continent to the Atlantic seaboard in tank cars and pipe lines owned and operated by American oil men.

Never during the great World War did the American petroleum industry fall down, lag behind, nor bicker nor bluster about prices, nor whine for special privilege. You will recall the true statement that we "floated to victory on a sea of oil."

During the war the oil industry, in order to maintain the supply, underwent many sacrifices. At its own expense it organized and maintained committees to stabilize the price and apportion crude oil equitably among the refiners. Many producers gave up premiums and advantageous contracts in order to serve the governmental requirements by sending their oil elsewhere. Responsive to the demand for more oil, Oklahoma operators, with large tracts of likely oil land under lease but undeveloped, called in their drillers from "wildcat" territory in order to concentrate their activities on what is called "inside drilling." That is to say, at the request of the Government they abandoned or postponed initial wells necessary to hold their undeveloped acreage against the forfeiture clause in the leases in order to use all their equipment in drilling those small but sure oil wells on tracts already producing.

This was considered a surer way of maintaining the supply than the other, because such a large percentage of wildcat wells are failures. But the result of this, particularly in the Osage Nation in Oklahoma, is a loss to operators who are required to begin development on leases in a certain time or suffer forfeiture. Many such forfeitures have taken place and will occur during the year.

With the armistice signed and the operators at liberty to return to exploration and discovery work on new leases, they were confronted with a scarcity of oil-field tubular goods, with prices of all materials and labor mounting skyward. To-day it is almost impossible for oil producers to obtain pipe and casing through the usual distributing agencies or at published prices. But the oil fields are swarming with brokers, ex-bookkeepers, and clerks representing unknown profiteering syndicates and offering pipe at unheard-of prices. The operator must pay the extortionate price or lose his properties. Why not investigate the supply of pipe?

The oil producers and refiners are not profiteers. The average cost in 1912 and 1913 of drilling and equipping a 2,500-foot well in Oklahoma was $12,500; in 1919 it was $35,000 to $40,000. Now it is $40,000 to $50,000. In the deeper fields in Texas the cost is around $75,000 per well, many of which deplete 100 per cent in 12 to 15 months. When you add to this cost the large number of dry holes you must realize that, owing to causes not within the control of the oil operator, it is exceedingly expensive as well as hazardous to attempt to produce oil.

I have given you the initial cost of drilling wells, but do not get the impression that when an operator has drilled a well his troubles are over. He must proceed to operate his property, drill other wells, build tanks, acquire new acreage, and so forth. Likely oil land close to production costs from $1,000 to $10,000 per acre; derricks, machinery, supplies, and labor cost many times what they did in prewar times.

Another thought. The primary consideration is how to get more oil to satisfy the ever-increasing demand. In order to keep up the supply we must continue to pump and operate the small well. By the small well I mean the one producing from a fraction of a barrel to 10 barrels per day. There are thousands of these. They collectively produce much more than half of the total supply of crude oil in this country to-day. You do not hear of these. You hear of the gushers. But they are few and far between. Furthermore, they soon subside. Thereafter, by careful handling and much expensive cleaning out and pumping, they may produce a barrel or two a day for a number of years. But the point is that these small wells can not be drilled and operated at a profit when the price of oil is low, especially while the prices of labor and materials remain where they are now. The inevitable result of reducing the price of oil will be an abandonment of the small well and a consequent material reduction of the supply of oil. While the operators were patriotic enough to operate many of these small wells at a loss during the war, you can not expect them to do it to-day. Rather than maintain them at a loss they will be forced, if interfered with in their legitimate operations, to pull the casing and sell it to some other operator at the outrageous prices now prevailing for oil-field pipe and tubular goods.

Finally, let me impress upon you that the oil industry is no longer in the hands of one company or coterie of operators, but is owned largely by a great number of independent, legitimate, and energetic American business men and thousands of investors throughout the United States. This industry has been legislated against, taxed at every turn, regulated without reason, villified, discriminated against, misrepresented, and now it is proposed to investigate it!

Gentlemen, this is the record of the industry that you now propose to harass by an investigation. I have already recalled, my friends, that over a year ago a distinguished Member of this Congress said that we floated to victory on a sea of oil. This oil was produced by these producers and these little refiners, who will be harassed by this kind of an investigation.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNYDER. Now, the gentleman is well posted on this oil question. There is no doubt about that. What I would like him to explain is whether or not the consumption of crude oil is as great as it was during the period of which he speaks, when the oil men were ahead of the game and had the oil and gasoline on the west front in time? And, if it is no greater now than it was then, why is it that during the period since the armistice has been signed fuel oil dropped from 12 cents to 4½ and is now back to 11, and the increase in the last 30 days in the question of fuel oil is greater than 60 per cent? In other words, 25 days ago we paid 6½ cents for fuel oil delivered on the sidetrack and to-day it is 11 cents. Those are things I would like to have explained. While the time for taking off restrictions from business has come, there are certain reasons that make me think an investigation of this kind might be of advantage.

Mr. HOWARD. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question, and I will state in reply thereto——

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASTINGS. This is a very important question that the gentleman is discussing, and I think we ought to have a quorum present. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order that a quorum has already been determined by a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to make a point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-three Members are present; not a quorum.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I call for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 140.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 261 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, proceeding further along the line of my argument, that the investigation of this question is useless, that it only tends to harass business and add to the difficulties of legitimate business, I want to answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] by stating that the statistics show that during the month of February the stocks of oil on hand decreased 1,500,000 barrels, notwithstanding the fact that for the month of February, 1920, the production of oil was over 200,000 barrels daily more than it was during February, 1919.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why does the gentleman object to an official statement of an official body of the administration as to the facts that he is now stating?

Mr. HOWARD. Simply and solely because the statistics, if studied by anyone, would demonstrate that an investigation of this subject is not necessary, and during the pendency of that investigation it is only harassing American business, which, to my mind, is already too much harassed at the present time.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I can not yield further, as I have only five minutes.

In further answer to the question propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], I want to say that the consumption of fuel oil has increased during the last few months very materially. For instance, there have just been turned out at the Government shipyards at Hog Island 97 freight ships which are burning oil. On every hand the consumption of fuel oil is increasing. Just a few days ago the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad, in Texas and Oklahoma, converted their coal-burning engines into oil burners.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend one moment. The Chair wishes to notify the gentleman that he was mistaken when he said the gentleman had 12 minutes remaining. He had only 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOWARD. The facts are, as I said before, that the stocks of oil on hand have decreased 1,500,000 barrels since last February. The consumption of oil to-day amounts to 61,000 barrels more per day than is being produced daily.

Now, these statistics, I say, tend to show why the price of oil has advanced, and why it will continue to advance, until in a very short time, if the industry is to be hampered on every hand, we will be looking in this world for something to use as a substitute for the gasoline that we are now producing; and this, my friends, in the face of the fact that in over 100 counties in Texas and in Kansas and Oklahoma the drills are running night and day in the attempt to keep up the supply.

Now, in conclusion, I want to submit to you what the chief geologist of the United States has to say relative to the oil situation. I read:

Now, listen to this:

But while the United States has contributed far more than half (61 per cent) of the oil that the world has used for nearly 60 years, we have already reached the point where we are consuming more oil than we produce. Is this position of the world's greatest user of petroleum as safe as it is spectacular?

We are the world's greatest consumers of petroleum, but, impressive as are the 1918 figures of consumption—413,077,113 barrels—no mind can easily grasp the idea of that quantity. Truly it is a flood of oil, for if spread over the 60 square miles of the District of Columbia these 413,000,000 barrels would cover the area to a depth of nearly a foot and a half.

HUGE NETWORK OF PIPES.

Beginning with 4 miles of iron pipe laid down in western Pennsylvania at the close of the Civil War, this system now embraces a huge network of buried pipes from 4 to 8 inches in diameter, trunk lines and laterals, aggregating nearly 30,000 miles.

When most of us were in school "oil" meant kerosene, and gasoline or benzine was something to be bought in a bottle at the drug store or the paint shop.

To-day oil has become the premier motive power, not only on land and sea but even in the heavens above and the depths below—truly the best servant of Mars and Mercury.

Marshal Foch is quoted as saying that "a drop of gasoline was worth in war a drop of blood."

The number and variety of uses of petroleum and its products are continually increasing, but even more striking is our increased dependence upon a few of the products of the oil refinery, notably gasoline, kerosene, the many types of lubricating oils, and fuel oil.

PRODUCTS OF PETROLEUM.

There are said to be 300 or more products of petroleum, each with its own use. Some of these products serve merely our convenience, such as the artificial "vanilla" flavoring or the cover of paraffin on the jar of jelly or marmalade; others were found during the war period to be absolutely essential to industry on a large scale; for example, the heavy oil used in tempering steel plates.

It is when we think of the marvelous growth of the automotive industry that we realize a future demand for lubrication that staggers even the prophetic statistician. With more than 6,000,000 pleasure automobiles operated in the United States alone we have an annual consumption estimated, by the officials of the foremost company manufacturing high-grade lubricants, at 120,000,000 gallons of lubricating oil, where 20 years ago the demand for this purpose was practically nothing.

A few years ago the amount of lubricating oil used in this country was almost insignificant. Last year we used 120,000,000 gallons of lubricating oil alone. From every factory come the automobile, the tractor, the aeroplane, the oil-burning boat, and the oil-burning railroad, calling upon the pioneers who go out and wildcat, if you please, to secure oil, to produce more.

The oil industry fears nothing so far as this investigation is concerned except the hampering of business during its pendency; but it is now hampered, it is now loaded down with high taxes and high cost of material, and after you make this investigation, after you have spent at least $200,000 of the people's money in doing so—and this is one of the main reasons why I am opposing this resolution—you will have learned nothing more than you can know to-day if you will call upon any of several of the departments which now have the available statistics at hand. The amount of money expended will have been wasted; again the taxpayer will be called upon to pay the bill; some few may have benefited politically, and you will know, as you should know now and can know if you will take the time to inquire, that the price of oil has increased and will increase by reason of the law of supply and demand, the demand being very much greater, and growing greater each day, than the available supply. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if I were to cast a selfish vote for the interest of my district alone, I would vote against this resolution, for in my district there flow from only two counties over 100,000 barrels of oil every day. But in casting my vote I am going to vote for this resolution, because it is in the interest of all the people of the United States. [Applause.] In reaching a conclusion on every vote I have cast in Congress I have been guided only by one principle—what is best for all of the people of my country?

Ten years ago gasoline sold for 8 and 10 cents a gallon. Now, in the city of Washington, it sells for 30 cents a gallon, having only recently been advanced from 25 cents, and within less than 200 miles of Washington it costs 35 cents a gallon, notwithstanding the fact that new fields have been discovered all over the United States. In the district of my friend Mr. PARRISH there are now flowing 150,000 barrels of oil a day.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not, because I have only two minutes, and the gentleman from Oklahoma has 20 minutes. I am sure he does not want to be hoggish. What I am speaking against now is hoggishness, a thing which ought not to prevail among the oil refineries and producers who are bringing in so many big, new oil fields all over the United States. They ought not to raise the price of gasoline just because they find a ready market for it. They ought not to impose upon the people of the United States simply because gasoline must be had and the people must have it and have to pay whatever the big oil companies ask for it. I am speaking in behalf of all the people of the United States, who do not want gasoline sold for 32 and 35 cents a gallon when it ought to be sold for 20 cents, in comparison with present prevailing prices of crude oil, and still give a good profit to the promoters of these industries. I want every oil field in my State and every other State of this Nation developed, but I do not want to see these big oil companies find out where the oil is and then cap up development and only bring the oil to the surface as they can sell it at advanced prices. I want to see wells developed and not new fields capped up. [Applause.]

This resolution will not harm the citizens in oil fields who are now drawing their one-eighth royalties from the oil taken from underneath their lands. If the oil companies and refineries are not making too great a profit, they will not be disturbed. But if they are making too great a profit, in comparison with the price of crude oil, then the people of the land should be protected.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to use any more of my time, and I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 5213. An act for the relief of occupants and claimants of unsurveyed public land in township 8 north of range 2 west of Salt Lake meridian, Utah;

H. R. 10207. An act providing for service of process in causes removed from a State or other court to a United States court;

H. R. 6773. An act for the relief of Albert C. Burgess;

H. R. 6772. An act authorizing and directing the transfer approximately of 10 acres of land to Rural High School District No. 1, Lapwai, Idaho;

H. R. 6413. An act granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard;

H. R. 6291. An act for the relief of E. Willard;

H. R. 6136. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to School District No. 21, of Fremont County, Wyo.;

H. R. 3211. An act for the relief of Emma J. Spear;

H. R. 1791. An act for the relief of O. W. Lindsley;

H. R. 1275. An act for the relief of W. L. Rose;

H. R. 202. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for a certain described tract of land for public park purposes; and

H. J. Res. 222. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

COTTON.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the campaign director of the American Cotton Association on the Comer amendment to the Agricultural bill. This is a matter in which the southern Representatives are interested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

AMERICAN COTTON ASSOCIATION,
MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN HEADQUARTERS,
Senate Chamber State Capitol, Atlanta, Ga., March 27, 1920.

Hon. B. B. COMER, United States Senator,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I was very much gratified to note in the press this morning reference to a Senate resolution introduced by you requiring the delivery on contracts purchased through the exchange of at least 50 per cent of good spinnable cotton. The price of spot cotton will always be artificially depressed so long as these contracts can be filled on basis the average of the lower grades.

It is a pernicious system of manipulation which is totally unfair to both the cotton growers and the spinners. Any exchange which can not comply with the legitimate rules and regulations of fair dealings between both the purchaser and the seller has no legal right of existence.

I beg, therefore, in behalf of the American Cotton Association, to thank you fully for the splendid and efficient service you are rendering to the entire cotton industry of this country through the proposed legislation.

We certainly expect you to be with us during the cotton convention to deliver your promised address and will be greatly disappointed if you fail us.

With cordial good wishes,
Yours, very truly,

HARVIE JORDAN,
National Campaign Director.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HARRELD and Mr. DYER were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the resolution just passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HICKS, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for Monday and Tuesday, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 6, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination of bar in Lake Michigan in front of the naval training station, Great Lakes, Ill.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

2. A letter from the general secretary of Near East Relief, transmitting report in duplicate of the proceedings of the Near East Relief, names and addresses of its officers, report of receipts and expenditures, and copies of the by-laws; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting draft of requested paragraph for appropriation legislation required for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for the current fiscal year (H. Doc. No. 711); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Public Health Service for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 712); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Library of Congress for distribution of card indexes, fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 713); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the Treasury Department for "Wages of workmen, Mint at Denver," fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 714); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation required by the United States Tariff Commission for printing and binding, fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 715); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Director General of Railroads, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the United States Railroad Administration, to be expended in the same manner and for the same purposes as the appropriation provided in section 202 of the transportation act of 1920 (H. Doc. No. 716); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 788), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 789), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6296) authorizing the Cowlitz Tribe of Indians, residing in the State of Washington, to submit claims to the Court of Claims, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 790), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEENERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12955) to further define nonmailable matter, and for other purposes, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 792), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13144) granting an increase of pension to William Griffith; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 13237) granting an increase of pension to James R. Compton; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CANNON: A bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes; to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 6, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, by Thy grace we come to the discharge of the duties of this day. By Thy grace alone have we erected our form of government, and by Thy grace we continue it to this day. We desire only to fulfill Thy will and to measure up to the commission that Thou has placed in our hands and pass on with the splendid institutions that have come to us from the past, and ever go forward accomplishing the divine purpose in us as a Nation. Grant us this day Thy blessing and guidance. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution of the Graduate Nurses' Association, of New Haven, Conn., favoring rank for Army nurses, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of Corporal Frank Coyle Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Waterbury; of the Corcoran-Sandquist Post, No. 83, American Legion, of Branford; and of Naugatuck Post, No. 17, American Legion, all of the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation providing four optional benefits for ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Girls' Friendly Society, of West Haven, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for daylight saving, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., and a petition of the Manufacturers' Association of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to simplify the present method of collecting Federal income taxes, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of C. P. Kirkland Camp, No. 18, United Spanish War Veterans, of Winsted, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called Sells bill granting pensions to Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of the Polish Citizens' Club, of Norwich, Conn., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation excluding certain foreign publications from second-class mailing privileges, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Hartford, Conn., and a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a readjustment and reclassification of the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Board of Commerce of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing increased compensation for engineers in the Federal service, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Battle Creek, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing increased salaries for postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Kiwanis Club, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the repeal of certain provisions of the so-called Lever Act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by George W. Myers Post, No. 132, American Legion, of Alma, Mich., favoring an adjusted compensation for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Charles A. Larned Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Detroit, Mich., favoring increased pay for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard Service, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Grange No. 293, Patrons of Husbandry, of Rome, Mich., praying for the passing of the so-called pure-fabric bill, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment:

A bill (S. 3421) for the relief of Mabel L. Noble; and

A bill (S. 3774) to authorize the coinage of a Roosevelt 2-cent coin.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (S. 447) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3908) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 508) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NEW:

A bill (S. 4192) granting an increase of pension to Gilliam L. Craven (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4193) granting a pension to Thomas C. Kessler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4194) for the payment of certain soldiers' claims for back pay growing out of service in the Army of the United States, as reported by the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MOSES:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 188) to investigate Harriman geographic code system, now in use by War Department, with a view to adopting said system in other executive departments and administrative branches of the Government, and to render a just compensation to the owner thereof; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 189) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases; to the Committee on Finance.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted eight amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SWANSON (by request) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. McLEAN submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 8 and 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "And may appoint a deputy registrar who shall during the unavoidable absence or disability of the registrar perform the duties of that office"; and also, by adding after "registrars," in the sixth line of said paragraph, the words "deputy registrars"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "And may appoint a deputy registrar who shall during the unavoidable absence or disability of the registrar perform the duties of that office"; also on page 1, line 15, of the engrossed bill strike out "the period and insert a comma"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit the matter proposed to be stricken out and also the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the first paragraph of section 10 be amended to read as follows:

"'That whenever an application for a mortgage loan is made through a national farm-loan association, the loan committee provided for in section 7 of this act, shall forthwith make, or cause to be made, such investigation as it may deem necessary as to the character and solvency of the applicant, and the sufficiency of the security offered, and cause written report to be made of the result of such investigation, and shall, if it concurs in such report, approve the same in writing. No loan shall be made unless the report is favorable, and the loan committee is unanimous in its approval thereof.

"'The written report required in the preceding paragraph shall be submitted to the Federal land bank, together with the application for the loan, and the directors of said land bank shall examine said written report when they pass on the loan application which it accompanies, but they shall not be bound by said appraisal.'

"SEC. 3. That the third paragraph of section 11 be amended to read as follows:

"'Third. To fix reasonable initial charges to be made against applicants for loans and to borrowers in order to meet the necessary expenses of the association: Provided, That such charges shall not exceed amounts to be fixed by the farm-loan board, and shall in no case exceed 1 per cent of the amount of the loan applied for, and to acquire and dispose of property, real and personal, that may be necessary or convenient for the transaction of its business.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: "and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'incurred for agricultural purposes, or incurred prior to the organization of the first farm-loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated,'"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the Senate amendment insert the following: "incurred for agricultural purposes, or incurred prior to the organization of the first farm loan association established in and for the county in which the land is situated"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "$40"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend certain sections of the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916."

GEORGE P. MCLEAN,
ASLE J. GRONNA,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

EDMUND PLATT,
MICHAEL F. PHELAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 12012. An act concerning the administration of the pension laws in claims for pension of persons who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and by the widows of such persons, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

H. R. 12502. An act providing for a report on the cost of improving and maintaining the Government boulevard on Missionary Ridge, in the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Military Park, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RURAL HOMES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3477.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator state what that bill is?

Mr. SMOOT. It is what is known as the rural-homes bill, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3477) to increase, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the bill has heretofore been read, and I think the amendments which were reported to it by the committee have all been agreed to. The bill has been discussed, and if no Senator desires any further information in reference to it I ask that it now proceed to passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill has been heretofore read and that the committee amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the calendar under Rule VIII be now taken up, beginning with Order of Business No. 422, and that bills to which there is no objection may be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills on the calendar to which there is no objection, beginning with Order of Business No. 422. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MINERAL LANDS IN CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, before the calendar is proceeded with, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he will consent that Calendar No. 297 be now considered by unanimous consent? That is a measure which is recommended by the Interior Department, and which, if passed, will save the parties interested about $300,000, as the property therein referred to has been authorized to be sold. If the bill, which provides for a reappraisement of the property, is going to pass, it should pass now. The bill was drawn by the Secretary of the Interior and has been introduced at the request of the Interior Department. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may now be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 297, being Senate bill 3391. Is there objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have the bill first read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 3391) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Okla.," approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat. L., p. 433).

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat., p. 433), being "An act providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Okla.," be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all that proviso following the words "preferential right" in line 8, page 434, down to and including the words "above provided," beginning on line 14, and inserting in lieu of that proviso the following:

"Provided, That the same is exercised within 90 days after the approval of the completion of the appraisement of the surface as herein provided, to purchase any or all of the surface of the lands lying within said lease held by him and heretofore reserved by order of the Secretary of the Interior, who is hereby authorized to reappraise said reserved surface for the purpose of sale to said lessees under said preferential right at an appraised value to be fixed by a reappraisement of said reserved surface, and any purchaser of any tract of said reserved surface shall pay in addition to the appraised value of the land the value of individual improvements thereon belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, including any equity of said tribes in improvements erected thereon by mining lessees, and in addition thereto the value of improvements placed thereon by private individuals and not purchased by the Indian Nations: Provided further, That all sales of surface under this act shall be subject to the conditions, limitations, reservations, and provisions of section 3 of the act of Congress approved February 19, 1912, entitled 'An act to provide for the sale of the surface of the segregated coal and asphalt lands of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska and to the Senate that this bill was drawn by the department. Under the existing law the surface would have to be sold under the old appraisement, which I think was made about 1912. In the letter recommending the passage of this bill the Secretary says that the property has increased in value, and that a reappraisement will afford to the Indians an increase of about $300,000. The department insists that they have a right to reappraise and sell, but some of the parties who are in possession of the property insist that they have a right to buy under the old appraisement. I repeat, the bill was prepared by the department and has been favorably recommended by the committee. If the property is to be reappraised, it should be reappraised immediately.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Kansas kindly state what the proviso which it is proposed to strike out of the act of February 8, 1918, provided for?

Mr. CURTIS. The proviso stricken out of the old measure provided for the sale of the land at the then appraised value, which, according to my recollection, was made in 1912, or, at any rate, several years ago. In passing the act of 1918 there was nothing said about a reappraisement. The then chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], in a letter to the department stated that he understood they had a right to reappraise at any time, and for that reason nothing was put in the act providing for reappraisement. If they sell under existing law, they must sell at the old appraisement, although the value of the land since it was appraised has increased, as I said a moment ago, according to the figures of the Secretary of the Interior, about $300,000; in fact, similar land sold to others than those having preferred rights, as my recollection runs, according to the letter of the department, brought to the Indians about $30,000 over and above what the property would have brought had it been sold under the old appraisement of 1912 or 1913, or whenever it was made.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The purpose of the proposed legislation is to enable the Indian owners to secure a larger amount from the sale of their lands?

Mr. CURTIS. The object of the bill is to permit the Secretary of the Interior to appraise the surface and sell it at not less than its appraised value.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Otherwise he would have to sell it under the old appraisement?

Mr. CURTIS. Otherwise he would have to sell it under the old appraisement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How does it happen that the land has not been sold prior to this time?

Mr. CURTIS. The sale has been delayed from time to time by acts of Congress, and then, under the act of 1918, which provided for the sale of the land, the Secretary of the Interior insisted that he had a right to reappraise, while some of those with preferential rights contended that it should be sold to them under the old appraisement, which would give it to them at a less amount than they could obtain it under the new appraisement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does this bill change existing law in any other respect?

Mr. CURTIS. It changes existing law in no other respect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELINQUISHMENT OF UNITED STATES PROPERTY IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar, which it has been agreed by unanimous consent shall be taken up.

The bill (S. 3995) providing for the relinquishment of certain described property by the United States to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, was announced as first in order, and the Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who introduced the bill, is not present, nor is the Senator who reported the bill in his seat. I desire to ask a question about the bill, but evidently there is no Senator present who could answer it, and therefore I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

CUSTOMHOUSE BUILDING, KENNEBUNKPORT, ME.

The bill (H. R. 11175) for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to sell at public sale the present customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me., after proper advertisement, and at such time and upon such terms as he may deem for the best interests of the United States, to execute and deliver to the purchaser the usual quitclaim deed therefor, and to deposit the proceeds derived from such sale in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HEALY.

The bill (S. 2278) for the relief of John Healy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on line 8, to strike out the word "pension" and insert "back pay, pension, or other emoluments," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws John Healy shall be hereafter held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company H, Fourteenth Regiment United States Infantry, on August 15, 1865: Provided, That no back pay, pension, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice that the report from The Adjutant General makes this statement:

Application for removal of the charge of desertion and for an honorable discharge in the case of this soldier has been repeatedly denied, and now stands denied, on the ground that he did not complete his term of service and that it has not been established that he was prevented from completing it by reason of disability incurred in the line of duty, and because the case does not come within any of the other provisions of the act of Congress approved March 2, 1889, the only law in force governing the subject of removal of charges of desertion.

I can not find any recommendation here by the department that this bill pass, and I wondered if there was any Senator who knew of circumstances that would justify favorable action on the bill. I see that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] reported the bill, and I should like to ask the Senator what reasons were given to the committee, outside of the reports from the War Department, that justified reporting the bill favorably.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this bill was referred to me as a subcommittee, and I finally reported it back. There were several reasons given; and if I have the matter correctly in mind, there was testimony showing that while this man had been away from the Army and had not, in fact, gone back, the condition was such that he had a right to think that the war was ended and that he was not expected to return; and because of conditions over which he had no real control, they thought he ought not to be continued on the list as a deserter. There were two or three affidavits in this particular case. I have made no special written report about it. I reported it back to the committee, and the full committee agreed that the bill ought to be passed, and on that account I returned it here.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, but I should have been glad to know some reason why it was favorably reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN LYONS.

The bill (S. 2600) for the relief of John Lyons was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, at the end of line 10, to insert: "Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, John Lyons, who was a private in Company E, Forty-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

M'CLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO.

The bill (S. 1353) for the relief of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Does the bill go over on one objection, under the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does, under the rule.

Mr. KNOX. I ask the Senator from Ohio to withhold his objection and give me an opportunity, or give the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee an opportunity, to explain the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no objection to that. I will say to the Senator very frankly that my reason for objecting to the consideration of the bill is this: I think I have in mind the right claim. Very serious objection was made to this bill a couple of years ago by a manufacturer from my own State, and my recollection now is that it was some one who had been a competitor in this business. I hesitate about stating the facts as I have them in mind without verifying my recollection; but my present memory about it is that in the system of bidding this bid was very materially lower than the others, and now they are seeking to recoup their loss, in part, practically in violation of the rights or equities that the other bidders may have had.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator has been misinformed if he has such an idea as that in his mind, because the amount that has been awarded by the commission that was directed to investigate this matter is all for extra work that was done by reason of the peculiar situation existing in Panama while the work was going on. In 1914 Congress passed a law directing Gen. Goethals to make a thorough investigation of this claim, either personally or through a commission. He appointed a commission consisting of Gen. Rousseau and other eminent scientific men who were engaged in the work of constructing the Gatun Dam, and they unanimously made a report recommending the payment of this money as being justly and equitably due to the McClintic-Marshall Co. because of this extra work and because of the delays occasioned by plans and specifications not being prepared in time and causing tremendous shop delays in the factories of the McClintic-Marshall Co. This report was approved in toto by Gen. Goethals. It has been before the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives twice and unanimously favorably reported by that committee. It has been before the Committee on Claims of the Senate, and has been unanimously reported favorably by that committee, and I think it is just and proper that this matter should be brought to the attention of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. Does the Senator from Ohio withdraw his objection?

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have here the report that was rendered by the commission of which the Senator speaks. It is Document No. 906 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. H. H. Rousseau, the engineer of terminal construction, was chairman of the committee; H. A. A. Smith was a member of the committee; and B. F. Harrah, another member of the committee, was the special counsel and examiner of claims. The Committee on Claims went into this matter very carefully. I have examined this report and also the hearings before the House committee; and I think the Senator must be mistaken in regard to this matter, because, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, this report was approved by Gen. Goethals in toto, and while the claim was for nearly $2,000,000 it was only approved for seven hundred and fourteen and some odd thousand dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, my recollection about the facts is rather hazy. At the same time, as I have had some correspondence on this claim—I think this is the one—I will ask that it go over now, and I will examine my files. I have no disposition to interfere unduly in the matter, but I feel that under the circumstances I ought to look into it.

Mr. KNOX. I should only like to add that if any such rumor as that came to the ears of the Senator from Ohio, it did not materialize before either of these committees. Whoever was responsible for it either abandoned it because there was nothing in it or for some other reason. There is nothing on the files of the Senate to indicate that there is any objection whatever.

Mr. POMERENE. I promise the Senator that I will look into it very promptly and advise with him further.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if this is not the same claim that was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, passed upon favorably by that committee, and incorporated in one of the deficiency appropriation bills, but in conference it went out?

Mr. KNOX. This is the same claim.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember very well Gen. Goethals testifying as to the fairness and justice of the claim, and it was on Gen. Goethals's testimony that the Committee on Appropriations acted favorably upon the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over, under objection.

TH. BROVIG.

The bill (S. 3662) for the relief of Th. Brovig, as owner of the bark Bennestvet, was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim asserted by Th. Brovig, owner of the Norwegian bark Bennestvet, for damages alleged to have been suffered in a collision which occurred in Hampton Roads on the 29th day of June, 1919, between the United States barge F. W. Babcock and the bark Bennestvet by reason of said collision, may be submitted to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, the district in which said collision occurred, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the said Th. Brovig, owner of the said bark Bennestvet, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That appropriate proceedings to determine such liability and damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there are upon the calendar some 10 or 12 bills similar in character to this one.

Mr. SWANSON. Three bills. I think most of them have passed.

Mr. SMOOT. No; they have not passed. They have been objected to, every time they have been brought up, on the ground that there ought to be general legislation covering all cases, if any action whatever is to be taken. I think myself that would be the best way to deal with legislation of this character. There is no doubt there are many claims similar in character, and no doubt there will be many claims yet to come. I agree with those who have objected to the consideration of the bills passed over that it would be far better to have general legislation covering the whole subject than to take up every case in Congress, and to take up the time of the Senate and the House, with the expense attached thereto.

I believe that the bill ought to go over, Mr. President, for that reason, and then that a general bill should be introduced and passed. I think that would be very much more satisfactory to the Navy Department as well. In fact, I know that the Navy Department has recommended legislation covering the general question, and it ought to be passed. I do not think these individual cases ought to be acted upon unless we are going to act upon them all.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think that one or two bills I have introduced in these cases have been passed. I will say, in this connection, that I understand these are foreign ships, and it is impossible to get the witnesses to stay here to testify unless action is taken immediately. This bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, and Mr. Roosevelt, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, wrote a long letter giving the facts. The chairman of the committee in the House recommended the passage of the bill. It simply gives these people the right to litigate in court. If they litigate, and the Government is found not to be liable, it saves the damage, but if the private vessel is held to have been responsible for the damage the Government is not responsible, and the owners of the ship pay the damage. No general legislation has ever been passed, and it seems to me if we had a general statute authorizing them to sue, it would subject the Government to a lot of litigation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong when he says there is no general legislation. The general legislation which was passed authorizes the settlement of such claims up to the amount of $500. But of late $500 seems so insignificant an amount as compared with what the cost of repairing the damaged vessels would be that the Navy Department thinks that there should be general legislation raising the amount. I forget now just what amount was suggested. I agree with the Navy Department that it ought to be done.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that it should not be limited to $500. There are a great many suits in connection with aircraft, and the Committee on Naval Affairs limited recovery in those cases to $500. It has been the general policy with respect to aircraft that the amount should be limited to $500, and I think that is a wise provision. We used to give an opportunity to settle in all these cases, without any amount stated. This simply allows the owners of foreign vessels to go into our courts and litigate as to whether they or the Government was at fault. The Secretary of the Navy recommends the passage of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Secretary of the Navy has recommended the passage of the one that was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], May 29, 1919, and following that there were a number introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and also other Senators introduced bills similar in character. There is no doubt but that the Navy Department will recommend the consideration of all of such bills, because that is all they can do under the existing law, when they think it is a just claim. The law does not apply alone to foreign ships, but it applies to domestic ships as well.

Mr. SWANSON. But this is a case where the foreign ships are held here and the witnesses have to remain here. It is a little different from ships at home, for the simple reason that the witnesses can be obtained here. It does seem to me to delay this matter in connection with these ships that are here trading with us and let them fail to get legislation for the settlement of their claims is not in accordance with fair dealing. All they ask is the privilege of going into our courts.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is all they ask in all the other cases. If, as the Senator says, the owner of this bark is tied up here at the port of New York and the witnesses are held here so as to testify in the United States courts as to the damage done, then I shall not object.

Mr. SWANSON. I could not say that positively. All I can say is that if it is a foreign ship its owners can not come back here and wait for general legislation pertaining to all vessels. It does seem to me we ought to be prompt in settling with foreigners who come to our shores. It seems to me it would be very hard to cause a delay in this case by waiting three or four years for general legislation to have the question of damages settled.

Mr. SMOOT. Based on the statement made by the Senator from Virginia, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill, although I do hope that the recommendations of the Navy Department will be carried out by appropriate legislation and that all bills of this character will not be forced through the Congress.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, consistent with the action of the Senate the other day in connection with a similar bill, the provision of the bill which appropriates money for the payment of the judgment ought to be eliminated.

Mr. SWANSON. That ought to be eliminated. Congress always requires that the judgment shall be sent back here.

Mr. SPENCER. Then, I move that commencing with section 2, page 2, line 6, to the word "appropriated," in line 11, the language be eliminated.

Mr. SWANSON. I think that ought to be eliminated.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, the word "Provided," on line 11, should be stricken out.

Mr. SPENCER. Yes; I will include that in my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Assistant Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Strike out all on page 2, beginning with line 6, down to and including the word "Provided" and the comma on line 11, so that section 2 will read:

SEC. 2. That appropriate proceedings to determine such liability and damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ITALIAN BARK "DORIS."

The bill (S. 3663) for the relief of Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato, as managing owner of the Italian bark Doris, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim asserted by Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato, managing owner of the Italian bark Doris, for damages alleged to have been suffered in a collision which occurred in Chesapeake Bay on the 17th day of October, 1916, between the Doris and the United States collier Jupiter, by reason of said collision, may be submitted to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, the district in which said collision occurred, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained by reason of said collision, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the said Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato, as managing owner of said bark Doris, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That appropriate proceedings to determine such liability and damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

Mr. SWANSON. The same amendment ought to be made. The provision making an appropriation ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SPENCER. I move, on page 2, beginning with line 8, to strike out:

That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the said Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato, as managing owner of said bark Doris, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LINK-BELT CO.

The bill (S. 3664) for the relief of the Link-Belt Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the Link-Belt Co., of Philadelphia, Pa., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, for damages alleged to have been sustained by a certain coal chute under construction by said Link-Belt Co. for the Norfolk & Western Railroad on its coal pier No. 3 at Lamberts Point, in the city of Norfolk, Va., by reason of collision therewith by the U. S. S. Buitenzorg on the 1st day of March, 1919, may be submitted to the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Virgina, at Norfolk, which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the Link-Belt Co., the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto, or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That appropriate proceedings to determine such damage shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That the mode of service of process shall conform to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the United States."

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I move that the following words, beginning with line 7, page 2, down to and including the word "Provided," in line 12, be stricken out:

That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the Link-Belt Co., the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid to those entitled thereto, or their proctors of record, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KING COAL CO., OF SAN FRANCISCO.

The bill (S. 3883) for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent to substitute H. R. 6077, Order of Business 650, for Senate bill 3883.

Mr. GRONNA. I object. I do not happen to have the House bill in my file. I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

DREDGE "MARYLAND."

The bill (S. 3941) for the relief of the owners of the dredge Maryland was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of John Emile, of Duval County, Fla., and People's Bank of Mobile, a corporation under the laws of the State of Alabama, owners of the dredge Maryland, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by a collision betweeen said dredge and the United States ship O–4, in the Cooper River, at Charleston, S. C., may be sued for by said owners against the United States, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, sitting as a court of admiralty, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree therein for the amount of lawful damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States upon the same principles and measure of liability and damage, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owners of said dredge Maryland, the amount due under the final judgment or decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be required by order of said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in said district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided, That said suit shall be commenced within six months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the bill be amended by striking out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owners of said dredge Maryland, the amount due under the final judgment or decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And to renumber section 3 so as to make it section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KING COAL CO., OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am in attendance upon the Committee on Naval Affairs and was therefore absent when Calendar No. 431, Senate bill 3883, for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., was passed over under objection made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. His objection, I understand, was simply due to the fact that there is an identical House bill, H. R. 6077, on the same subject. It is a bill authorizing the company to sue the United States in the Federal courts for damages done to their barge by a submarine. I therefore move that House bill 6077 be substituted for Senate bill 3883.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say to the Senator from California that we are now working under a unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion of the Senator is not now in order. He can ask unanimous consent.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 6077 be substituted for Senate bill 3883.

Mr. GRONNA. I objected to the consideration of the House bill for the reason that I did not have the House bill before me at the time, but I find it now in my file. If I can have an opportunity to make a comparison of the two bills and find that there is no difference between the two measures, I shall have no objection.

Mr. PHELAN. There is no difference. They are identical bills.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of H. R. 6077. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 6077) for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif., owner of the barge Ruth, against the United States for damages alleged to have been cause by collision between the said barge and the United States submarine R–19 in San Francisco Harbor, may be sued for by the said King Coal Co. in the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the King Coal Co., or against the King Coal Co. in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PHELAN. I move the indefinite postponement of the bill (S. 3883) for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. MAMIE DUFFER.

The bill (H. R. 1266) for the relief of Mrs. Mamie Duffer, of Shannon, Miss., was next in order, and was read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this whole subject has been before the Finance Committee and was considered by that committee when we reported the so-called Sweet Act. I think if legislation of this kind is going to be passed it ought to be at least considered by the committee that has had the legislation in charge from the beginning until the present time. I know of no reason why an amendment should be made to the Sweet Act in this way.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator from Utah whether it is his opinion that the Sweet Act, so far as this feature is concerned, takes care of cases precisely like this? Here was a case where a child 8 months old was adopted by a woman, but not legally adopted. She cared for him until he was 20 years old. He knew no other mother. When he went into the Army he made his insurance payable to his mother, naming this woman, who as a matter of fact was his foster mother and not his actual mother. The soldier died, and when they came to pay his insurance they found that the woman whom he had called his mother was his foster mother, and therefore the Treasury Department reported that, while the money ought to be paid to the foster mother, because of the provision of the law as it then was she was not of kin to whom the insurance could be paid. My understanding is that for future cases the Sweet Act provides that those who are in loco parentis shall be regarded as the proper payees.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in that.

Mr. SPENCER. This is merely to equalize a case that happened before the Sweet Act, which is, of course, not retroactive in its provisions, and by all reasons in equity the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the question of the amount involved under the retroactive feature of the Sweet Act was considered. I have not the figures here as to the number, but if we had made it retroactive there would have been many cases that would have been considered very unjust, indeed—in fact, so unjust that the insurance would have gone to persons whom the soldier did not want to have it go, and to whom he would have objected. That is the reason why the retroactive feature was not included and the Sweet Act was applied only in certain cases. This may be one of the cases that the Sweet Act would apply to. I have not studied it. I have just heard the bill read.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Missouri. When he speaks of the retroactive provision there is no probability that a bill that is not retroactive would do any good.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Nebraska is quite right, and the very reason which the Senator from Utah announced is a strong reason why bills of this character should be passed.

Mr. NORRIS. In this case the soldier named this particular person?

Mr. SPENCER. As his mother.

Mr. SMOOT. If the soldier named this particular person in the insurance policy as the beneficiary, I think the Sweet Act itself will cover it.

Mr. NORRIS. It ought to cover it, but I do not believe it will do so.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it will.

Mr. SPENCER. Because of a suggestion just made to me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], who desires to look into this matter a little further, I ask that the bill may go over.

Mr. HARRISON. In this connection may I state that after this bill passed the House it is my impression I took it up with the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and he said it would in all probability be covered by the Sweet Act. I am glad the Senator will let it go over for that reason.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to make this statement in connection with it. I have knowledge of one case very similar to this one where I understand the department has held that the Sweet Act does not cover it, and where the soldier named in his will, as well as in his insurance policy, he having a little property, a certain person, designated as his mother or his sister—I have forgotten which—who, as a matter of fact, as in this case, was only a foster mother or foster sister. As I remember it, they held that the Sweet Act did not apply to it; I have had the case in mind ever since. I think we should correct that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. If the person was a foster sister, under the Sweet Act I do not believe she would be covered.

Mr. NORRIS. Such a case ought to be covered.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is not this case.

Mr. NORRIS. The objection the Senator from Utah made in the consideration of the amendment to the Sweet Act by the committee was that if we made it general and retroactive it would often go to persons to whom the soldier, if he were alive, would not want it to go; but that objection can not apply when the soldier himself has designated the person. It seems to me when he has done so the insurance ought to be held good, particularly when the Government has taken the money.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Missouri, if he will make an investigation into this particular case, will find that the Sweet Act covers it, and that the amount of insurance will be paid by the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator from Utah is right, there is no need of this bill. Does the Senator from Utah agree with me that, if the Sweet Act does not cover it, this bill ought to be passed?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection whatever to it, under the explanation given by the Senator from Missouri. If the Senator from Missouri has outlined the case exactly as it is, I am in favor of the bill, if the Sweet Act does not cover it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LAWRENCE BENDICH AND ANTHONY VEZICH.

The bill (H. R. 8645) for the relief of Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich, citizens of the United States, and residents of the city of New Orleans, State of Louisiana, and joint owners of the gasoline freighter Protector, against the United States for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between the said freighter and the United States submarine chaser No. 336, in the Mississippi River about 35 miles below New Orleans, on the 2d day of February, 1919, may be sued for by the said Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the said Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich, or against the said Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under objection.

The bill (H. R. 687) for the relief of Frank Pinkley was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under objection.

The resolution (S. Res. 334) referring the claims of Edward W. Owens and others to the Court of Claims was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. I find no report on this resolution, so I ask that the resolution go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over under objection.

The bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it was agreed that during the morning hour there was no chance whatever of passing any tariff bills. This is one of a series of such bills upon the calendar, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 4437) to provide revenue for the Government and to promote the production of tungsten ores and manufactures thereof in the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that bill go over also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

COST OF SHOES.

The resolution (S. Res. 317) for investigation into the cost of shoes, which had been submitted on March 2, 1920, by Mr. MCNARY, was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures is hereby authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to ascertain in every practicable way the causes for the increased price of shoes in the United States, the labor, material, and other costs, and the profits of manufacturers, wholesalers, jobbers, and retailers of shoes, and of the manufacturers, wholesalers, and distributors of leather, thread, shoe machinery, and other articles required for the manufacture of shoes, with a view to determining who or what may be responsible for such increased prices. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as they deem advisable during the Sixty-sixth Congress, and may employ a stenographer, at a cost of not to exceed $1 per printed page, and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary. A report of the results of such investigation shall be made to the Senate, together with such recommendations for legislation as may be deemed necessary and practicable. The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The bill (H. R. 7657) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war was announced as next in order.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that that bill and the five other pension bills immediately following it on the calendar may be passed over.

The chairman of the Committee on Pensions, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], yesterday asked that all pension bills go over until it is definitely decided whether the general pension bill, which is known as the Fuller bill, shall be considered. That bill will be reported to the Senate, I think, to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pension bills referred to by the Senator from Utah will be passed over.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, is the Senator from Utah a member of the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator, because I have very many inquiries in reference to the matter, as to the situation relative to the Fuller bill in the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Committee on Pensions, I will say to the Senator, the bill was ordered to be reported to the Senate, and no doubt will be reported to the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish it understood that I have made objection to the consideration of any pension bill. I am on record as being in favor of pension bills. I do not know whether the Senate Committee on Pensions will approve the Fuller bill or will report some other bill, but I believe it is important that some general pension bill shall be passed at an early date.

BOUNDARIES OF OREGON NATIONAL FOREST.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2792) to enlarge the boundaries of the Oregon National Forest, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 1, line 4, after the word "include," to strike out "in addition to the lands within said boundary as defined by diagram accompanying the Executive order of the President of the United States, dated July 1, 1908"; in line 9, after the word "section," to strike out "seven" and insert "six; that part of"; in line 10, after the word "east," to strike out "all" and insert "lying"; and in line 11, after the words "Columbia River," to insert "not now included in said forest," so as to make the section read:

That the boundary of the Oregon National Forest, in the State of Oregon, is hereby changed to include the following lands, subject to all the laws and regulations governing the national forests: Township 1 south, range 6 east, section 6; that part of township 1 north, range 6 east, lying south of the Columbia River not now included in said forest; township 2 north, range 6 east, all of sections 34, 35, and 36 south of the Columbia River: Provided, That this action shall, as to all lands which are at this date legally appropriated under the public-land laws or reserved for any public purpose, be subject to and shall not interfere with or defeat legal rights under such appropriation, nor prevent the use for such public purpose of lands so reserved so long as such appropriation is legally maintained or such reservation remains in force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 12, after the word "value," to insert "nonmineral lands or"; in the same line, after the word "timber," to strike out "or lands"; in line 15, after the word "and," to insert "that"; and, in line 17, after the word "forest," to insert "and the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents to the selected lands," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered, upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture, to exchange, upon the basis of equal value, nonmineral lands or timber belonging to the United States in the Oregon National Forest for privately owned lands lying within the exterior limits of the Oregon National Forest, and that upon the consummation of such exchanges the lands deeded to the United States shall become parts of the Oregon National Forest, and the Secretary of the Interior shall issue patents to the selected lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARRIAGES OF HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN AND ENTRYWOMEN.

The bill (S. 3225) for the relief of bona fide settlers who intermarry after having complied with the homestead law for one year was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act entitled "An act providing that the marriage of a homestead entryman to a homestead entrywoman shall not impair the right of either to a patent, after compliance with the law a year, to apply to existing entries," approved April 6, 1914 (38 Stat., p. 312), by adding thereto the following: "Provided further, That in the administration of this act the terms 'entryman' and 'entrywoman' shall be construed to include bona fide settlers who have complied with the homestead law for at least one year next preceding such marriage."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KATHERINE MACDONALD.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3102) for the relief of Katherine Macdonald. It proposes to appropriate $9,819 to be paid to Katherine Macdonald, of Butte, Mont., for and on account of unpaid claims held by her on account of work and services performed on or supplies furnished for the construction of the Corbett Tunnel, a part of the Shoshone reclamation project in the State of Wyoming.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPERIAL VALLEY IRRIGATION DEVELOPMENT.

The bill (H. R. 12537) to provide for an examination and report on the condition and possible irrigation development of the Imperial Valley in California was announced as next in order, and the bill was read.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I reported this bill favorably a few days ago. To-day, however, two representatives of the interests in the Imperial Valley in southern California have asked that the bill be temporarily passed over and not considered until a future date, on account of a hearing which is to be had before the Secretary of the Interior on Thursday next. I therefore ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BACA FLOAT NO. 3, ARIZONA.

The bill (S. 2728) for the relief of settlers and entrymen on Baca Float No. 3, in the State of Arizona, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That where prior to June 22, 1914, patents or patent certificates have issued under the homestead laws or preemption laws for land within the limits of a tract known as Baca Float No. 3, in the State of Arizona, and the patentees, their assigns and legal representatives, have been evicted by the local courts by reason of the prior grant to the legal representative of Luis Maria Baca, the patentee or his legal representative, who under the laws and regulations would be entitled to the return of the purchase money, fees, and commissions, shall be entitled to select in lieu thereof an equal quantity of nonmineral, unoccupied, surveyed public land subject to homestead entry.

SEC. 2. That where any person has made homestead entry for land within Baca Float No. 3, and had fully complied with the homestead laws thereon as to residence and cultivation prior to June 22, 1914, in the bona fide belief that the land was public land, and has been evicted therefrom or prevented from making final entry by reason of the prior grant, said homestead entryman, or, in the case of his or her death, the successor to the right of entry under the homestead laws shall be permitted to make second homestead entry, if otherwise qualified, for other land, subject to the conditions, limitations, and benefits of the homestead laws applicable to such land; and upon submission of proof under his original entry that he had fully complied with the law as to residence and cultivation shall, on approval of such proof and payment at the office of second entry for the final fees and commissions due on a final entry for the land entered, receive a final certificate and patent without further residence and cultivation of the land embraced in the second entry.

SEC. 3. That the right of selection and second entry hereby granted shall not be assignable, directly or through irrevocable power of attorney, and must be exercised within three years after the passage of this act by the persons entitled to such relief, or, in the case of the death of a homestead entryman who has not submitted final proof and received his final certificate, by the person or persons succeeding to his right of entry under the homestead laws: And provided, That no persons acquiring said land by sale or conveyance subsequent to June 22, 1914, shall be recognized, and the applicant shall submit proof that he has not sold, assigned, nor relinquished his homestead nor entered into any contract or agreement to sell, assign, or relinquish the same, nor abandoned the land for a valuable consideration; also that the land sought to be selected is for applicant's own exclusive use and benefit, and that he has not sold or contracted to sell, directly or indirectly, said selected land: And provided further, That the entire right of reselection under each entry shall be exercised at the same time, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and on approval of the selection patent shall issue as on other entries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. G. SEUPELT.

The bill (S. 1280) for the relief of J. G. Seupelt was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to permit J. G. Seupelt to enter under the homestead laws, at the appraised price, a certain unsurveyed island in the Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., known as "Hog Island," containing about 152 acres, located in the Columbia River, and within sections 26 and 35, township 30 north, range 36 east, of the Willamette meridian, in the State of Washington; but the proceeds arising hereunder shall be subject to the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 22, 1906 (vol. 34, United States Stat. L., p. 81); the right of entry by the said Seupelt shall be exercised within 90 days after the execution and acceptance of the survey of the island; and the land disposed of shall be subject to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country, until otherwise provided by Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IRRIGATION EASEMENTS IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The bill (S. 3895) authorizing the granting of certain irrigation easements in the Yellowstone National Park, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to any canal or ditch company, association, or district formed for the purposes of irrigation, and duly organized under the laws of any State or Territory, such necessary rights of way, within the Falls River Basin, Yellowstone National Park, in the States of Idaho and Wyoming, for water plants, dams, reservoirs, canals, ditches, pipes, and pipe lines, or other water conduits used to promote irrigation, as, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, may be required for the purposes of this act and may be granted without detriment to or interference with the occupation and use by the United States of the land for park purposes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior may also grant a right of way for a road through said park from the park boundary to the site of any dam or reservoir which may be granted under the provisions of this act, upon condition that the grantee shall construct and perpetually maintain said road and any bridges constructed in connection therewith in good repair, and the grantee may also construct and maintain, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, telephone and telegraph lines necessary for the operation of its business, upon condition that said lines may be freely used by officials of the Government and by the public, and that the grantee shall permit officials of the Government, for official business only, the free use of any telephone or telegraph lines that it may construct and maintain within said park or on the public lands, together with the right to connect with any such telephone and telegraph lines, private telephone lines for the exclusive use of said Government officials.

SEC. 3. That all reservoirs, dams, conduits, and other works constructed or maintained by the grantee not of a temporary character shall be sightly and of suitable exterior design and finish so as to harmonize with the surrounding landscape and the use of the land as a park.

SEC. 4. That all timber within the limits of any reservoir, canal, ditch, road, or other works constructed by the grantee shall be cut and removed under supervision of the Secretary of the Interior and paid for by grantee in such amounts as shall be determined to be just and equitable by said Secretary: Provided, That no other timber or other things or objects in said park outside of such rights of way shall be cut, removed, destroyed, or damaged by said grantee.

SEC. 5. That all plans and specifications for the construction, operation, and maintenance of any works, roads, structures, or lines authorized by this act shall be submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before construction, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby further authorized and directed to make and enforce all rules and regulations necessary to carry into force and effect the purposes of this act, and to protect and preserve, in so far as consistent herewith, the beauty and purposes of said park.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I introduced the bill that is now under consideration. A similar bill was introduced in the House, was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands of that body, was reported with certain amendments from that committee, and is now on the House Calendar. According to my information, when a bill is passed by the Senate identical with a House bill the Senate bill may be considered at once by the House after it has passed the Senate and been sent to that body. I desire to know whether or not I can substitute the House bill as amended by the committee of the House for the bill now under consideration, or whether it will be necessary to offer the amendments reported by the House committee as amendments to the Senate bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment by substituting the House bill for the Senate bill on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if the House bill is identical with the Senate bill?

Mr. NUGENT. No; that is the reason why I desire to substitute it. According to my understanding—I was so advised by a Member of the House—if a Senate bill identical with a House bill favorably reported by a House committee and on the House Calendar passes the Senate, that bill may be immediately taken up in the House.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not quite catch the Senator's statement. Do I understand the House has passed a similar bill?

Mr. NUGENT. No. I introduced the bill now pending in the Senate. The day after I introduced it a Representative from Idaho introduced a similar bill in the House, except for the change of a few words. The bill introduced in the House was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands of that body and was later reported favorably by that committee, with certain amendments, and is now on the House Calendar for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Idaho proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert different language.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator let the bill go over until we can see what the House bill provides?

Mr. NUGENT. The House bill is at the desk, and I have a copy of it in my possession, if the Senator desires to see it.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Committee on Public Lands authorized a favorable report on Senate bill 3895, but I do not know what the House bill is.

Mr. NUGENT. I will say to the Senator that, in my judgment, the amendments which have been proposed to the bill introduced in the House and favorably reported to the House by the Committee on the Public Lands are in large measure—I will not say altogether—immaterial.

Mr. SMOOT. If they are immaterial——

Mr. NUGENT. I think many of them are.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall offer no objection to the substitution.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I will say to the Chair and to the Senator that I believe I will have to object to the substitution of the House bill, because I do not know what is in it; I have had no opportunity to learn; but I shall not make any objection to the Senate passing the Senate bill as it stands.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that if the Senate bill passes to-day it can go to the House and whenever the House bill is taken up in the House they can substitute the Senate bill for it.

Mr. NUGENT. The one thing, Mr. President, that is exercising me is to secure early action; but, in view of the objection raised by the Senator from Montana, I withdraw the motion to substitute, and will ask that the bill as originally introduced by me may be considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill, and I merely wish to ask the Senator from Idaho, What does it propose to accomplish? It does not transfer any property of the Government, does it?

Mr. NUGENT. It merely gives the Secretary of the Interior the discretion to grant certain easements in the extreme southwestern portion of the Yellowstone Park for reservoir site purposes, and so forth, in order that water may be stored which can be utilized in the irrigation of about 200,000 acres of land.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, a similar bill has been reported by the House Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. NUGENT. A similar bill has been reported by the House committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator from Idaho—and the point he made a while ago calls it to my attention—that if the House bill has gone on the House calendar, when the Senate bill is passed it will go to the House and lie on the Speaker's table, and can then be taken from the Speaker's table and passed without waiting for unanimous consent, and without any special delay.

Mr. NUGENT. That is what I am desirous of bringing about.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then this bill, if it passes here, can be taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. NUGENT. The difficulty lies in the fact that the bills are not identical. As the bill was reported to the House from the Committee on the Public Lands, it contains certain amendments that are not contained in the bill which I introduced; so that they are not identical bills.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Would the Senator have any objection to amending the bill here so as to make it identical with the House bill when it goes over there?

Mr. NUGENT. That was what I proposed to do, but the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] objected.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. I was trying to help the Senator out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OLYMPIC GAMES AND INTERNATIONAL COMPETITIONS.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of War to use such Army transports as may be available for the free transportation of teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and other international competitions.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENTRIES ON PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 3994) validating certain applications for and entries on public lands, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 7, at the end of section 9, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 10. That upon the survey of an island, locally known as "Island Park," situated in the North Fork of Snake River in section 1, township 7 north, range 40 east, Boise meridian, Idaho, the city of St. Anthony, through its proper representative, shall have the right to purchase said island so surveyed for park and memorial purposes, for a period of 60 days after the filing of the official plat of such survey in the United States local land office, at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the island herein mentioned shall be used by the city of St. Anthony for park and memorial purposes only, and should the city abandon its use for such purposes, said island shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any person or persons which may have attached to the island or any part thereof: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry this act into effect.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patents upon the entries hereinafter named upon which proof of compliance with law has been filed:

Adjoining farm homestead entry, Eureka, Calif., No. 02188, made by Warren Henry Leach on February 19, 1914, for a tract of land containing 137.77 acres, described by metes and bounds, within sections 2 and 35, townships 30 and 31 north, range 11 west, Mount Diablo meridian.

Homestead entry, Timber Lake, S. Dak., No. 05023, made by Andrew W. Strommer on March 27, 1911, for the northeast quarter of section 9, township 12 north, range 19 east, Black Hills meridian, such patent to be issued to Charlotte Strommer.

Homestead entry, Glasgow, Mont., No. 036403, made by Elizabeth H. Boucher on June 7, 1916, under the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stat. L., p. 558), and February 19, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 639), for the southeast quarter of section 15 and the southwest quarter of section 14, township 31 north, range 46 east, Montana principal meridian.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue patent to the party named, and for the lands described, as follows:

Robert W. Stroud, for the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter, section 26, township 151 north, range 103 west, fifth principal meridian, in the State of North Dakota, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre within six months after the approval of this act.

SEC. 3. That the entries hereinafter named be, and the same are hereby, validated, and the Secretary of the Interior authorized to issue patents thereon upon submission of satisfactory proof of compliance with the laws under which such entries were allowed:

Additional homestead entry, Helena, Mont., No. 017219, made by Charlotte Daniels, widow of Hugo Peter Weirig, deceased, on April 16, 1918, under section 7 of the act of July 3, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 344), for lots 4 and 5, section 3, township 8 north, range 1 west, Montana principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Miles City, Mont., No. 036842, made by Benjamin B. Gross on March 14, 1917, under the act of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 639), for the north half of the north half, section 32, northeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 31, south half of the southwest quarter and northwest quarter of the southwest quarter, section 29, township 2 south, range 60 east, Montana principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Glenwood Springs, Colo., No. 013234, made by Roseberry G. Ridgway on October 9, 1917, for the south half of the southeast quarter, section 32, township 10 north, range 91 west, and the northeast quarter and north half of the southeast quarter, section 5, township 9 north, range 91 west, sixth principal meridian.

Homestead entry, Glasgow, Mont., No. 048226, made by John H. Cavanaugh on July 6, 1917, under the act of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat. L., p. 639), for the east half of the northwest quarter and the west half of the northeast quarter, section 18, township 33 north, range 50 east, Montana principal meridian.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow the following applications to make entry:

Additional homestead application, Glasgow, Mont., No. 043452, filed by Lawrence Benson for the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter, north half of the northeast quarter and southeast quarter of the northeast quarter, section 13, township 29 north, range 41 east, Montana principal meridian.

Homestead application, Salt Lake City, Utah, No. 014998, filed by Arthur Lawrence Whitmore for the east half of the southeast quarter, northwest quarter of the southeast quarter, northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, section 32, township 11 south, range 14 east, Salt Lake meridian, effective May 29, 1915, the date filed, and that the State of Utah through its proper officers be, and it is hereby, authorized to select 160 acres of surveyed, nonmineral, unappropriated, and unreserved public land in lieu of the above-described tract.

SEC. 5. That the allotment application made by Johnny Steele (Bull) for and on behalf of his minor child, Ed Steele (Bull), under the fourth section of the act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. L., p. 388), as amended, for the south half of the south half, section 27, township 43 north, range 12 east, Mount Diablo meridian, be, and the same is hereby, validated: Provided, That such allotment is to exhaust any right in the minor when he becomes of age to make entry under the provisions of the general homestead laws.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to sell to S. S. Markley, within a period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act, at the original purchase price of $1,800 the southeast quarter of section 2, township 3 south, range 12 west, Indian meridian, Cotton County, Okla., and issue to him a patent therefor.

SEC. 7. That Mattie R. Mayer, of Shreveport, La., be, and hereby is, authorized to enter at the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, the north fractional half of the south half of section 21, township 17 north, range 13 west, Louisiana meridian, Caddo Parish, La., in virtue of her long settlement, bona fide title and possession, and valuable improvements thereon: Provided, That the entry made hereunder shall be subject to a reservation under the act of July 17, 1914, of all rights in the oil deposits that may be found therein.

SEC. 8. That the soldiers' additional homestead application No. 01693, Juneau, Alaska, filed on July 8, 1914, by Thomas H. Holland, assignee of Clark S. Bemis, for a tract of land embraced in United States survey No. 941, duly approved, containing 6.50 acres, described by metes and bounds, on which final certificate issued December 18, 1914, be, and the same is hereby, validated, and the Secretary of the Interior authorized to issue patent thereon.

SEC. 9. That the soldiers' additional homestead application No. 01694, Juneau, Alaska, filed on July 8, 1914, by Thomas H. Holland, assignee of George Fritzinger, for a tract of land embraced in United States survey No. 942, containing 3.99 acres, described by metes and bounds, on which final certificate issued December 18, 1914, be, and the same is hereby, validated, and the Secretary of the Interior authorized to issue patent thereon.

SEC. 10. That upon the survey of an island, locally known as Island Park, situated in the North Fork of Snake River, in section 1, township 7 north, range 40 east, Boise meridian, Idaho, the city of St. Anthony, through its proper representative, shall have the right to purchase said island so surveyed for park and memorial purposes, for a period of 60 days after the filing of the official plat of such survey in the United States local land office, at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the island herein mentioned shall be used by the city of St. Anthony for park and memorial purposes only, and should the city abandon its use for such purposes said island shall revert to the United States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall have the effect of defeating the rights of any person or persons which may have attached to the island or any part thereof: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations to carry this act into effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WALTER I. WHITTY.

The bill (S. 2989) for the relief of Walter I. Whitty was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

FRANK SCHOBLE, JR., AND RAYMOND E. DAY.

The bill (S. 3896) for the retirement of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond D. Day, first lieutenants in the United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on line 5, to strike out "D." and insert "E.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That First Lieut. Frank Schoble, jr., formerly of the Three hundred and eighteenth Infantry, and First Lieut. Raymond E. Day, formerly of the One hundred and forty-sixth Infantry, are each hereby retired with the grade of captain, to take rank next after the last name on the retired list of captains of Infantry at the date of the enactment of this measure into law, to receive the pay and allowances in all respects as to retired officers of similar grades in the Regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the retirement of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond E. Day, first lieutenants in the United States Army."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, accompanying the bill just passed there is a report from the Committee on Military Affairs. These two young officers were wounded in the Battle of the Argonne, and both were totally blinded; and I want to commend the Committee on Military Affairs for favorably reporting this bill. It is the least that we could do for these young officers.

In order that the House and others that may be interested shall be fully informed, I ask unanimous consent that the report from the committee on Military Affairs be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that will be the order.

The report, submitted by Mr. SUTHERLAND April 3, 1920, is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3896) for the retirement of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond D. Day, first lieutenants in the United States Army, having considered the same, report favorably thereon, with the recommendation that the bill do pass with the following amendments:

In the title of the bill, change the middle initial of Raymond D. Day to "E." so that the name will read "Raymond E. Day."

In line 5 of the bill, after the name "Raymond," strike out the initial "D" and insert in lieu thereof "E."

These changes are made in accordance with information received from the War Department.

Your committee is informed that First Lieut. Frank Schoble, jr., Three hundred and eighteenth Infantry, and Raymond E. Day, One hundred and forty-sixth Infantry, are the only two American officers who were totally blinded as a result of wounds received in the war with Germany. Both of these men are, of course, absolutely helpless and must look to the Government for support. The amount of money these men might receive from their war-risk insurance would not be sufficient to meet the needs of men in their distressing condition. It is estimated that the retired pay of a captain would be the least that these men could maintain themselves on.

A report from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, dated March 9, 1920, reads, in part, as follows:

"I have received a copy of S. 3896, with a request for a report thereon. This bill provides for the appointment of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond D. Day to be captains on the retired list of the Army.

"The two beneficiaries of this bill both hold commissions as first lieutenants of Infantry for the period of the emergency and both are now under treatment for disabilities incurred while in the service. Their cases are fully covered by the compensation provisions of the war-risk insurance act, and as that act has just been thoroughly revised by Congress, it must be supposed that its provisions are considered adequate in all respects. Even if it were otherwise, however, the proper remedy would be a new revision granting impartial treatment to all instead of special legislation singling out a few individuals for particular favors.

"I find no justification for such partiality, even if the discrimination contemplated were very small. But in this case it is enormous, whether comparison be made with other emergency officers or with officers of the Regular Army. This bill proposes to advance its beneficiaries one grade above that which they attained in the service. An officer of the Regular Army, as you are aware, is retired upon his actual permanent rank, regardless of the emergency grade he may have attained. If the principle of this bill were applied to Regular Army officers, there are hundreds of lieutenants who would be entitled to retire with the rank of lieutenant colonel, or even in higher grades, and hundreds of captains who would retire as general officers."

Your committee does not agree with those parts of the report of the War Department which states that these two cases are fully covered by the compensation provisions of the war-risk insurance act; that this measure can be considered as a show of favoritism to a few individuals, and that there is no justification for such partiality. Your committee wishes to emphasize the fact that these two men are totally blind, which will require the constant presence of an attendant and makes it impossible for them to ever take part in work of any character in order to help themselves along. They are the only officers in the entire Army in this condition, and the committee believes that the additional assistance proposed by this bill is absolutely necessary in order that their living expenses may be met. It is urgently requested that favorable action be taken on the bill.

The military records of Lieuts. Schoble and Day are as follows:

LAND AT FORT BLISS, TEX.

The bill (S. 3139) for the purchase of land adjoining Fort Bliss, Tex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, under objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report on Senate bill 3139 be published in the RECORD at this point for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, that order will be made.

The report, submitted by Mr. KIRBY on April 5, 1920, is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3139) for the purchase of land adjoining Fort Bliss, Tex., having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass without amendment.

Your committee found that the present military reservation consists of a little over 1,200 acres of land purchased by the citizens of El Paso and donated to the Government and of this 1,200 acres of land there is now available for drill and recreation purposes less than 200 acres of ground, the balance being occupied by barracks, quarters, and stables for two regiments of Cavalry and one of Artillery, as well as a battalion of mounted Engineers, a battalion of Signal Corps, Motor Transport Corps, motor transport repair shops, storage warehouses, wireless station, waterworks, incinerator, and military cemetery.

The land proposed to be purchased under this bill was appraised by a board of civilians named by Gen. Cabell, in command of the Southern Department, who appraised the 300 acres immediately adjoining the post at $350 per acre and 1,700 acres farther to the east (adjoining the 300 acres) at an average of $180 per acre. The option price to the Government of this latter is $150 per acre.

The land proposed to be purchased under this bill is the only land at present available in this vicinity as a landing field for aviation or drill ground for troops necessary to be kept at Fort Bliss under the present disturbed conditions on the border.

The city of El Paso is built out to the present military reservation, and all land to the south and west is laid out in city lots, most of the streets paved, sewerage, water, and electricity put in; to the north is the city waterworks, so that the only available land for military purposes is to the east. Your committee found that the 300 acres now used as a landing field for aviation has been used for a number of years free of expense to the Government, and the owner of this ground declines to permit further use of it, neither will he lease it, as he is 85 years of age, and does not care to tie this land up in a lease with the city already built to the same.

The acquisition of additional land for drill and aviation purposes is an urgent and imperative necessity with a garrison of approximately 8,000 men, of which nearly all are mounted, and all the present reservations covered by buildings with the exception of 180 acres available for drill ground, which is just enough for the two battalions of mounted Engineers and Signal Corps, and leaves no drill or maneuvering ground for practically 7,000 mounted troops, nor does it leave a landing field for units of the Air Service of approximately 40 machines.

The bill is recommended by the War Department in two letters which are appended hereto and made a part of this report. These letters explain the necessity for its purchase and the situation at Fort Bliss, and are as follows:

DECEMBER 26, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: The War Department recommends the enactment of legislation as contained in bill S. 3139, appropriating $356,700 for the purchase of 2,000 acres of land adjoining and to the east of the present military reservation at Fort Bliss, Tex.

Of the present reservation, less than 200 acres are available for drill purposes, which is not a sufficient area upon which to properly drill and instruct the troops necessary to be maintained at that place.

Due to the conditions existing on the Mexican border, it is not deemed advisable to reduce the garrison now maintained at Fort Bliss.

At the present time two regiments of Cavalry and one of Field Artillery, besides complements of the Engineer Corps, Signal Corps, Motor Transport Corps, aviation units, etc., are stationed at this post in connection with Mexican border service.

Practically all of the existing reservation is taken up by construction, excepting a small area estimated at less than 200 acres, and it is deemed most necessary in the interests of military activities at this post that the proposed 2,000 acres be purchased in order that sufficient ground shall be available to properly drill and instruct the troops which of necessity must be maintained at this station.

In the past the land which it is proposed to purchase has been in part held under lease; the remainder has been used by the Government, through sufferance, by consent of the owners. The landowners now object to continuing the lease to the Government of these areas thus held, and the owner of the other area objects to the further use of his land by the Government; neither will the owner consent to a lease; it becomes necessary therefore for the Government to purchase the necessary land.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MARCH 23, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I beg to call to your attention and urge the enactment of S. 3139 with reference to the purchase of additional land at Fort Bliss, Tex.

This land which it is desired to purchase is largely a part of the Ascarate lease, the legality of which is disputed by the lessors. The War Department has been advised that the El Paso Chamber of Commerce, the lessors, who acquired this land from the various owners under lease, and in turn leased same to the Government, find the owners extremely anxious as to final settlement, and consider that it will be necessary to serve notice on the Government to vacate this land unless settlement is reached within the next 30 days.

It is impossible for the War Department to maintain and conduct the necessary military activities at Fort Bliss, Tex., indispensable for the proper and reasonable safeguarding of the interests of this Government on that sector of the Mexican border, unless sufficient real estate is available at Fort Bliss upon which to maintain the troops and the utilities incident thereto. It is believed that the minimum land requirements are met if S. 3139 is enacted, which provides for the purchase of 2,000 acres of land at a cost of $356,700. In view of the extreme situation which will confront the War Department by nullification of the Ascarate lease, it is urgently recommended that early and favorable consideration be given to the pending measure.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CODE.

The bill (H. R. 6025) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, this is a bill to revise the Code of the District of Columbia. It has been pending, in one form or another, for three or four years in either the House or the Senate. The House had hearings upon the bill. It was framed by a committee of the bar of the District of Columbia, and is recommended by all of the judges of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia. It was unanimously recommended by the Judiciary Committee of the House and passed the House without objection. It came to the Senate committee, and a hearing was had upon the bill, and on the recommendation of the judges and the bar association, it was unanimously recommended for passage.

I will explain two or three features of the bill and ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, because if it is read I do not think it can be passed before 2 o'clock. There is one amendment on page 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the reading of the bill will be dispensed with. The Secretary will state the amendment reported by the committee.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 20, it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That said rules be posted or published not less than 30 days prior to the date when they are to become effective—

And to insert:

Provided, That said rules shall not become effective until 30 days after the date when they are adopted and spread upon the minutes of the said general term: And provided further, That said court in general term shall not have power to make or establish rules regulating pleading, practice, or procedure in equity which are inconsistent with the rules in equity heretofore or hereafter adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

So as to make section 65 read:

SEC. 65. The general term of said court shall be open at all times for the transaction of business; and said court, by orders passed in general term, may regulate the periods of holding the special terms, fix the number of said terms, and alter the same from time to time, as public convenience may require; may direct as many terms of any of the special terms to be held at the same time as the public business may make necessary; may assign the several justices from time to time to the respective special terms; may establish written rules regulating pleading, practice, and procedure, and by said rules make such modifications in the forms of pleading and methods of practice and procedure prescribed by existing law as may be deemed necessary or desirable to render more simple, effective, inexpensive, and expeditious the remedy in all suits, actions, and proceedings: Provided, That said rules shall not become effective until 30 days after the date when they are adopted and spread upon the minutes of the said general term: And provided further, That said court in general term shall not have power to make or establish rules regulating pleading, practice, or procedure in equity which are inconsistent with the rules in equity heretofore or hereafter adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States; may appoint a clerk, an auditor, and also a crier and a messenger for each court in special term, and all other officers of the court necessary for the due administration of justice, with the exception of all officers and employees in any manner connected with the probate term, and also United States commissioners; may hear charges of misconduct against any judge of the municipal court and remove him from office for cause shown; may admit persons to the bar of said court and censure, suspend, or expel them; and may pass all other orders not inconsistent with existing laws which may be necessary to the effective administration of justice in said court, but said court shall not hear any cause in general term: Provided, That the general term may assign more than one justice to a special term for the trial of a given case.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PENSIONS TO SURVIVORS OF INDIAN WARS.

The bill (S. 447) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second section of the act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917, be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the period of service performed by beneficiaries under this act shall be determined: First, by reports from the records of the War Department, where there are such records; second, by reports from the records of the Treasury Department showing payment by the United States, where there is no record of regular enlistment or muster into the United States military service; and, third, when there is no record of service or payment for same in the War Department or the Treasury Department, by satisfactory evidence from muster rolls on file in the several State or Territorial archives, or by congressional documents embodying memorials from States or Territories to Congress or furnished by States or Territories or by executive departments of the Government at the request of Congress, or by records compiled under State authority duly accepted by such States as a basis for appropriations or reimbursement to Indian war survivors and their widows: Provided, That the want of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive any applicant of the benefits of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RETENTION OF UNIFORMS.

The bill (S. 3908) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 2, lines 17, 18, and 19, to strike out "or a uniform, any part of which is similar to a distinctive part of the duly prescribed uniform of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps"; on page 3, line 4, to strike out "$1,000" and insert "$300"; and on page 3, line 5, to strike out "one year" and insert "six months," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, be, and the same hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. That any person who served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war may, upon honorable discharge and return to civil life, permanently retain one complete suit of outer uniform clothing, including the overcoat, and such articles of personal apparel and equipment as may be authorized, respectively, by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, and may wear such uniform clothing for four months after such discharge, and not thereafter except on reunion, ceremonial, or memorial occasions: Provided, That the uniform above referred to shall include some distinctive mark or insignia to be prescribed, respectively, by the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, such mark or insignia to be issued, respectively, by the War Department or Navy Department to all enlisted personnel so discharged: Provided further, That no such person or other civilian shall wear either the uniform aforesaid, or the duly prescribed uniform of the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or any distinctive part of such uniform while engaged in or participating on either side of a labor controversy, strike, or industrial disturbance, whether as striker, labor leader, picket, strike breaker, guard, watchman, employer, representative of an employer, policeman, bailiff, sheriff, or other public officer, or while engaged or participating in a riot or similar public disturbance; and any person who shall violate the provisions of this proviso, and any person who shall procure, advise, aid, counsel, or abet another so to do, shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $300 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. The word 'Navy' shall include the officers and enlisted personnel of the Coast Guard who have served with the Navy during the present war."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK S. INGALLS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I did not wish to interrupt the course of the calendar by discussing two small bills, but I wish to ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to Orders of Business 437 and 438. The first is a claim bill, which provides for the payment of $36.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 685) for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANK PINKLEY.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senate. I wish also to ask the Senate to recur to House bill 687, for the relief of Frank Pinkley. This bill has passed the House, I think, once or twice. It provides for the payment of a claim of $350, long ago ascertained to be due to Mr. Pinkley.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 687) for the relief of Frank Pinkley.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCormick	Sheppard
Ball	Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hale	McLean	Smoot
Borah	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Brandegee	Henderson	Myers	Swanson
Capper	Hitchcock	Nelson	Thomas
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	New	Townsend
Culberson	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Nugent	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kenyon	Page	Warren
Edge	Keyes	Phelan	Watson
Fernald	Knox	Phipps
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Pittman
Gay	Lodge	Ransdell

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senate had reached section 7 of the pending bill in the process of reading it for action on the committee amendments. Before we proceed to a consideration of further amendments I would like to have unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a statement adopted and made public by the National Guard Association of the State of New York having to do with the proposal contained in the bill to bring the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution, as contrasted with its present status under the militia clause.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the statement may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks for the reading of the statement. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

The National Guard Association of the State of New York, assembled in convention in the city of Albany this 20th day of March, 1920, having considered at length the problems affecting the reorganization of the National Guard of the United States, believe and declare its conviction to be that the National Guard, as a national body of citizen soldiery, can not be organized under the militia provisions of the Federal Constitution so as to perform adequately and constitutionally the national functions which should be performed by the citizen soldiery of the Nation, and therefore urge upon the Congress that it provide for the reorganization of the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution, providing in connection therewith a subordinate State status sufficient to meet the military needs of the States.

The National Guard Association has been moved to adopt this recommendation because the recent history of the country shows that the national emergencies which have required the use of troops in excess of the Regular Army have not been among those prescribed by the Constitution as occasions when the militia may be called for and used by the President. Because, further, it is apparent that the future will present similar occasions when the President, in need of troops to meet a national emergency, can not, under the Constitution, employ any force of citizen soldiery which suffers the limitations imposed by the militia status.

The National Guard Association of the State of New York concurs in the recommendation of the National Guard Association of the United States that the future efficiency of the National Guard demands that it have its own representation overhead in Washington as a part of the War Department, and believes that such overhead can not constitutionally be appointed by the President nor constitutionally be given authority and jurisdiction to perform their functions in time of peace if the National Guard is continued under the militia provisions of the Constitution, which deny the President the authority to appoint officers of the militia in time of peace.

The National Guard Association invites the attention of the Congress to the fact that in the Spanish War the National Guard could not constitutionally be employed as such because of its militia status, and so it became necessary to create a Volunteer Army, and although the National Guard constituted the mass of such Army, they were compelled to enter it as individuals, and the esprit and morale of their units were dissipated in the process of reorganization.

That when the Philippine insurrection necessitated the use of troops in excess of the Regular Army, so obvious was it that the National Guard could not be employed as such by reason of their militia status that the War Department was compelled to organize regiments of United States Volunteers to meet that emergency.

That upon the occasion of the Mexican border disturbance, although the Federal Government employed the National Guard as such for the purpose of repelling invasion, nevertheless even for such purpose the experience conclusively showed the confusion and delay inseparable from the transfer of men, property, and organization from a State status to an active Federal status, and that in any event before the National Guard could have been employed for the purpose of entering Mexico its officers and men would have had to be drafted as individuals so as to be relieved of their militia status.

That the experience of the World War showed that the National Guard could not be employed therein as a national force until its officers and men were divested of the militia status by being drafted into the Federal Army and discharged from the militia, and that process resulted in delay, confusion, and the impairment of the efficiency of units at a time when their efficiency should have been at the best.

That the termination of the Federal service of the National Guard in the World War necessitated the absolute discharge without any military status and this at a time when its units were at the zenith of their efficiency and esprit as a result of their magnificent battle service abroad.

That in the opinion of the National Guard Association of New York a repetition of this experience in the future can not be prevented by recourse to an amendment of the national-defense act providing for a reinvestment of the militia status immediately upon discharge from the Army for the reason that a voluntary militia status from which men have been released by discharge can not constitutionally be re-created and arbitrarily imposed by statute upon men without their consent and voluntary action given anew.

That only by reorganizing the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution can Congress invest in the Federal Government in time of peace the power to train the National Guard which is essential if the National Guard is to be something more than an aggregation of State forces and is to assume the rôle of a national body of citizen soldiery.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, let the reading of the bill be proceeded with.

The reading of the bill was resumed on page 6, line 15, and the Reading Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The National Guard of the United States: The National Guard of the United States shall consist of such commissioned officers, enlisted men, and civilians of the permanent personnel as shall be assigned thereto under regulations to be prescribed by the President and of such reserve officers and reservists as may be appointed, commissioned, or enlisted therein as hereinafter provided.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are two amendments that are corrective in their nature which I want to offer to section 7. On page 6, line 18, after the words "personnel as," I move to strike out the word "shall" and insert in lieu thereof the word "may"; and on the same page, line 19, after the word "under," I move to strike out the words "regulations to be prescribed by the President," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the provisions of this act," so that it will read:

as may be assigned thereto under the provisions of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 22, page 8, the last clause read being as follows:

SEC. 10. The initial organization of the National Guard of the United States and the organized reserves: In the initial organization of the National Guard of the United States and of the organized reserves the names, numbers, and other designations, flags, and records of the divisions and subordinate units thereof that served in the World War between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, shall be preserved as such as far as practicable. Subject to revision and approval by the Secretary of War, the plans and regulations for the initial organization and territorial distribution of the organized reserves shall be prepared by a committee of the branch or division of the War Department General Staff, hereinafter provided for, which is charged with the preparation of plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the land forces of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. An omission has occurred in line 18, on page 8, and I suggest this amendment. In line 18, after the words "organized reserves," I move to insert the words "and the National Guard of the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 12, page 9, line 23, to strike out the word "eleven" and insert "nine" before "colonels"; in line 24, before "lieutenant colonel," to strike out "eighty-eight" and insert "eighty-five"; in line 25, before "majors," to strike out "ninety-two" and insert "eighty-three"; on page 10, line 1, before "captains," to strike out "eighty-four" and insert "sixty-six"; in line 2, before "first lieutenants," to strike out "fifty-five" and insert "thirty-nine"; in line 3, before "second lieutenants," to strike out "fifty-two" and insert "forty"; in line 4, to strike out "and enlisted men"; in line 6, after the word "Academy," to insert the word "and"; in line 7, to strike out the words "and the flying cadets of the Air Corps"; in line 8, to strike out "sixty-three thousand two hundred" and insert "eighty thousand"; and in line 10, to strike out "exclusive" and insert "inclusive," so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 12. Composition of the permanent personnel: For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the President is authorized to maintain not to exceed the following permanent personnel: The General of the Army, during the tenure of office of the present incumbent; 20 major generals of the line; 50 brigadier generals of the line; 609 colonels; 685 lieutenant colonels; 2,283 majors; 4,566 captains; 4,339 first lieutenants; and 2,740 second lieutenants; the officers of the Medical Service, the Corps of Chaplains, professors of the United States Military Academy, and the warrant officers, all as hereinafter provided for; and 280,000 enlisted men in their appropriate grades as hereinafter provided for, inclusive of the enlisted strength of the Medical Service and the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York whether he would not be willing to pass over all of the amendments proposed in section 12, because whether all these officers shall be retained I think will depend in some degree upon what action is taken with reference to universal military training. I think they ought to be considered together.

Mr. CURTIS. May I add further the suggestion to the chairman of the committee that we have a vote first on the compulsory military training clause, because it will affect several provisions of the bill, as I understand it. If it is adopted, then certain provisions will have to be made, and if it is defeated, which I hope it will be, then another situation will arise, and certain provisions now found in the bill can be eliminated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thank the Senator from Kansas for his kind wishes. I may speak only for myself. Of course, the Senate has complete charge of the bill. I am not willing at this time to have a vote on the provision which relates to universal military training.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not ask that a vote be taken now.

Mr. LENROOT. I had in mind merely passing over such amendments as would be affected by the action the Senate might take on the matter of universal military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that the committee amendments, commencing near the bottom of page 9, reduce the number of officers?

Mr. LENROOT. I understand, but I think they would be very much further reduced if universal military training is not adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly there is nothing to prevent the Senate from further reducing them later on.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; there is the parliamentary situation. If we once adopt an amendment, it is not open to further amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. It would have to be reconsidered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senate would be master of the situation.

Mr. CURTIS. May not these amendments on pages 9 and 10 be passed over?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly willing to pass them over as requested.

Mr. LENROOT. I think the amendments contained in section 12 ought to be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the greater portion of the proposed amendments and the greater portion of the bill itself is so interwoven with the question of universal military training that it seems to me manifestly the part of wisdom to determine first whether we are going to have universal military training. Of course, if the Senator from New York does not want to vote on that now, then I suggest that we let it go over. We do not want to have any great delay over the matter; but it does seem to me that we would be in a very much better position to discuss the other provisions of this reorganization bill if we knew whether we were going to have universal military training, because substantially the greater part of the provisions of the bill, I believe, will be dependent, certainly as to the number of officers throughout the bill, upon what is done with that provision in the bill.

I merely suggest that we might have an agreement that we vote on the military-training feature first, and then take up such other amendments as there may be. I do not mean the committee amendments which the Senator desires to have agreed to in order to perfect the bill. I see no objection to doing that, unless we are precluded in the future from offering amendments, and I think the Senator from New York will not insist on that, one way or the other. I see no objection to going ahead and perfecting the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is all I ask.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think, when it comes to a vote, we ought to vote on the universal military training feature first and then proceed with the remainder of the bill. I think the Senator from

New York will agree to that course, and, if he has no objection, I ask unanimous consent that when we vote we shall vote on the universal military training first and then proceed to such other amendments to the bill as may be necessary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It would be rather difficult to prescribe such a unanimous-consent agreement without ascertaining just what the amendments to carry it out would amount to. I understand there are at least two amendments already pending, introduced by Senators, to strike out section 51. I do not know what other amendments are pending that depend on the question of universal military training. It seems to me it would be rather difficult to get a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on that question until we see in what form it is going to be presented.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to suggest that we proceed with the reading of the bill, and when any Senator, like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has already done, finds an amendment that he thinks would depend for or against its support on the provision as to military training that he ask to have it go over, and that it shall go over. There are a great many amendments which have nothing to do with universal military training, like section 15, for instance.

Mr. LENROOT. There are very few cases where the committee amendments affect that question. If we can pass over those, we can go on with the reading of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is all I want. Any amendment that Senators believe is connected with that question can be passed over.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments to section 12 be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Reading Clerk continued the reading of the bill to line 24, page 13, the proviso, beginning on line 21, reading as follows:

Provided further, That no enlisted man may be rated for extra pay as a specialist unless he be in the grade of private, first class, or private.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In line 24, after the word "private," I offer the following amendment as an insertion at that point. May I say that this is to correct a situation which was not anticipated to be brought about by the meaning of the text of the bill in a comparatively minor particular, but it should be corrected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 13, line 24, after the word "private," insert a comma and the following words:

Except as hereafter specified, to wit, upon the promotion of any rated specialist to the grade of corporal or sergeant he may be given such lower rating as specialist as will make the pay of his new grade, increased by the extra pay fixed for such lower rating, equal to that received by him prior to his promotion: Provided further, That such promotion shall not increase the total number of specialists hereinbefore authorized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of line 4, page 18, the last section read being as follows:

SEC. 18. The Cavalry: The permanent personnel of the Cavalry shall consist of one chief of Cavalry, with the rank of major general, and 750 officers and 14,000 enlisted men, in their appropriate grades, all of whom shall be detailed or assigned from the permanent personnel as provided for in this act. The reserve personnel shall consist of all reserve officers and reservists of the organized reserves and National Guard of the United States assigned to Cavalry units as provided for in this act.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to address myself to the provision of the bill which has just been read as reported by the committee. As the Senator from New York knows, I was unable to act as a member of the subcommittee on the bill, but I was present in committee at the meeting which finally accepted the bill. In some way my attention was not drawn to the number of cavalrymen and Cavalry officers provided for in the bill. I desire to say that I think we shall make a very serious mistake if we do not enlarge the number of cavalrymen and Cavalry officers—of course, taking the numbers from the other arms of the service. Perhaps it would be best to take them from the Infantry.

The situation is this: When we had in our Army only fifty or sixty thousand men we had 10,000 and then 15,000 Cavalry, and when we passed the national-defense act we raised the number of cavalrymen to 25,000. The Cavalry has been organized on that basis. If we should have trouble and become involved in war it is likely to be more or less a guerrilla warfare, which must be conducted on horseback. The strengthening of Cavalry by the mounting of Infantry is difficult, because it requires men who are used to the training and riding of horses and to drilling and fighting on horseback. Cavalry can be and often is engaged on foot; in fact, our Cavalry abroad in the late war were usually employed in that way. So I should be glad to have the chairman of the committee consent that an amendment be offered to increase the number of cavalrymen to at least 20,000 and the number of officers to 950 and reduce the Infantry or other arms of service by an equal number.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator from Wyoming sure that the Infantry is the best place to take them from?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that it would seem to me so, because while it is true that this bill gives great authority and liberty in forming tactical units, in fact it is left entirely, we might say, with the President, yet in a service like the Cavalry, the requirements of which are greater than those of the Infantry, perhaps it would be well to make up the number from the Infantry, for that branch can be more easily enlarged, if necessary, than any other branch. However, if there is any other branch from which the chairman prefers to take the whole or a part of this increase for the Cavalry, it will be entirely agreeable to me, for I am speaking only in the interest of what appears to me to be a very serious matter, namely, the reduction of the number of our Cavalry as low as this bill reduces it—to 14,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me call the attention of the Senate and of Senators to the provisions of section 16, which will be found on page 15, and reads as follows:

The President is hereby authorized, in accordance with the requirements of the service, except when otherwise specifically prescribed in this act, to increase or to decrease the number of officers, enlisted men, or civilians of the permanent personnel herein provided for any arm, corps, or service: Provided, That no arm, corps, or service shall be so decreased by more than 20 per cent.

Under that provision the President can do the very thing which the Senator from Wyoming suggests.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, following that logically, why do we put any limit upon any branch of the military service? Why do we say so many for the Infantry, and so forth, if we choose to leave it to the President?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because we want to strike a minimum, at least, and we do strike a minimum by saying that none of these arms of the service may be reduced below their stated strength more than 20 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. I think as to the Cavalry it would be very serious to fix the number at 14,000 and then leave it subject to be decreased. I think we should increase the number not to 25,000, as the law now provides, but to 20,000. I think that should be the very least. As to the taking of them from other arms of the service, I am not at all particular. They might be taken from wherever the chairman thinks best.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My only fear is that this offhand way of taking from one arm of the service and adding to another on the floor of the Senate without studying the effect upon the whole situation is rather dangerous. I am not certain that the Infantry could spare 6,000 men.

Mr. WARREN. Possibly it would be better to take the number from another place. Would the chairman prefer that I reserve the privilege of offering an amendment later and that the matter go over until he can further study it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. Then, these two sections, being sections 17 and 18, relating to this matter may go over, and there may be reserved also the right to reconsider the number of men in the other branches.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are no amendments which have been proposed to these two paragraphs, anyway. So it does not make any difference for the time being.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 13, on page 19, the last clause read being as follows:

Provided, That not to exceed 10 per cent of the officers of the permanent personnel herein provided for the Air Corps who fail to qualify as aircraft pilots or as observers within one year after the date of such detail or assignment shall be permitted to remain detailed or assigned to the Air Corps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 8, after the words "per centum," I offer an amendment to insert the words "in each grade below that of Chief of the Air Corps," so that it will read:

That not to exceed 10 per cent in each grade below that of Chief of the Air Corps of the officers of the permanent personnel herein provided for the Air Corps—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 21, page 19, line 22, after the word "hundred," to insert "and shall be counted and included in the total number of enlisted men herein authorized," so as to read:

Provided further, That the total number of flying cadets so enlisted or appointed in the Air Corps shall not at any time exceed 2,500, and shall be counted and included in the total number of enlisted men herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Fernald	Lenroot	Pomerene
Beckham	France	Lodge	Ransdell
Borah	Gay	McKellar	Sheppard
Brandegee	Gerry	McLean	Smoot
Chamberlain	Gore	Moses	Swanson
Comer	Hale	New	Thomas
Culberson	Harris	Norris	Wadsworth
Curtis	Henderson	Phelan	Warren
Dillingham	Kellogg	Phipps
Edge	Kenyon	Pittman

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is not present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CAPPER, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. PAGE, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland answered to their names when called.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. KEYES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. LENROOT. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] on public business.

Mr. TRAMMELL, Mr. McNARY, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. NUGENT, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. McCORMICK, Mr. SPENCER, and Mr. KNOX entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

EARL B. GADDIS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I observe in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 25 that my colleague [Mr. NORRIS] has again taken occasion to attack my secretary, Mr. Gaddis. This performance is gradually taking on the appearance and character of a fixed habit on the part of my virtuous but rather oversensitive colleague. I have, however, only one thing to say in reference to the matter at this time, and that is with reference to a statement made by my colleague which bears on its face the stamp of unreliability as well as of absurdity.

The Senator recklessly says that in the community where Mr. Gaddis is best known his uncorroborated testimony would not be taken even as prima facie evidence of a fact. This particular slander is very easily disproved.

Mr. Gaddis is best known in Nebraska. When he left the State to come to Washington he was given a farewell banquet at Lincoln, the capital of the State. The occasion was honored by the presence of the governor of the State, the chief justice and two associate justices of the supreme court, 50 members of the legislature, many other State officers, a large number of business and professional men of Lincoln, and a number of newspaper men. My colleague must know that such an honor would only be paid to a newspaper man of high repute. Yet the Senator uses his position on the floor of the Senate under the privilege of a Senator to attack this young man's character.

My colleague must of necessity know of the high standing of my secretary in Nebraska. He knows, or he ought to know, that for several years Mr. Gaddis reported the sessions of the State legislature for the World Herald of Omaha, and that when I named him as my secretary and called him to Washington the legislature of 1917 adopted complimentary resolutions on his splendid work as a legislative reporter and congratulated me on selecting him for my secretary.

I mention these facts, which are well known in Nebraska, in order that those who heard or read the reckless statements of my colleague may also know the truth about Mr. Gaddis.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in the reading of the bill we have now reached section 24. That has to do with the reorganization of the General Staff Corps.

Mr. President, the General Staff, as now authorized by law, is composed of 52 officers of grades and ranks fixed by the law. There is also an inhibition in the present law against over half of the members of the General Staff being detailed here in Washington. I will read the provision, which is found in section 5 of the national defense act of 1916:

> Not more than one-half of all the officers detailed in said corps shall at any time be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in or near the District of Columbia.

Mr. GORE. How many are there?

Mr. McKELLAR. There are 52 in all, and 26 of them only may be assigned in Washington—not more.

The provisions of this bill in relation to the General Staff make rather sweeping changes. The bill divides the General Staff into a General Staff here at the seat of Government and a General Staff in the various departments. It increases its number very largely. There are to be 126 here in Washington, because no restriction is made such as is made in the national defense act. The powers and duties of the General Staff are very greatly added to, as Senators will see by reading sections 24, 25, and 26 of the bill.

Mr. President, I want to say that in opposing the enactment of these three sections of the bill into law I do not want my opposition construed in the slightest degree as a reflection upon the present Chief of Staff, Gen. March. He is an officer for whom I have the highest admiration. I think he has been one of the very best officers in the entire war. I think our success in the war is in quite a large measure due to the splendid ability, the vigor, the activity, the good sense, and many other sterling qualities of Gen. March. My objections, therefore, to these provisions of the bill are not in any sense in criticism of anybody, but they are against the policy of creating here in Washington an immense General Staff, as compared with the General Staff now provided for by law. I have already stated that the law in regard to the present staff provides only for 52 men, 26 of whom may be stationed here in Washington. The bill as passed by the House provides, as I recall, for 93 members of the General Staff, and the House bill likewise does away with any restriction upon where the General Staff shall be, and, of course, that means that they will be here in Washington.

This bill adds tremendously to the General Staff. It makes the General Staff the center of the Army and provides for grouping all the rest of the Army around the General Staff. The General Staff is given enormous powers. The General Staff, under this bill, is given the same kind of powers that the General Staff in the Prussian Army held.

Some time ago an Army officer whose name I do not know, though I have tried to find out, prepared a criticism of these provisions for the Army and Navy Register, a journal devoted to the Army and Navy, and here is what that officer had to say about these provisions of the bill. I ask the Senate carefully to consider what this officer says, because he analyzes the provisions in a way that makes it perfectly evident that we ought not to adopt this legislation. I read from the officer's statement, incorporated in the minority report filed on this bill:

> This section provides for an indeterminate, but certainly enormous, increase in the peace-time allowance of officers of the General Staff Corps as now fixed by law. And it proposes that all of the present restrictions of law as to the rank of such officers shall be swept away, leaving that very important matter entirely to the discretion of the Executive, which, in practice, means the Chief of Staff.

I pause long enough to interpolate here for the benefit of the Senate an explanation of how the General Staff is now constituted by law. I read from section 5 of the national-defense act, which is the present law:

> The General Staff Corps shall consist of one Chief of Staff, detailed in time of peace from major generals of the line; two assistants to the Chief of Staff, who shall be general officers of the line, one of whom, not above the grade of brigadier general, shall be the president of the Army War College, 10 colonels, 10 lieutenant colonels, 15 majors, and 17 captains, to be detailed from corresponding grades in the Army, as in this section hereinafter provided.

There is no such restriction in this bill. The 126 could all be made up of brigadier generals, if they were handy; they could all be captains, or colonels, or majors. There are no restrictions as to the rank; but the bill provides that a board shall determine it, as I will read just a little later.

Now, I continue to read from the article in the Army and Navy Register:

> All this is in accord with the firm purpose, manifest throughout the entire bill, to keep to the utmost all power and authority in or within reach of military hands, and to an equal extent to avoid all other limitations or restrictions, especially those imposed by law. In this respect the proposed bill as a whole evidences a spirit fully as militaristic and intolerant of civilian control as that manifested by the remarkable bill (S. 2715) lately submitted to the Senate by the War Department.

That was a bill, as Senators will recall, which was introduced, perfunctorily, I believe, at the request of the War Department. It was such a remarkable exhibition of desire for power on the part of those in control of the Army that it was abandoned, and this bill substituted. I will say that, in my judgment, some of the most objectionable features of that War Department bill, Senate bill 2715, are in this bill, and let Senators not make any mistake about it, this bill if passed will build up a military system in this country equal to any that has ever been in existence under any government at any time in the world's history. I am going to read the provisions of the bill in a moment to prove that what I say is correct.

Now, I continue to read from the article:

Section 24 provides for 101 Army officers, rank not specified, in the War Department General Staff, plus at least 25 reserve officers, rank not specified, plus as many more of such officers as it may become desirable to furnish with nominal but highly paid employment for personal, social, or political reasons.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator quite sure that this bill provides for 126 officers for the War Department General Staff?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will take pleasure in quoting what I believe upholds that. I read from page 23 of the bill:

The War Department General Staff shall consist of one Chief of Staff, selected by the President from the Army of the United States, and 100 officers detailed from General Staff eligibles in the Army of the United States in grades not below that of captain.

That is 101.

Provided, That in the event of the selection of a Chief of Staff whose grade is below that of major general, that officer, in time of peace, shall hold the rank of major general.

There is another provision which states that reserve officers not exceeding 25 per cent of this number shall be added.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let the Senator read that provision, and I will show that he is mistaken. It will be found on page 24, line 13.

Mr. McKELLAR. It reads:

Provided further, That not less than 25 per cent of the authorized strength of the War Department General Staff and the general staff with troops shall consist of reserve officers eligible for such detail, and who, with their consent, may be ordered into active service for this purpose under the provisions of this act and shall be distributed among and shall serve in all divisions, branches, or sections of the General Staff Corps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I want to know if the Senator will not admit his error?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will if I made one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator said there were 126 officers on this War Department General Staff.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are 100 officers provided for on page 23, and 101, including the Chief of Staff. Of those, 25 per cent must be reserve officers, under the provision on page 24. You do not add 25; you include 25.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the language will have to be changed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; we will read the language and have this straightened out right now. It reads:

That not less than 25 per cent of the authorized strength of the War Department General Staff and the general staff with troops shall consist of reserve officers.

That means that 25 per cent of the 100 officers shall be reserve officers. You do not add 25; you include 25.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary, because if the Senator will look at line 15, page 23, he will see it provides that—

The War Department General Staff shall consist of one Chief of Staff, selected by the President from the Army of the United States, and 100 officers detailed from General Staff eligibles in the Army of the United States in grades not below that of captain.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Army of the United States, under this bill, includes all reserve officers. The 100 must come from the Army of the United States. The Army of the United States is classified into two personnel provisions, the permanent personnel and the reserve personnel. They are all in the Army. Seventy-five of these officers may be in the permanent personnel, and 25 must be in the reserve personnel.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if this language has that meaning, then, like the language of the Delphic oracle, it may be considered either way, because if an officer who has discussed this matter, and who certainly knows what he is talking about——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator know the officer's name?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not. I made the statement in the beginning that I had tried to get his name from the Army and Navy Register.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I tried also, and I could not get it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was unable to get it. But there is one thing sure, that the officer who wrote that article understands this bill and understands Army legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He does not understand the English language.

Mr. McKELLAR. I must say that I can not understand the language myself if the language means what the Senator says, because it looks to me as if it is in addition and not in subtraction.

I continue to read from the article:

Section 24 provides for 101 Army officers, rank not specified, in the War Department General Staff, plus—at least 25 reserve officers, rank not specified, plus as many more of such officers as it may become desirable to furnish with nominal highly paid employment for personal, social, or political reasons. The possibilities of the measure in this respect are vast and must be entrancing to the proponents of the scheme. As will be seen later in this paper, many more possibilities of the same kind are provided for in other sections of the proposed bill.

But assuming, without hope or expectation, that the War Department General Staff will be kept down to the limit of 126 officers, that number will be more than four times the number permitted by section 5 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, to be employed or stationed in or near the District of Columbia. And it will be more than four times the number of officers for whom, in time of peace, appropriate General Staff work can be found in Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator still insist that that officer was right?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is subject to doubt, but I know that the Army will resolve that doubt in favor of creating the offices if we pass this bill as the Senator has prepared it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply want the Senator to be fair in this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have read both provisions, and I differ with the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is reading into the RECORD a statement by an alleged officer of the United States Army, whose name is a mystery, in which a distinct misstatement is made about the bill. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, I want to call that officer to account. He has written this article in an Army periodical, and he is wrong. If I could find out who he is, I would give his name to the Senate. I have my suspicions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would do the same thing if I knew. I tried to get his name, but could not get it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the Senator will look in section 2, on the first page of the bill, he will find the Army of the United States defined, and that it includes all the permanent personnel, the National Guard of the United States, and the organized reserves. Now, turning again to page 23, we find this language:

One hundred officers detailed from General Staff eligibles in the Army of the United States.

On page 24 the provision exists that of that 100, 25 per cent must come from the reserve personnel of the Army of the United States. The total is 100. The officer is wrong.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if the officer is wrong, the Senator from New York would have no objection to an amendment, which I shall certainly offer, providing that in no event shall the General Staff here in Washington be permitted to have more than 101 officers. In other words, as I understand the Senator, his position is that the bill provides for 101 officers. I am glad the Senator believes that way, because I think even a smaller number than this will be ample. The Senator does not believe that this language provides for 125 officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know it does not.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says it provides for 101. Then the Senator would be willing, as I take it, to agree to an amendment which will definitely and beyond the peradventure of a doubt provide for 101 staff officers, and I shall so seek to amend, if this amendment should be adopted. Now I continue reading from the article:

The disorganization and demoralization that has been constantly increasing in the great bureaus of the War Department since the creation of the General Staff Corps in 1903 has been chiefly, if not wholly, due to the fact that there have always been so many General Staff officers under assignment to duty in Washington that enough appropriate General Staff work to keep them employed and out of mischief could not be found for them, so that naturally they busied themselves, with great injury to the public service, by taking to themselves and mishandling much work of an administrative nature that belongs to the various bureaus and can not be handled properly elsewhere.

If the activities of the War Department General Staff be confined to its own appropriate work, as required by section 5 of the national defense act, the number of General Staff officers authorized by that section to be employed in or near the District of Columbia will be ample for that work.

Right there I ask again, What is going to be done by these 101 officers, as we will put it now? One of their duties might be looking after the National Army which will be created under the provision for universal military training, if that is adopted, and that was one of the reasons I had a while ago when I stated that I thought the question of universal military training ought to be determined first. If we are going to have universal military training, we will need more General Staff officers here in Washington. If we are not going to adopt universal military training, we do not need so many General Staff officers here in Washington. You permit the appointment of 101 General Staff officers here in Washington, and no lobby that we have here will be comparable to that lobby which we will constitute by law, and when I say that I mean no reflection upon these gentlemen. That is their profession. Naturally they are devoted to it. Naturally they are going to stand up for it. But, Senators, this provision is fraught with danger to this Republic, because we know whenever trouble has come from within any Republic it has come from militarism, and militarism of the kind that is engendered by the creation of a powerful general staff.

With regard to the General Staff with troops—

Mind you, the General Staff we have been talking about up to this date is the General Staff here in Washington increased from 26 members here in the city to 101 members, nearly four times.

With regard to the general staff with troops, it is impossible to make even a good guess as to the number of officers, from and including generals down to and including captains, that would be assigned to that service if the proposed bill were to become a law. The bill proposes to authorize 5 such officers for each division, 12 for each Army corps, 19 for each Army and territorial department, and reserve officers to the extent of not less than 25 per cent of the whole number plus as many more as it may be found desirable to furnish with light and lucrative employment for personal, social, or political reasons.

Section 9 of the bill provides that there shall be established not less than 12 corps areas, each of which shall contain one or more divisions; also that the President may organize all or any number of "such Army corps into armies" and "group corps areas into Army or department areas."

Assuming, optimistically, that under this extremely elastic provision there will be established, presumably in skeleton form, only 12 Army corps, 24 divisions, 3 armies, and 2 departments, the total number of General Staff officers for those organizations will be 359. If no more than the minimum number of reserve officers required by the bill shall be detailed—that is, 25 per cent of the total number of General Staff officers—the whole number of General Staff and accompanying reserve officers with those organizations will be 449. Adding to this number the 126 officers in or with the War Department General Staff—

Under the construction of the bill given by the distinguished chairman of the committee, it will have to be reduced 25 from this number—gives for the entire General Staff Corps a total of 575 officers of all grades from and including generals down to and including captains.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the wildly extravagant bill (S. 2715) recently sent to the Senate by the War Department proposed for an Army of about 500,000 men a General Staff personnel of 231 officers, much less than half of the like personnel made more than probable by the measure now under consideration for an Army of less than 300,000 men. In this and various other respects as well the proposed bill is even more objectionable than the severely and justly criticized S. 2715.

I want to make a statement about that. Here is the War Department providing for 500,000 men and providing for a General Staff of 231, and here is the bill providing for 280,000 men and a General Staff of 570 all told. What are these 570 officers going to do in time of peace? Ever since I have been in Congress, since 1911, while I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the House, as well as in the Senate, there has been a tremendous fight and there has been a persistent effort upon the part of the General Staff to increase the number of officers that they would have here in this city. There was a big fight to increase the number in 1916, when we passed the national-defense act. There was a bigger fight to do away with that provision in it that provided that only one-half of them could remain in Washington.

Section 25 gives the duties of the General Staff, and here is what this officer says about that:

At the commencement of this section is a specification of the duties of the General Satff Corps, which is substantially the same as that embodied in the organic General Staff act of February 14, 1903, and which by direct reference thereto, was made a part of section 5 of the national-defense act of June 3, 1916. Why this particular matter should have been included in the proposed bill and other very important restrictive provisions of said section 5 should have been omitted can only be explained by assuming, as is doubtless the fact, that this was done for the purpose of thereby effecting the repeal of those other provisions of a restrictive nature. It is more than likely that that purpose could and would be accomplished in this way, in effect at least, in view of the well-known attitude of the War Department and the General Staff toward those other provisions.

There can be no objection to the reenactment, with the slight changes now proposed, of this part of the organic General Staff act, but surely this ought not to be done without adding to that part the other highly important provisions of section 5 of the national-defense act, unless, of course, it is the desire of Congress to destroy those provisions and thus to make certain the future continuance of the injurious practices that are now prohibited by them, somewhat vainly at the present time, it is true, because of the defiant refusal of the present Secretary of War to obey and enforce those provisions of law.

In another provision of the bill the so-called Manchu law is so modified as to be made useless in my judgment. That provided that every four years an officer would have to serve with the troops. This bill modifies it in such way that, in my judgment, it can be avoided. The law that required officers to serve with troops was based on a situation somewhat like this: It was found here in 1911 or 1912—I remember it was one of the first cases that came up after I came to Congress—that an officer, I believe a lieutenant general in the Army, had risen almost, if not quite, from the ranks and gone through every grade of office in the United States Army and had become a lieutenant general and had never served a day with troops in his life. As a consequence of that condition that law was enacted. It was restrictive, and it was a good law.

The idea of an Army officer not serving with troops! He should be required to serve with troops, and that modification of the general law is in line with this modification of the General Staff act. In the future officers of the General Staff may stay here virtually as long as the board so determines.

I am going to read some of the very remarkable provisions of the bill:

SEC. 24. The General Staff Corps: The General Staff Corps shall consist of the War Department General Staff and the general staff with troops.

That means 550 officers, I may say by way of parenthesis.

Except in time of actual or threatened hostilities, all officers detailed in the General Staff Corps shall be detailed therein from the Army of the United States for periods of four years, subject to the provisions of this act, unless sooner relieved.

That allows the Manchu law to be disregarded.

Provided, That no officer shall be detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps unless he shall appear on the General Staff eligible list as hereinafter provided for: Provided further, That officers serving as members of the General Staff Corps upon the passage of this act who are not eligible for detail to the General Staff Corps under the provisions of this section may, at the discretion of the Secretary of War, be retained on such duty until the expiration of their present details.

The Secretary of War shall cause to be prepared and published a list of officers eligible for duty as General Staff officers with troops, and hereafter no officer shall be detailed to the General Staff Corps unless his name appears on said eligible list. The initial eligible list shall be prepared by a board consisting of the general of the Army, the commandant of the General Staff College, the commandant of the General Staff School, and two other general officers of the line to be selected by the Secretary of War. This board shall select and report the names of all officers of the following classes who are recommended by them as qualified by education, practical military experience, and character for duty as General Staff officers with troops: (a) Those officers graduated from the Army Staff College or the Army War College prior to July 1, 1917, who upon graduation were specifically recommended for duty as commander or chief of staff of a division or higher tactical unit or for detail in the General Staff Corps; (b) those officers who since April 6, 1917, have demonstrated by actual service in war that they are qualified for duty as commander of a brigade or higher unit or as chief of staff or assistant chief of staff of a division or higher unit; (c) those officers who, as permanent or emergency members of the General Staff since April 6, 1917, have demonstrated by actual service that they are qualified for assignment and detail to the General Staff Corps. After the preparation of the initial eligible list no officer shall be added thereto unless such officer upon graduation from the General Staff School has been specially recommended as qualified for duty as a General Staff officer with troops: Provided, That the eligible list as herein provided for shall be revised annually by a board consisting of the senior general officer on the active list, the commandant of the General Staff College, and the commandant of the General Staff School: Provided further, That hereafter no officer shall be detailed as a student officer at the General Staff College unless he is a General Staff eligible specially selected for further training for duty in the War Department General Staff or for high command. But nothing herein shall be construed as preventing the detail of officers of the several corps and services as special students in courses designed to inform such corps and services as to their proper duties and functions in carrying out the approved plans and policies of the Department of War: Provided further, That whenever any General Staff eligible, including those on the initial list, is classified below class A by any board of general officers provided for in section 44 of this act, his name shall forthwith be dropped from the list of General Staff eligibles. The Secretary of War shall publish annually the list of officers eligible for General Staff duty, and the fact of such eligibility in the case of each eligible officer shall be noted in the annual Army Register.

I wonder how much chance an officer out in the field has under these circumstances? How much chance has he got to get an important command? I read further:

The War Department General Staff shall consist of 1 chief of staff, selected by the President from the Army of the United States, and 100 officers detailed from General Staff eligibles in the Army of the United States in grades not below that of captain: Provided, That in the event of the selection of a chief of staff whose grade is below that of major general, that officer, in time of peace, shall hold the rank of major general during his continuance in office.

The general staff with troops shall consist of the number of general officers, colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, detailed from General Staff eligibles in corresponding grades in the Army of the United States, and such enlisted men or reservists as may be necessary to perform the general staff duties of the headquarters of the various territorial departments, armies, army corps, and divisions of the Army of the United States, and as military attachés abroad: Provided, That in time of peace the number of officers of the general staff with troops that may be detailed under the provisions of this act for duty with the headquarters of tactical and territorial commands shall not exceed the following: For a division, 5; for an army corps, 12; for an army or territorial department, 19: Provided further, That not less than 25 per cent of the authorized strength of the War Department General Staff and the general staff with troops shall consist of reserve officers eligible for such detail, and who, with their consent, may be ordered into active service for this purpose under the provisions of this act and shall be distributed among and shall serve in all divisions, branches, or sections of the General Staff Corps.

I desire at this point to pause long enough to say that evidently the detail of so large a number of officers is in view of the adoption of the universal military training provisions to be found in subsequent sections of the act. Otherwise, it could not be justified, because we shall have no such departments, army corps, and other organizations as are provided for in the bill. The bill further reads:

Provided further, That when the number of General Staff eligibles in the Army of the United States is not sufficient to fill the necessary details in the War Department General Staff and in the general staff with troops, selected officers of the permanent and reserve personnel in the aforesaid proportions may be detailed thereto as acting General Staff officers: And provided further, That reserve officers not generally qualified for enrollment in the eligible list herein established, but who since April 6, 1917, shall have efficiently performed special duties as members of a branch or division of the General Staff, or as assistants therein—.

Providing for all of them—may be enrolled as reserve General Staff officers for assignment to duty in the General Staff for the performance of such kind of special duty.

I now reach a social provision of the bill:

Military attachés and assistant military attachés at American embassies and legations abroad shall be detailed from the officers of the permanent or reserve personnel in the grades from major to colonel, inclusive, in accordance with the provisions of this act. Whenever officers of suitable qualifications and of the rank herein prescribed are not available for such detail, the President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to detail officers of lower rank, with temporary rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, or major; and officers so detailed shall have the pay and allowances of such temporary rank during the duration of such detail: Provided, That the number of officers so detailed shall not exceed three at any embassy or two at any legation.

That provides some very nice foreign berths for a number of officers.

SEC. 25. Duties of the General Staff—

Remember, there are 550 of them, 101 or 120, whichever way the bill reads, being here in Washington—

The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for national defense and the use of the military forces for that purpose, both separately and in conjunction with the naval forces, and for the mobilization of the manhood of the Nation and its material resources in an emergency; to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and its state of preparation for military operations; and to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff in the performance of their functions.

The duties of the General Staff with troops shall be to render professional aid and assistance to their commanding generals, and to act as their agents in coordinating the plans, duties, and operations of the various organizations and services under their command.

SEC. 26. Duties of the Chief of Staff: The Chief of Staff shall preside over the War Department General Staff and, under the direction of the President, or of the Secretary of War under the direction of the President, shall cause to be made, by the War Department General Staff, the necessary plans for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, mobilizing, training, and demobilizing the Army of the United States and for the use of the military forces for national defense. He shall transmit to the Secretary of War the plans and recommendations prepared for that purpose by the War Department General Staff and advise him in regard thereto; upon the approval of such plans or recommendations by the Secretary of War, he shall act as the agent of the Secretary of War in carrying the same into effect, and shall supervise all parts of the Army of the United States in such manner as to secure harmonious action. Whenever any plan or recommendation involving legislation by Congress affecting national defense or the reorganization of the Army is presented by the Secretary of War to Congress, or to one of the committees of Congress, the same shall be accompanied, when not incompatible with the public interest, by a study prepared in the appropriate division of the War Department General Staff, including the comments and recommendations of said division for or against such plan, and such pertinent comments for or against the plan as may be made by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or individual officers of the division of the War Department General Staff in which the plan was prepared.

Mr. President, it will be seen from the reading of these provisions that one of the principal duties will be to organize and cause to function the great conscript army that we are going to raise by means of universal military training. By the way, while I am not going to discuss that question at this time, it was mentioned yesterday, and I think it is proper to say now that while the bill provides that American boys shall be inducted into the Army only for the purpose of training, nevertheless, precisely the same machinery that we used to force them into the Army during the war is to be used to put them in the Army, and they will not have to be again conscripted. They are simply held in the Army; they are required to appear at two subsequent periods during the five years for further training, and they can be called out at any time without any further act of Congress.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator does not make that statement advisedly. These boys can not be called unless the Congress acts, which is exactly the opposite of what the Senator states.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, they may be called when Congress declares war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the act of Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. We declared war here on April 6, 1917, and we passed the act of conscription on May 18—a separate act—and called the boys out. It will not be necessary to do that under this proposed act. They are conscripted when they are called for training; they are put into the Army of the United States. Do not let us make any mistake about it; we must understand just exactly what this bill means; and when Senators vote for the provisions of the bill they vote for the conscription of the young men of the country in times of peace.

Mr. President, the reason why I have taken the time to discuss the General Staff Corps is because I have introduced an amendment to strike out those three provisions of the bill. If we have universal military training it will be necessary to increase the General Staff; there is no doubt about that; but if we do not have universal military training it will be wholly unnecessary, in my judgment, to increase the General Staff; and surely there ought to be restrictions whether we increase it or not as to the number of men on the staff who are permitted to remain in Washington. I hope that when we come to vote on the bill we may vote on the universal military training proposition before we vote on the provisions regarding the General Staff; otherwise we can not vote intelligently, as it seems to me, on those sections of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 1, on page 25.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on page 25, line 1, after the words "General Staff officers," I offer an amendment in the form of a further proviso.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not object to the Senator offering the amendment, with the understanding that it is not to preclude us from offering amendments to strike out or otherwise to amend the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the words "General Staff officers," on page 25, line 1, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That in order to insure intelligent cooperation between the General Staff and the several noncombatant services, officers of such services may be detailed as additional members of the General Staff Corps, under such special regulations as to eligibility and redetail as may be prescribed by the President; but not more than two officers from each such service shall be detailed as members of the War Department General Staff.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is one other amendment on line 9, of the same page, which I desire to offer. I move at that point to strike out the words "and assistant military attachés."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 25, line 9, after the word "attachés," it is proposed to strike out the words "and assistant military attachés," so as to read:

Military attachés at American embassies and legations abroad shall be detailed—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 17, on page 27, the next section being section 27, relative to the Undersecretary of War.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to discuss the next section of the bill for just a moment. I am going to read the section, and I am perfectly willing that my reading of it may be taken as the reading by the Secretary, if it is so desired, in order to save time. I read as follows:

SEC. 27. The Undersecretary of War: There shall be in the Department of War the office of the Undersecretary of War. The Undersecretary of War shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary of $10,000 a year, payable monthly, and in the absence of the Secretary of War shall become Acting Secretary of War and shall exercise all of the powers and perform the duties of the Secretary of War. Under regulations approved by the Secretary of War he shall be charged with the direction of the procurement of all munitions, commodities, supplies, and equipment for the Department of War and the Army. He shall, under said regulations, exercise such supervision and direction of the financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs. In the performance of the duties herein assigned he shall exercise such supervision of the several bureaus, corps, and services and shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions among them as may be prescribed by said regulations.

I call special attention to the last sentence:

In the performance of the duties herein assigned he shall exercise such supervision of the several bureaus, corps, and services and shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions among them as may be prescribed by said regulations.

Two or three years ago in this body we had probably one of the greatest fights that ever occurred in this body over what was known as the Overman bill. The bill was violently fought. It was regarded by some Senators—some Senators who are now favoring this bill, as I understand—as an Executive usurpation of power, as the exercise of powers that were to be exercised only by the Congress. It was charged that it was the exercise of powers that only tyrants used. We remember the expressions that were used about the exercise of these powers. Our Republican friends, especially, fought with vigor the exercise of the power of distribution and redistribution of the functions of the various officers in the various departments. It was claimed that President Wilson was demanding autocratic power, because that bill gave him such a power; and yet in this bill our Republican friends propose, in so far as the War Department is concerned, to give the Undersecretary of War the same powers in that department that the President had exercised in war time.

Mr. President, the Overman bill could be defended only on the ground that we were in war; and here, in peace time, we are giving a new officer—unknown to the forms of our Constitution and laws up to this date, a copy of the English law and custom on this subject—these supposedly autocratic powers. Certainly they are powers that no Undersecretary of War ought to have.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just a minute. I might pause here long enough to say that I do not believe in divided authority in any department of the Government. If this bill is passed, the Secretary of War will be hardly more than a knot on a log. The Undersecretary of War will have the power under this bill, subject to some slight overcontrol, to redistribute the functions of the department, and it ought not to be granted to him.

I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, is there not this distinction: The Senator from Tennessee has cited the Overman Act. As I remember, the Overman Act gave the Chief Executive power practically to consolidate departments, to reorganize them, and to change their functions; but this bill simply provides that the Undersecretary of War shall "exercise such supervision * * * and shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions" as may be necessary in relation to the mobilization of industries to provide munitions. It does not give him any powers to change the department; it does not give him any powers to consolidate them, and then only under regulations to be prescribed by the President or by the Secretary of War. They are limited. They are far different from the Overman Act. In fact, there is no parallel, in my opinion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read from the bill itself, on page 28:

Under regulations approved by the Secretary of War—

He establishes the regulations now, and then he proceeds to act.

He shall be charged with the direction of the procurement of all munitions, commodities, supplies, and equipment for the Department of War and the Army. He shall, under said regulations, exercise such supervision and direction of the financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs.

Now, here is where he gets the power:

In the performance of the duties herein assigned he shall exercise such supervision of the several bureaus, corps, and services——

All of them—

And shall cause—

He does not have to submit that to anybody—the Secretary of War or anybody else—

And shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions among them—

That is, among all of the services and the corps and the departments—

As may be prescribed by said regulations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, are not "the said regulations" to be issued by the Secretary of War?

Mr. McKELLAR. I stated that in the beginning—that when the regulations are issued then the Undersecretary of War has absolute control of them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Secretary of War can change the regulations at any time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Where is the provision about that? As I remember the bill, in a subsequent part of it there is a council provided for, in which they vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is nothing provided about a vote at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The three are to have certain powers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is nothing about voting at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I will read it, and let us see about it.

There shall be in the office of the Undersecretary of War not more than three assistants, to be appointed by the Secretary of War from civil life or detailed from among the commissioned officers of the Army.

Right there I will pause long enough to say that we are putting the civilian part of the War Department into the hands of Army officers here. We are permitting it to be done. From time immemorial it has been the habit—not uniformly, but almost uniformly—to have the Secretary of War and his assistants appointed from civilian life.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, are not these appointments from civil life?

Mr. McKELLAR. They can be, or they can be from military life. It says here:

Three assistants, to be appointed by the Secretary of War from civil life or detailed from among the commissioned officers of the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator know that under the Assistant Secretary of War to-day officers of the Army are detailed? Is there any change in principle involved in this?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know. Is not the Assistant Secretary of War an Army officer now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all. The Assistant Secretary of War is a civilian, and under him are detailed Army officers, just as this provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, it is a new provision in the law. It is not in the law now. It has some meaning, and it can have but one, and that is to militarize the War Department.

I read:

If appointed from civil life, they shall receive a salary equivalent to the pay and allowances of a brigadier general of the Army. There shall also be in the office of the Undersecretary of War a chief clerk, who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per year, and who shall perform such duties as the Undersecretary of War may prescribe. There shall be detailed to the office of the Undersecretary of War from the corps and services engaged in procurement such number of officers and civilian employees as may be authorized by regulations approved by the Secretary of War.

In that connection I want to read from a subsequent provision of this bill, if I may, for just a moment. [A pause.] I shall have to add that later on. I do not find it here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I understand the nature of the Senator's criticism? Do I understand that he objects to these powers being conferred upon an Undersecretary or a Secretary of the War Department upon the ground that they are too broad and too extensive?

Mr. McKELLAR. I object to this provision because it establishes a new office wholly without reason for it. We have had a Secretary of War and an Assistant Secretary of War throughout our history. To undertake now to create an officer virtually on an equal footing with the Secretary of War, called an Undersecretary of War, and give him these vast powers over industry as it comes in contact with the Army, is something that I see no reason for. I do not understand why it should be in this bill. I see no reason for it, and I do not believe that the War Department ought to be made a committee.

I read now the war council provision.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to answer that statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I will.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course, in the preparation of this bill, which has taken practically a year, in an effort to reorganize our Army for national defense in order that we might learn the lessons to be derived from this war certain provisions have been inserted in the bill which are based upon the experience of the past.

Mr. McKELLAR. The provision for an undersecretary of war is not based on the experience of the past.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; I will show the Senator, if he will bear with me, why that provision is in the bill. The Military Affairs Committee have had in mind, in the preparation of this bill, a reorganization of the Army in such a manner that we will never again be caught in the plight that we were caught in when we declared war against Germany; that we will not only have a skeleton standing Army, capable of expansion, but that we will have a preparation in those things which we had lost sight of prior to this war, namely, the mobilization of industry in peace times for war.

It was found, as the Senator will admit, that the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell, practically had to take over the mobilization of the industries of the country which were manufacturing munitions of war, and it was necessary that he should have broad powers and authority during the war, which were conferred upon him from time to time by designation of the Secretary of War. Now, the committee have had in mind that the Undersecretary of War should be an official who would mobilize these industries, who would keep statistics as to the facilities, as to the necessities of the Army, as to the necessities of preparation, and therefore it was felt that an Undersecretary of War with these powers would be a necessary provision and a very advantageous provision and a wise provision for future preparedness, should we have to meet the emergency that we had to meet at the beginning of this war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am interrogating the Senator. He has the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has made a good speech, and I just want to ask him a question. The Senator admits, I suppose, that Mr. Crowell had authority during the war to mobilize the industries and to otherwise conduct his portion of the department to the best interests of the country?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will also admit that Mr. Crowell as Assistant Secretary has made a good record, I suppose?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then why make a change, and give the power to some one else? Why give it to another officer?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer the Senator. Because in peace times the function of the Assistant Secretary of War is not to mobilize these industries. He has no such power or authority, and in our effort to have a proper bill we thought that possibly an officer with these powers should be provided for in this bill. I think it is highly advisable.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator confirms the objection that I have to this provision of the bill. Why is it necessary, in times of peace, to confer these remarkable powers over the industries of the country, and put the powers in the hands of an Undersecretary of War? We did not do that in war times. In the bill that was passed giving power for Mr. Crowell to act, we gave it to the President of the United States; we did not even give it to the Secretary of War. But here in this bill, in time of peace, it is proposed to give the officer who is graded under the act as Undersecretary of War powers just as vast over the industries of the country as those given to the President during times of war. It is wrong in principle. It is impossible in policy, in my judgment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is very courteous in yielding to me. He has just made an astounding statement. Will he point out in the bill where the powers over the industries of the United States are given to the Undersecretary of War?

Mr. McKELLAR. I read again from section 27:

> Under regulations approved by the Secretary of War he shall be charged with the direction of the procurement of all munitions, commodities, supplies, and equipment for the Department of War and the Army. He shall, under said regulations, exercise such supervision and direction of the financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs.

He is instructed to so control such industries of our country in time of peace as that they may be used in time of war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am astounded to hear the Senator put that meaning on that language. There is nothing of the sort there. If the Senator will read it again, he will find that he has under his direction such "financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement" of the things which the War Department buys. He has no control over industries at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator just left off the last part of the sentence, "and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of the matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs." Why is he given power over these war-time organizations, and why does he procure the matériel or produce the matériel through the industrial organizations, if it is not intended to do something with it? That language has some meaning. In my judgment, it has a most powerful meaning, a meaning that is not helpful to the industries of the country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All the Undersecretary of War can do is to make plans for the procurement of matériel needed in time of war. He has no control over the factories of the United States in time of peace. Any such construction is utterly outside of the text. In connection with the Senator's question of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] as to why we should change the position of Mr. Crowell, as now constituted in the Department of War, it may interest the Senator to know that Mr. Crowell is the principal author of this section.

Mr. McKELLAR. If that is the case, I doubt the wisdom of giving the gentleman who proposes to be the Undersecretary in peace times the control of these organizations. I regret to know that Mr. Crowell is undertaking to create an office for himself. I do not think Congress ought to be guided by Mr. Crowell's advice, although I think Mr. Crowell has made an excellent officer under the law as it is.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am very much afraid the Senator has not read the testimony of Mr. Crowell in this regard.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not; but I would like to hear it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know Mr. Crowell is not trying to create an office for himself. Mr. Crowell has personally stated to me that he has been very anxious to get back to civilian life. He has simply stayed in the department in an effort to liquidate present contracts, and settle the intricate problems of the War Department that have been created by the war.

On page 1760, volume 2, of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, Mr. Crowell advocates the creation of the office of Undersecretary of War. In his testimony he said:

> I am to-day presenting to you two more charts. The first shows the War Department organization as it exists to-day, and the second shows this organization as it should be when fully completed.
> With the large group of men, such as the War Department has called upon to carry a greatly increased load, any change of organization must be accomplished slowly, and this is the reason that the reorganization work was done gradually, and I believe it could not have been otherwise accomplished.
> Proceeding now to the permanent organization of the War Department, I believe that in a general way certain broad principles should be followed. First of all, we should profit by the experience of the war we have just gone through and should permanently maintain such departments as were found necessary during that war. In other words, we should organize the War Department so that it will function in time of war. I therefore believe that it is necessary to maintain during time of peace such departments as are necessary in time of war, even if their personnel is cut down to a handful of officers. To merge these necessary departments into other departments in time of peace is, in my opinion, an error.
> All the functions of the War Department can be divided into two main groups, the military function and the munition and supply function. At the head of the War Department stands the Secretary of War, and he should naturally have two chief advisers. The head of the Military Establishment should advise the Secretary of War on all military matters, and the head of the munitions department should advise the Secretary of War on all matters relating to munitions and the supply of the Army.
> All orders of the Secretary of War relating to military matters should be handed down from the Secretary of War, through the head of the Military Establishment, to the proper departments. All orders of the Secretary of War relating to munitions should be handed down, through the Chief of Munitions, to the proper departments. The head of the Military Establishment would, therefore, have charge of all military matters, such as the training of troops, the operation of troops, etc. He should have no authority whatever over industrial matters. The Chief of Munitions, on the other hand, should, with his staff, have charge of all matters relating to the munitioning of the Army but should have no voice in military matters.
> When munitions must be provided in the quantities necessary for a major war, the questions of procurement and production become of tremendous importance. It is not too much to say that the industrial stability of the Nation depends upon the ability and skill with which the problems of procurement and production are handled. It is believed that the ability, experience, and skill for this kind of work can be found only among the industrial leaders who have spent their lifetime in the study and solution of industrial problems. The organization of the War Department should, therefore, be such that the services of men of this type may be immediately availed of.
> The actual reorganization of the War Department to meet these general principles is very simple; in fact, requires very little change from the organization which we found when we entered the war. The Director of Munitions should, of course, be a civilian, since it is very rare that an officer of the Army is temperamentally fitted to head a huge supply organization. The military mind and the industrial mind are entirely different. Since he must be a close adviser of the Secretary of War and have large authority, he should fill the position of Assistant Secretary of War. The duties of the Assistant Secretary previous to 1918 could profitably be handed over to other officials.
> Under the Director of Munitions in this connections would be grouped all problems of purchase and procurement, of storage and transportation. To the corps and bureaus of the War Department as they now exist would fall the duty and function of the problems for which they were severally created. However, in order that bureau competition should be eliminated in the matter of purchases, storage, etc., the Director of Munitions should be vested by law with authority to standardize procurement and distribute and redistribute the function of purchase as applied to specific articles, especially where they are common to the operation of two or more bureaus, as best experience would dictate. With this strong supervisory power in the Director of Munitions I believe will be found the solution of the much-criticized condition of purchases in the War Department prior to the operation of the Overman Act.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been trying to learn something about this bill. I am not a member of the committee, and I may ask some questions which perhaps are primary in character. In view of the testimony of Mr. Crowell to which the Senator from New Jersey has referred, I desire to ask this question: Am I to understand, from what has been said, that under this bill the Undersecretary is independent of or is a subordinate to the Secretary of War?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is subordinate, because he is acting under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War, or the President through the Secretary of War.

In conclusion, I simply submit to the Senator from Tennessee the testimony of Mr. Crowell, showing the reasons for the recommendation which he made, that a Director of Munitions named Undersecretary should be provided in order that we might gain from the experience of this war the knowledge that it is necessary in time of peace to have in order to prepare for war, so as to have the industries of the country under a separate head from the military authority. That is the reason why we believed that it was wise and advisable, in the reorganization of the Army, to provide that an Undersecretary of War, or Director of Munitions, should be provided for in this act. I hope the Senator will read all of the testimony, and if so he will find other reasons in addition to those which I have cited, and they will, I think, convince him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am much obliged to the Senator from New Jersey for his contribution to the subject by offering the testimony of Mr. Crowell. I want to say for Mr. Crowell that I think he has made a most excellent officer in this war. I have no criticism to make of him so far as carrying out the duties of the office which he held is concerned. I take great pleasure in testifying to the high character and ability of Mr. Crowell. I have no criticism of any kind to make of him. He has made a good officer.

But that is not the question here, and I regret that Mr. Crowell has recommended a bill or a provision of a bill that would give to an Undersecretary of War war powers that a great many people doubted whether they ought to be conferred even on the President of the United States at a time when this country was at war with a powerful enemy. Great criticism was made of many Members of the Senate who voted for that legislation. Here it is in peace time when our Republican friends have reported out a bill that will give these extraordinary powers to an Undersecretary of War.

In answer to a question from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] the Senator from New Jersey said that the Undersecretary of War was subject to the Secretary of War. That is correct in a way, but a reading of the two provisions of the bill, sections 27 and 28, indicates very strongly that the Undersecretary of War is given a most important part of the duties of the Secretary of War. I read from section 28.

SEC. 28. The War Council: The Secretary of War, the Undersecretary of War—

And there is a proposed amendment to include "the General of the Army," who was not included in the original bill—and the Chief of Staff shall constitute the war council of the Department of War, which council shall from time to time meet and consider policies affecting both the military and munitions problems of the Department of War.

I stop long enough to say that apparently it was the purpose of the person who drafted the bill to confer large powers as to industrial matters upon the Undersecretary of War and then give to the Chief of Staff a rather deciding vote when it came to a conference.

I read further:

Questions of policy affecting both the military and munitions problems of the Department of War shall be presented to the Secretary of War in the war council, and the decision of the Secretary of War with reference to such questions of policy, after consideration of the several recommendations thereon by the Undersecretary of War and the Chief of Staff, shall constitute the policy of the War Department with reference thereto.

Now, the Senator from New York says that is not a vote. Well, it looks to me like it is. The Undersecretary and the Secretary differ, or the Chief of Staff or the General of the Army and the Undersecretary differ, and the Secretary of War passes on it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator suffer an interruption?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator what his criticism is of that provision?

Mr. McKELLAR. This is my criticism: I would not be Secretary of War under any circumstances with this provision giving to the Chief of Staff and the General of the Army and the Undersecretary of War a portion of my duties. If it is a good policy for the War Department, why is it not a good policy for the State Department or the Treasury Department? Why not divide into independent departments the Treasury Department, for instance? Would that make for efficiency or inefficiency of government? The Secretary of War can not pass on a matter either in regard to munitions or military matters, according to the terms of the bill, until he has a conference with the Undersecretary of War, the General of the Army, and the Chief of Staff and receives recommendations from them, and then when they pass the question up to him he decides upon their differences. The Secretary of War ought to have the right to control his own department, and these men ought to be subject to him and under his control.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They are.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill does not so provide.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, it does, under regulations.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not read it that way.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let me ask the Senator what objection there is to a council? Is not a council a wise provision, particularly when it is necessary for them all to cooperate, to ascertain what is necessary to fight a war or what is necessary to provide, we will say, for the defense of the border in peace times, because we have had to defend the border under this administration in peace times. Is it not wise to have the cooperation of all of these officers?

We fought against red tape during the war and we tried to break it down. The Overman Act was one of the results of the protest of the Military Affairs Committee. Now the Senator wants to go back to that old disorganized system. What the Committee on Military Affairs have attempted to do is to organize it properly. I do not think very much of the criticism of the Senator from Tennessee when he objects to a policy of council. Did the Senator vote for the Overman Act?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I did, absolutely.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator believe it did any good?

Mr. McKELLAR. It did some good, but nothing like the amount of good that was claimed for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was opposed to it, but I believe that it did great good.

Mr. McKELLAR. We had to have something of the kind during the war, but that is a very different proposition from what is contained here. By this provision of the bill we divide the War Department into at least two parts, the one to be controlled by the Secretary of War and the other to be controlled by the Undersecretary of War.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not so.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says it is not so. That is his opinion. The Senator does not want to be offensive in the matter at all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. He ought not to use that kind of language.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will show to the Senator why it is not so. While there is a divided authority over two policies, one the policy of the purchase of munitions and the other the military policy, nevertheless they are all subject to the control of the one head under regulations by the Secretary of War. That is why I say it is not true that there is a divided authority.

Mr. McKELLAR. The regulations are not made by the Secretary of War. They are simply approved by the Secretary of War under the Senator's bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They are made by the President.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are not made by the President. They are made by the officers that the Senator's bill is going to coordinate and put in the office of the Secretary of War. Let us read from a man who certainly knows about it, and it does not make any difference whether his name is disclosed or not. There is one thing about the man who wrote the article in the Army and Navy Register—he understands this bill:

This section is one of the most dangerous and objectionable features of the entire bill. Its principal purpose is exactly what was sought by the War Department to accomplish in Senate bill 2715. That purpose was, and still is, to establish as permanent law some of the worst features of the Overman Act. The enactment of this section 27 in its present form would fully accomplish that purpose. It would create that despotic, unrestricted control over powers, duties, and functions, lawfully and properly pertaining to the great staff corps and departments, that it was vainly sought to create by means of the universally condemned Senate bill 2715.

There appears to be no objection to that first part of the section, which provides for an Undersecretary of War (why adopt this British title instead of our own title of Assistant Secretary of War?)——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to state to the Senator that that is not a British title, but is already employed at the present time here. There is an Undersecretary of State named in the statute.

Mr. McKELLAR. We copied that from England. I am not much of a copier after England or any other nation. I think that the less copying and the more Americanism we put in our laws the better it is for our country.

For my part, I see no reason in it. I say I see no reason in it, but there is reason in it. It is the purpose to divide the functions and duties of the War Department and put them under two men instead of one, which does not make for efficiency.

I continue to read:

There appears to be no objection to that first part of the section, which provides for an Undersecretary of War (why adopt this British title instead of our own title of Assistant Secretary of War?) who shall have "direction of the procurement of all munitions, commodities, supplies, and equipment of the Department of War and the Army," and who "shall exercise such supervision and direction of the financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs."

I am going to stop long enough to say that the war regulations as to the business of the country and as to the industries of the country ought to be removed. There are complaints coming from every part of the country, protesting against the keeping of these war-time restrictions on the statute books. They ought to be removed and business ought to have a free hand. Instead of that, however, an Undersecretary of War, under the provisions of this bill, is to have his hand on the industries of the country in so far as they affect his department and the materials used in the industries that may be necessary. It is an improper restriction on the business of the country. It will lead to favoritism and it ought not to be adopted. He continues:

But the most dangerous, unnecessary, and therefore objectionable proposal is embodied in the last sentence of the first paragraph of the section; it is this——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield further to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, surely.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator point out wherein the Undersecretary of War, by the power conferred upon him in this bill, is given any power to interfere with any of the business interests of the country?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have read the section two or three times.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know; but it gives him no authority or power over the business interests of the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Listen to this. The Senator can understand what language means:

He shall, under said regulations—

I do not know who adopts those regulations under the bill. The Senator spoke of them a while ago. It does not say, and I do not know who adopts them, but they are adopted. Let us suppose they are adopted out of the clouds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator says he does not know who adopts them. If the Senator does not know, perhaps I can——

Mr. McKELLAR. They are approved by the Secretary of War, but who adopts them or who creates them under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suppose the Senator imagines that they may come out of the air?

Mr. McKELLAR. I was just wondering if they do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, they are made by the Secretary of War.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then why say "regulations approved by the Secretary of War"? If they had been regulations created by the Secretary of War and prescribed by the Secretary of War, that is all right, but it does not say that. The approval of the Secretary of War is of something that has already been created. For instance, when we approve a treaty that has been created by the President, we approve the treaty; we do not create it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we did not approve it!

Mr. McKELLAR. We are not referring to the League of Nations or the treaty of peace yet. We are referring to a great many other treaties that have been approved by the Senate. Every Senate has not been a recalcitrant Republican Senate that declines to approve. There are some Senates, and even some Republican Senates, that have approved treaties.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator himself voted against the approval of the treaty of peace.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I voted against its nullification, not against its approval.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator voted against it, did he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I voted against the nullification of the treaty by the Republicans of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator voted against its ratification, did he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. I voted against its nullification, as the Senator well knows.

The Senator asks for a specific statement, and I read for the third or fourth time:

He—

Meaning the Undersecretary of War—

shall, under said regulations, exercise such supervision and direction of the financial and business activities of the Department of War as may be necessary in order to standardize procurement and to assure adequate provision for the mobilization of matériel and industrial organizations essential to war-time needs.

If the Secretary is given power to mobilize matériel and to mobilize industrial organizations, he has considerable power under the terms of this bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They have to buy, do they not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, but when an officer of the Government has to buy what he needs to carry out the purposes of the Government, it does not mean that that officer ought to have power to mobilize the matériels and the industries, too.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What does the Senator understand by mobilizing the matériel?

Mr. McKELLAR. I imagine if it was boiled down the Senator and I would not disagree about it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not think we would. My reading of the bill is that it authorizes the Undersecretary of War to arrange contracts, to provide for purchases, to ascertain the facilities for munitions and other supplies necessary for the War Department, but that it does not in any way give him authority over any of the business interests of the country or any of the manufacturing interests of the country. The Senator himself is lawyer enough to know that that section does not provide for that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the compliment of being lawyer enough to know that, but I doubt if I am lawyer enough to know his construction is correct.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Possibly I am mistaken in paying the compliment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator passed too great a compliment. I now read:

In the performance of the duties herein assigned he (the Undersecretary of War) shall exercise such supervision of the several bureaus, corps, and services and shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions among them as may be prescribed by said regulations.

There can be no objection to the supervision proposed in this section. The exercise of such supervision is both necessary and desirable. The dangerous, unnecessary, and therefore objectionable feature is to be found in the 10 words "shall cause such distribution and redistribution of functions among them." It is seldom if ever that 10 short words express greater potentialities for evil than those 10 words do.

The enactment of any such legislation as this would permanently make it possible to do all that the Overman Act has temporarily made possible in the way of endless transferring and retransferring of "functions," which, of course, include powers and duties, throughout most of the bureaus of the War Department and the staff corps and departments of the Army.

The Senator knows that the departments and divisions have been transferred and retransferred, and some of the employees of the Government have been busier being transferred or retransferred under the provisions of the Overman Act since the war ended than they ever have been busy at work.

Surely no such power as that, fraught as it is with such possibilities of harm, should ever, in time of peace, be placed in the hands of any one man or of any group of men.

And there is not the slightest necessity for any such legislation as that in question. The broad powers of supervision and direction, which mean full control and which are proposed to be conferred upon the Undersecretary of War by the unobjectionable first part of section 27, are ample to secure good administration, coordination of action, economy, and efficiency throughout the organization subject to such supervision and direction. If experience under this system should demonstrate the necessity or even the desirability of transferring any functions, including powers and duties, from one bureau, corps, or department to another, the result of that experience could and should be communicated to Congress with the request for appropriate legislation; but no such transfer by arbitrary executive action should ever be made possible, at least in time of peace.

The last sentence of the first paragraph of section 27 should be stricken out entirely.

The last paragraph of section 27 is open to two serious objections. The first of these lies against the first sentence of the paragraph, by which it is proposed to empower the Secretary of War to appoint three assistants from civil life, who shall have salaries equivalent to the pay and allowances of a brigadier general of the Army, or, as an alternative, to obtain these assistants by detail from among commissioned officers of the Army.

The proposed civilian assistants are to be important, permanent, and highly paid officials of the War Department. No such officials should ever be appointed by any executive officer alone. They should only be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in just a moment. Let me be certain whether or not there has been an amendment to that effect, for I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this provision.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator state from what authority he is reading?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have stated a number of times that I am reading from an article which appeared in the Army and Navy Register, presumably written by an Army officer, though it does not say so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator know the author?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not. I have asked the name both by telephone and in person; I have tried to find out the name of the officer, because he certainly understands this bill, and having a respect for his views I undertook to get his name.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator means a respect for "the views," because if he does not know the name of the officer he can not have a respect for "his views."

Mr. McKELLAR. Not for his views, but for the views which he expresses.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will continue his search and ascertain the character and reputation of this officer who criticizes a bill of this character and yet withholds his name.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not withheld his name; I do not know his name. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will ascertain it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He withholds it if the Army and Navy Register refuses to give it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Army and Navy Register is one of the most reputable publications of the kind in the country. It is absolutely responsible when it publishes a statement; it is as responsible as an officer who could possibly sign the article. Surely the Senator will not doubt the reponsibility of a paper of this sort.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But I understood that they withheld the name of the author of this article.

Mr. McKELLAR. I never so understood; but I did not get the name.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Oh, the Senator has not asked for the authorship?

Mr. McKELLAR. I did ask them for the name of the author and I have stated that it was denied me. It may not be denied the Senator from New Jersey. I will read from the bill in connection with what I have just read.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I make an additional observation?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think when an Army officer openly criticizes a bill of this character he ought to sign his name to the criticism.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quoting the Army and Navy Register just as I would have quoted the article if it had not been written by an officer. I now read from the bill:

Provided, That the offices of the Assistant Secretary of War, Second Assistant Secretary of War, and Third Assistant Secretary of War, as provided for in existing law, are hereby abolished.

Then, later on, other assistants are provided for.

There is another brief portion of this article which I desire to read and put into the RECORD:

The proposed civilian assistants are to be important, permanent, and highly paid officials of the War Department. No such officials should ever be appointed by any executive officer alone. They should only be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I think it would be better if all officers of this kind, and, indeed, practically all officers of the Government, were appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I do not believe the Executive should exercise the duty and the right of appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate. It is a valuable restriction that ought to be upheld by the Senate, and we ought not to be legislating to the contrary.

No Army officers should ever be detailed to fill any of these three offices. The office of the Secretary of War, which of course includes the office establishments of all of his assistants, is a purely civilian establishment, and it should be kept so. It should remain beyond the reach of Army influence, jealousies, and intrigues. It can not remain so if Army officers hold high and influential positions in it and are thus in position to do substantial favors for their military friends and equally substantial disfavors for their enemies. Whether they should actually do these things or not, and being human they would certainly do them if they could, they would be suspected throughout the Army of doing them and would be subject to constant importunities to do them, all this to the manifest injury of the military service.

Moreover, these three offices, if created, would be civil offices, and section 1222, Revised Statutes, provides that every officer of the Army on the active list "who accepts or exercises the functions of a civil office shall thereby cease to be an officer of the Army, and his commission shall be thereby vacated."

The second objection lies against the last sentence of section 27. This section proposes to require the detail of an indefinite number of officers and civilian employees from "bureaus and services" to the office of the Undersecretary of War. This proposal reveals plainly the scheme behind the apparently innocent provisions of this section.

I wish to read that provision. Listen to this:

There shall be detailed to the office of the Undersecretary of War from the corps and services engaged in procurement such number of officers and civilian employees as may be authorized by regulations approved by the Secretary of War.

That provides another means of building up the great machine that has to do with the industries and the matériel of the country; it ought not to be countenanced.

Mr. President, these are the objections which I have to the establishment of the office of Undersecretary of War and to the war council. These provisions of the bill ought to be stricken out; they are un-American; they are subversive of our uniform policy in the past. They propose to give war powers not to the President of the United States in time of war, but to an Undersecretary in time of peace. Such powers ought not to be granted, and I hope the Senate when it votes on the question will strike the provision out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary proceeded to read section 27.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent, as that section has been read two or three times, that the Secretary be not required to read it again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in section 28, page 29, line 5, after the words "Undersecretary of War," to insert the words "the General of the Army."

Mr. McKELLAR. With the same understanding had as to other amendments, I shall not now object to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not quite understand the understanding referred to by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the rule, there is some doubt about whether we would have the right to amend that section further if the committee amendment is agreed to without objection, and the section as amended is adopted. As I understand, the Senator is willing that——

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no rule that prohibits the Senate from amending this section further in the event this little amendment is adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not an expert on the rules, but the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made a statement a while ago that raised a doubt in my mind, and he is well informed as to the rules.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Senator from Wisconsin suggested the difficulty of amending an amendment which had been adopted.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly the point that is raised here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Tennessee contemplate amending this amendment? The amendment merely inserts "the General of the Army." If that can be amended so as to make it mean anything different, I should be glad to know how it can be done.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is intended by "the General of the Army"? There is but one General of the Army now, but there may be other generals. I think bills have been introduced to make other officers generals of the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator had better read this bill. This bill provides that the permanent personnal of the Army of the United States shall consist of "the General of the Army during the tenure of office of the present incumbent," and so forth. That means, in other words, Gen. John J. Pershing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to Gen. Pershing being made part of the war council, if it is agreeable to him.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 30, line 3, after the words "said detail" to strike out "The" and insert "the," so as to read:

Provided further, That the Bureau of Insular Affairs as provided for in existing law is hereby abolished and the duties heretofore performed in said Bureau of Insular Affairs are hereby transferred to the office of the Undersecretary of War established under provisions of this act. Until the expiration of his detail as such, the present incumbent of the office of the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs shall retain the rank heretofore prescribed by law and upon the expiration of said detail, the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint said officer to be an officer of the grade that he would have held and to occupy the relative position that he would have occupied if he had not been appointed as Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Assistant Secretary read to line 15 on page 32, the last section read being as follows:

SEC. 31. The Judge Advocate General's Service.—The Judge Advocate General's Department established under existing law and regulations shall hereafter be designated the "Judge Advocate General's Service." Such duty or duties as are now required by law to be performed by any officer or officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department, except when otherwise provided for in this act, shall hereafter be performed by such officer or officers of the Judge Advocate General's Service as the Secretary of War may designate for the purpose. The permanent personnel of the Judge Advocate General's Service shall consist of 1 Judge Advocate General, with the rank of major general, and 80 officers, in grades from major to colonel, inclusive, and 100 enlisted men, in their appropriate grades, all of whom shall be detailed or assigned from the permanent personnel as provided for in this act. The reserve personnel shall consist of all reserve officers and reservists assigned to the Judge Advocate General's Service as provided for in this act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as many Senators I am sure understand, an amendment is necessary to the Judge Advocate General's Service section. The amendment in which members of the committee have been interested is not yet completed; so I desire to give notice that at a later time during the discussion of this bill, possibly to-morrow or next day, an amendment will be offered to the Judge Advocate General's Service section, No. 31.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, would the chairman of the committee object to stating along what line he will propose the amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will do so in a word.

The Judge Advocate General's Service of the Regular Army finds itself in a very peculiar position in connection with the general features of this bill. The Senator from Ohio will recollect that this bill puts all the officers of the Army, with the exception of Medical Service officers and chaplains, upon a single list for promotion, using as a principle, wherever it can be used without doing undue violence to present conditions, that the officers shall be placed upon the list in accordance with their length of service, or as nearly so as practicable. That has a peculiar result in the Judge Advocate General's Department. It will result in somersaulting three or four officers over the heads of their present seniors, and in such a way as to disorganize the department to a considerable degree. The Judge Advocate General's Department is peculiar in this respect, that its personnel has been a permanent personnel since 1903. Most of the officers who have served there have served for a considerable length of time, and have had their promotion from time to time under the old system. Then, in addition to that, the Judge Advocate General's Department has an exceedingly heavy burden of work at this time in settling the great legal questions which confront the Army, as it is absolutely necessary for that department to have a very high class of lawyers working with it and in it. The men of the regular service who are there are men of long experience, but they can not possibly do this work alone. In fact, probably half of the personnel will have to be brought in from civil life; and to get the kind of men they want, men who are well grounded in the law and of mature experience in the law, they must get men of comparatively middle age; and in order to get them, they must give them sufficient rank in order to tempt them to come from civil life. The result is that I think we shall have to give what might be termed special treatment to the Judge Advocate General's Service in that regard, for if we do not it will be impossible for the service to carry the tremendous burden that rests upon it to-day.

I may say to the Senator from Ohio that the Judge Advocate General's Department to-day does more legal work than the legal departments of 39 States, and I venture the assertion also that it does more legal work to-day than the Department of Justice of the United States Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I think this is a very important part of the Army. I think I realize to the full the necessity of having it properly organized, and above everything else the necessity of having the right kind of men in it, and there are some very able men in that department; but I was prompted to ask the question on that point because I was furnished some time ago with a copy of a proposed amendment in which it was provided that all of the staff should be chosen from the men in that department now. In other words, I was impressed with the fact that it was a sort of closed circle. I think it is very wise that a large number of these members of the staff shall be chosen from civilian life, particularly during a time of peace, and I want the very best that we can get. As I said before, there are some mighty good men in that department, but there are also some mighty cheap politicians in it, or were during the war; and if this staff is to be filled from that class of men, then I have a protest against them. I do not care to go into details now, but I can if it is necessary to go into them. I will join hands with the distinguished chairman and other members of the committee to put this department on a high plane and keep it absolutely out of politics; but it has not been done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 35, line 13, after the word "service," to insert:

Provided, That not more than 5 per cent of the officers of the Medical Corps herein authorized shall have the rank of colonel, and not more than 8 per cent shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel.

So as to make the paragraph read:

The Medical Corps shall consist of commissioned officers in grades from first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, the total number of whom shall approximately be equal to, but not exceed, six and five-tenths for every one thousand of the total enlisted strength of the permanent personnel authorized from time to time by law. Hereafter, commissioned officers of the Medical Corps shall be promoted, if in class A, as provided for in section 44 of this act, to the grade of captain upon the completion of 3 years' service, to the grade of major upon the completion of 14 years' service, to the grade of lieutenant colonel upon the completion of 20 years' service, and to the grade of colonel upon the completion of 26 years' service: Provided, That not more than 5 per cent of the officers of the Medical Corps herein authorized shall have the rank of colonel, and not more than 8 per cent shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a reexamination and reconsideration of that amendment prompts me to say that I believe it is an unwise one. I shall therefore ask the Senate to reject it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARREN in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall make the same request when the amendment on page 36 is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 21, after the word "total," to strike out "enlisted," so as to read:

The Dental Corps shall consist of commissioned officers in the grades from first lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, the total number of whom shall approximately be equal to, but not exceed, one for every 1,000 of the total strength of the permanent personnel authorized from time to time by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 5, after the word "service," to insert:

Provided, That not more than 2½ per cent of the officers of the Dental Corps herein authorized shall have the rank of colonel and not more than 5 per cent shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel.

So as to make the paragraph read:

Hereafter commissioned officers of the Dental Corps shall be promoted, if in class A as provided for in section 44 of this act, to the grade of captain upon the completion of three years' service, to the grade of major upon the completion of 14 years' service, to the grade of lieutenant colonel upon the completion of 20 years' service, and to the grade of colonel upon the completion of 26 years' service: Provided, That not more than 2½ per cent of the officers of the Dental Corps herein authorized shall have the rank of colonel and not more than 5 per cent shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask to have that amendment rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 36, line 19, after the word "service," to insert:

Provided, That not more than 2½ per cent of the officers of the Veterinary Corps herein authorized shall have the rank of colonel, and not more than 5 per cent shall have the rank of lieutenant colonel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 20 on page 37.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on the bottom of page 37, line 25, will be found the words "five years." I suggest that the word "five" be stricken out and the word "three" inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 37, line 25, before the word "years," the last word in the line, it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "three," so as to read:

Officers of the medical administrative corps shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the noncommissioned officers of the Medical Service, of not more than 32 years of age, who shall have served not less than three years therein, including service in the Hospital Corps, the Veterinary Corps, or in the enlisted force of the Medical Department, and not less than three years as noncommissioned officers, and who shall have been found qualified by a board of not less than three officers of the Medical Service, upon such examination as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 39, line 4, after the word "appointment," to insert "to date from three months after the approval of this act and"; in line 6, after the word "colonel," to strike out "except in the Veterinary Corps"; in line 9, after the words "fifty years," to insert "who shall have been appointed within six months after the approval of this act and," so as to read:

Of the vacancies in the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, and Veterinary Corps created or caused by this act, such number as the President may direct shall be filled by appointment, to date from three months after the approval of this act and subject to such examination as may be prescribed, in the grades of captain, major, lieutenant colonel, and colonel, of persons other than officers of the permanent personnel under the age of 50 years who shall have been appointed within 6 months after the approval of this act and who shall have served as officers of the Medical, Dental, or Veterinary Corps in the United States Army, whether in the Regular Army, the National Guard while in the service of the United States, or in the National Army, or as reserve officers, between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 39, line 15, after the numerals "1918," to insert:

For purposes of future promotion, persons so appointed shall be considered as having had, on the day of appointment, sufficient prior service to bring them to their respective grades under the rules of promotion established in this section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the amendment found in the middle of page 39, which has just been read by the Secretary, should be taken out, and the same language inserted at the bottom of page 38, after the words "50 per cent," on line 24.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to transpose the committee amendment found on lines 15, 16, 17, and 18 of page 39, to the foot of page 38, after the words "50 per cent."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It should be preceded by the words "Provided further."

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So as to read:

Provided further, That for purposes—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so transposed. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 2, after the words "acting assistant surgeons," to insert the words "contract surgeons."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I desire to perfect that amendment by inserting between the words "contract" and "surgeons" the word "dental," so that it will read "contract dental surgeons."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend the committee amendment on page 41, line 2, so that between the words "contract" and "surgeons" there shall be inserted the word "dental," so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That officers of the Medical Corps and Dental Corps shall be credited with their service as contract surgeons, acting assistant surgeons, contract dental surgeons, or as acting dental surgeons, and to officers of the Veterinary Corps shall be credited their governmental veterinary service rendered prior to June 3, 1916.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 8, to strike out "relative" and in lieu to insert "assimilated"; on line 9 to strike out "relative" and insert "assimilated"; on line 11 to strike out "relative" and insert "assimilated"; on line 12 to strike out "relative" and insert "assimilated"; on line 13, before the word "nurses," to insert "head nurses"; on the same line to strike out "relative" and insert "assimilated"; in line 18, before the word "officers," to strike out "medical" and insert "commissioned"; and in the same line to strike out the word "Army" and to insert the words "Medical Service," so as to read:

The Army Nurse Corps shall consist of the personnel as provided for in existing law. Hereafter the members of the Army Nurse Corps shall have assimilated rank as follows: The superintendent shall have the assimilated rank of major; the assistant superintendents, director, and assistant directors, the assimilated rank of captain; chief nurses, the assimilated rank of first lieutenant; and head nurses, nurses, the assimilated rank of second lieutenant; and as regards medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties shall have and shall be regarded as having authority in and about military hospitals next after the commissioned officers of the Medical Service, and shall wear the insignia indicative of their relative rank in the Army as may be prescribed by regulations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to amend, on line 19, by striking out the word "relative" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "assimilated."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish the chairman of the committee would define for me the term "assimilated rank."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a military term which, our committee is reliably informed, is more accurate and correct than the term "relative rank." It means really the same thing, but it is the term used in military parlance.

Mr. POMERENE. It is evident that it is used; but what does it mean?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A person holding assimilated rank is one who exercises limited authority of that rank under certain conditions but does not enjoy the full privileges of the rank. This applies to the Army Nurse Corps. If an Army nurse is given what is known as assimilated rank, she may issue orders to the enlisted personnel under her charge in the ward of a hospital. As her rank is merely an assimilated rank, she does not enjoy all the pay and allowances of the rank. Her pay is fixed by the existing provisions of law.

Mr. POMERENE. I have had a number of letters from some people who are interested in this branch of the service, and they and their friends have felt that they have been discriminated against because they were denied rank, just as dentists were formerly denied rank. I confess I have had a good deal of sympathy with the aspirations of the friends of these nurses and have felt that they were entitled to rank—what rank I do not know. I confess that thus far I would be unable to explain to them what privileges were given to them when I say to them that they will have conferred upon them assimilated rank.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is exactly what they asked for.

Mr. POMERENE. If that is what they want, I am satisfied with it, even if I do not understand it.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator having the bill in charge how long he proposes to have the Senate remain in session?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Only until the section under the subhead "The Ordnance Service" is reached.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6, on page 42, the end of the sections under the subhead "The Medical Service."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 7, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 6, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With profound faith in Thee, our Father in heaven, and in the overruling of Thy providence to the good of all mankind; with a deep and abiding faith in the Constitution of the United States of America, its genius and perpetuity; with confidence in the patriotic loyalty of the vast majority of the American citizens; inspire these, their chosen Representatives, with high resolves, pure ideals, that their enactments may be to the good of the people; that they may thsu render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto God the things that are God's. In the spirit of the world's Great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12610, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he will bring back to the House for a vote Senate amendment No. 53, for the transfer of the Bureau of Efficiency from the executive branch of the Government to the legislative branch of the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection to doing that.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman agrees to that, I have no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Can the gentleman state to us just how many million dollars have been added to this bill by the Senate?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a little less than $2,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not approximately about $57,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman figured it all up?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman figured up the $240 bonus for 200,000 employees?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I did not figure that, because it was carried in the bill as reported to this House. The amount added to the bill proper, as it was reported to the House, amounts to a little less than $2,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Taking the bonus into consideration, it will run up to about $50,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Whatever the calculation shows.

Mr. MADDEN. That was in the bill as it was reported to the House, anyway.

Mr. BLANTON. And outside of that amount how much does the gentleman say has been added to the bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say that outside of the bonus, which was originally reported in the bill, and which went out on a point of order in the House, the amount added by the Senate is approximately $2,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Following the splendid example and the suggestion that has been made by the majority leader of the House in respect to economy, may we depend upon the conferees to eliminate most of that $2,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We did our best to economize on the amount of the bill as carried in the House, and we will do our best to keep it down in the conference.

Mr. BLANTON. May we depend upon the conferees to hold the amount down to approximately $50,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman refers to the bonus?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. There will be no doubling of that proposition.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. DYER. There could not be any doubling of that amount. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DYER. What has been done, if anything, with reference to the Subtreasuries?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The Subtreasuries, by an amendment placed on the bill in the Senate, were put back into the bill. That is, the language abolishing them was stricken out.

Mr. DYER. Is the gentleman able to tell us what the conferees of the House will do in respect to that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. I can tell the gentleman what I will do with reference to it, but I can not speak for the other conferees.

Mr. DYER. In my opinion, the Subtreasuries should be eliminated. We have been trying to eliminate them for years. I would not be in favor of agreeing to the gentleman's request unless we are going to have an opportunity in the House to vote against the Subtreasuries.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will agree with the gentleman that unless the Senate recedes from the position they have taken, the House will have that opportunity.

Mr. DYER. With that assurance, I have no objection to the gentleman's request. I have a Subtreasury in my district, but I think the Subtreasuries are absolutely needless and useless, and that they should be eliminated.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Can the gentleman give us some idea of whether we will have a chance to have something to say about the additional $50,000 for the conciliation division in the Department of Labor?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have not given that matter any thought.

Mr. NOLAN. I have no desire to obstruct and will not make any point about it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, one of the items placed in the bill by the Senate is an item of a million and a half, as I recollect the amount, for additional temporary clerks in the War Department. I feel confident that the House provided for all of the temporary clerks in the War Department that are necessary. This seems to be another effort on the part of one of the Government departments to retain indefinitely a very large force of clerks, which may at one time have been necessary, but which, as a matter of fact, are not necessary now. A very considerable number of them ought to have been discharged long ago and allowed to go home, where they are probably needed very much more than they are needed here. I feel confident that as to that item the conferees on the part of the House will insist upon the view of the House in respect to it. The War Department and the other departments of the Government have been more than liberally provided for in the matter of employees, and I think that the time has come when we must insist and shall insist that unnecessary clerks shall no longer be retained on the public pay roll. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is just one more proposition that I desire to state. There is no Member of this House, there is not a person anywhere who is at all informed with regard to the matter, who has not known all the time that the bonus now being paid to the employees of the Government would continue to be paid the coming fiscal year. Everyone understood that while the item went out on a point of order in the House it would be restored in the Senate and would be agreed to in the House eventually; and yet, while that is a fact, some people here in the city at the head of certain organizations of employees have taken it upon themselves to send broadcast over the country into the districts of Members of this House most erroneous and misleading statements with regard to the matter.

A great many good people have been led to believe that the House of Representatives deliberately set out to reduce the pay of these employees by $240 a year. A lot of clerks have been unnecessarily worried and disturbed about the matter by statements that have been made. Everybody who has taken the trouble to be informed in the matter knows that there has been no question at any time about the bonus, and yet word has been sent broadcast over the country, labor unions all over the country have been appealed to against Members of the House because of some alleged connection with an alleged attempt on the part of the House to deny these employees the bonus. I hope that we have seen about the last of this wholesale misrepresentation of the attitude of Members of Congress. I do not believe the employees of the Government desired to have those who have charge of their affairs in their unions misrepresent the attitude of Members. I believe they knew they were going to get the bonus and were perfectly content, but certain gentlmen, whose pay seems to depend upon keeping up a continual rumpus over this matter, have seen fit to misstate all over the country the attitude of Members.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of this $240 bonus to civilian employees as being "their bonus" as a matter of right. I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming whether he considers this $240 gratuity which, during the war, was allowed to the 240,000 Government employees is any more their property as a matter of right than the bonus now being demanded of Congress by service men who faced no man's land in France is a matter of right?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not think I have stated that the so-called bonus was a right. The thought I intended to convey was that the sentiment in the House was unanimous, so far as I knew, in favor of retaining the present bonus for the coming fiscal year. The fact is the term "bonus" is not a happy or accurate one. What we have done is to agree that until we can determine what is a fair salary for Federal employees, we are giving them $240 per annum above their prewar pay.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. POU. If that is true, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming why the Committee on Rules were not instructed to bring in a rule making the $240 in order? It could not have been a very difficult matter and would have given the House a chance to vote.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rules and he knows perfectly well that the point of order was made very late in the day, and that it would have been difficult to have secured a meeting of the Committee on Rules at that time. It was practically the last section of the bill, and in any event it was entirely unnecessary to bring in a rule because everyone knew that the bonus would be placed in the bill eventually, and it would have been a foolish and unnecessary thing to have brought in a rule under those circumstances. The matter of the bonus had been established as the increase of pay for the present.

Mr. POU. Well——

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman knows the same thing happened when the Democrats were in control of the House, that the bonus went out on the point of order and notwithstanding that they brought in a rule to protect it.

Mr. MONDELL. At the time when the matter of the establishment of the bonus had not become fixed as a policy of the Congress they brought in a rule, as I recall it, that provided for a $240 bonus and did not allow any raise by amendment.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman knows that it only provided for $120 bonus at that time, and in the last bill we increased it to $240. The gentleman also knows that it was common rumor around this House for a week that the point of order was going to be raised against this, and the steering committee on this side of the House had an excellent opportunity to take it up with the Committee on Rules and have a rule brought in to protect the matter.

Mr. MONDELL. Everybody knew that nothing of the kind was necessary, as the bonus is for the present agreed to by everyone; furthermore, I am sure the gentleman from California would not have wanted a rule that would have prevented any amendment.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, Mr. WASON, and Mr. SISSON.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to rerefer the bill H. R. 263 from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to rerefer from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on the Judiciary the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 263) to further protect interstate commerce against bribery and other corrupt trade practices.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why he wants this rereference made?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That would be a matter for the committee to determine. We have been urged by the Federal Trade Commission to take up the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands this is done with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. And also with the consent of Mr. SIMS, author of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the gentleman taking it away from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or giving it to it?

The SPEAKER. Taking it from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and giving it to the Judiciary Committee, with the consent of Mr. SIMS and Mr. ESCH.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does it furnish any penalties?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is a criminal statute.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say, does the bill establish any penalties for violation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; it is a criminal statute and properly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long has it been with the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It was introduced on May 19, 1919.

Mr. GARD. And is just being transferred to the Committee on the Judiciary after nearly a year. Has the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made any report on it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It has not.

Mr. GARD. Has it taken it up for consideration?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Not that I know of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13416, the pension appropriation bill, and, pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS] if we can arrange upon a time for general debate?

Mr. MCANDREWS. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. How much time?

Mr. MCANDREWS. I think we can get through with about two hours on this side.

Mr. CANNON. About two hours. Then I will ask unanimous consent that general debate close in not later than four hours; but I hope we will get through with less general debate than that.

I have not had many applications for recognition upon this side. I ask that the time be divided equally between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the general debate be limited to four hours, two hours to be controlled by himself and two hours by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill H. R. 13416, the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, it is a very short bill, and if there is no objection I would like to hear it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri objects. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, namely:

Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, $214,000,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, pensions, for services rendered within the fiscal year 1921, $20,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is recognized for two hours.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before I begin what I rose to say I wish to call the attention of the committee to the interesting report that has been submitted by my colleague, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], whose bill is now before us. It is the most interesting report I have read in connection with any bill presented to the House, but it is just exactly what we might expect from the man who is chairman of this committee. With his long years of experience he has been able to give us information which would take us years of study to obtain. And I congratulate him and the country on the lucidity of statement which appears in this report.

The country is fortunate in having a man of the experience of my colleague still willing to serve as a Member of the House. His experience as chairman of the Appropriations Committee and his experience in all the other activities of the Government have given him a fund of information possessed by no other man in the public service. [Applause.] And that information is displayed here in such form as to be of great value not only to the Members of the House for future reference but to the people of the country generally. I thank him for the form of the report, the information it contains, the clearness with which it is presented, and I am sure every Member of the House will feel as I do that this will be classed as a document containing information which they will be glad to have on many future occasions. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the Clerk to read in my time a letter which I received yesterday afternoon from the Bureau for Returning Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, organized at Chicago, and I beg to say in this connection that the organization is composed of ex-service men, and the purpose of the organization is to care for the men who have returned from the other side who need care and protection, and to help them in every way within their power.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU FOR RETURNING
SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES,
Chicago, Ill., April 1, 1920.

Representative MARTIN B. MADDEN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The matter that I am writing about is being taken up officially through the American Legion. The reason for this personal letter is because immediate action is necessary.

I have been with the above Bureau since its opening in an executive position. I have personally interviewed 15,000 returned service men, therefore having grounds for my statements.

During this time I have come across hundreds of cases where men had been discharged from Government hospitals as "cured," but were unable to work, and in most cases complained that they were still ill and unable to work. These reports were investigated at different times, but it appears that the investigations were made simply by walking through the hospitals and finding clean rooms and a disciplined force, and everybody seemed contented, no patient was personally approached, but still the complaints of the men kept coming in.

Men who were homeless, penniless, and in some cases cripples, were turned out of these hospitals to shift for themselves.

Then an example was brought right home to me. My brother, Hyman Margolis, who fought across the seas with the One hundred and thirty-second Infantry, was compelled to go to one United States public-service hospital No. 2, Forty-seventh and Drexel Streets, Chicago, for an operation on his feet caused by the mud and water of the trenches, an injured ear, and suggestion on their part to remove his tonsils. He entered the hospital about the first of the year. About seven weeks later he had his first medical treatment, consisting of an operation removing a bone from each foot. Since he was operated on he had but few visits from a doctor, and each case they simply glanced at his feet. Thus he was compelled to bathe and bandage his own feet. On March 30 he was told he was "cured," and that he must now go home. Dumfounded, he tried to show them that his feet were in no condition to have shoes on them, and that his left toe seemed "paralyzed." They told him that he was wrong and that he had to get out of the hospital the next day. They don't even furnish an ambulance. They offered him a discharge, stating that he was improved, but he refused it, as he knew that he was worse off than when he came in the hospital. They told him that if he wouldn't go out they would call the police. At that stage he called me over the phone and told me the case, and that there were many cases even more serious than his that were to be put out.

He asked me to interview Col. Charles Banks, who he said was the general supervisor of all the hospitals in this district. I interviewed Col. Banks at the Garland Building, Chicago, who I found to be very courteous, but confessed that he was powerless to help men, and that he had several cases like the one I brought before him, but he couldn't do anything for them as Col. Cobb, who has charge of the United States Public Service Hospital No. 2, refused to take orders from him. He has informed the Surgeon General of conditions, but up to time of writing no action was taken.

To-day I personally investigated conditions at the Forty-seventh and Drexel Street Hospital. Col. C. O. Cobb was very discourteous and wouldn't speak to me. The rest of the staff follows Col. Cobb, and it was useless to talk to them. Being visitor's day, I found it possible to talk to several men. Every one was afraid to speak, as the discipline there is "Prussian"; yet I managed to get the following cases for your attention:

1. Frank Iraia, left hand crippled; shot through wrist bones; shattered; bone taken out of leg. Has no home and penniless, unable to work and told he must get out of hospital April 5, and stay out for a few months, then come back for another operation.

2. Joseph Romano, operated on; serious operation two weeks ago; wounds not healed, and discharged as cured. Home in Joliet, Ill.

3. William E. Schmidt; bad case of "rheumatism"; compelled to get out of bed to secure his food; should be in bed, as he can't walk; has to be practically carried downstairs by other patients.

4. Arthur Shoven, operated on both feet; complained that inexperienced men bandaged his feet and that bandages always came off; the cut where he was operated seems to be getting infected, and he is afraid that he may lose his limb, and no attention has been given him by a real doctor.

5. Flory Flowers, in hospital three months, has had no medical treatment whatsoever; is afraid he is growing blind.

6. Hyman Margolis, forcibly discharged to-day from hospital; operated on both feet, unable to put shoes on feet, cuts not yet healed, left toe unable to control owing to operation; nothing done to ear or tonsils, but turned out of hospital; no back pay or compensation received; in hospital over three months.

7. Joe Vaccaro, no treatment for his back since February 24. A Mrs. Eva Benkinga, 6836 Peoria Street, Chicago, who is constantly in the hospital trying to cheer the boys up, says that conditions are terrible and that Col. Cobb and his staff are not treating the boys right. She mentioned one case, a patient by the name of Howard Decker, was forcibly discharged February 22 with a trench mouth, shell-shocked, bad stomach, etc. He had no home and was penniless, unable to work. She took up the case with Col. Cobb, who refused to talk on the subject. Mrs. Benkinga said she would take it up with Congress. Col. Cobb answered, "All the Congressmen in the country couldn't faze him or his staff."

The following men have been mentioned by several patients as not the proper men for hospital work, both from inefficiency and misconduct to men:

Col. C. O. Cobb, Dr. Bell, Dr. Hetenck, Dr. Jacobson, Dr. Byrne, Dr. Hoffnagel, Dr. Steinfelt.

If Col. Banks, Garland Building, is not afraid to talk, he could serve very serious official charges. A suicide occurred in this hospital a few weeks ago; rumors are that he committed suicide, as during the week he was in the hospital he got no treatment and was in terrible pain.

Mr. MADDEN, you have a duty to perform to your people. Investigate the United States Public Service Hospital in Chicago and give the men who gave all a right to be properly cured so they can be healthy again and fit to work, also see that the men get immediate attention or compensation and back pay. There are cases in this hospital where men haven't received a cent pay for eight months.

I want to hear from you personally, as all the posts of the American Legion are interested in this investigation.

Yours, very truly, H. J. MARGOLIS, 352½ Medill Avenue.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not happen to have a personal acquaintance with the gentleman who wrote this letter, but I know the organization to which he belongs, and I am sure that it is organized for the purpose of doing justice to the men who served their country in its hour of direst need. If any such conditions obtain as are described in this letter it is a crime, and the men who are responsible for the conditions, if they are Army officers, should be court-martialed. [Applause.] The matter should be thoroughly investigated. I take this means of presenting the case to the Public Health Service, because I believe it will have much more influence on them than the mere presentation of the case through a communication or personally, for I am perfectly satisfied that no attention whatever would be paid to any personal appeal that I made or to any communication that I might send, in view of the fact that no attention whatever has been paid to the appeals of the men themselves and their representatives. It seems to me that if such conditions as this can exist, if the Government through its agencies has no more interest in the well-being and the welfare of these men who have been wounded in the country's service, there ought to be some change either in the personnel of the men who are in control or in the service itself.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman know whether or not this is a——

Mr. MADDEN. It is a public-service hospital under the direction of the Public Health Service.

Mr. McKEOWN. These men have already been discharged from the Army, have they?

Mr. MADDEN. I know nothing at all about the facts except as they appear in this letter.

Mr. McKEOWN. What I wanted to find out was whether or not these men were still under the control of the Army or whether they were going to follow Canada's suggestion and get these men out of the Army hospitals and get them under control of the civil authorities.

Mr. MADDEN. The only information I have is contained in this letter. It speaks for itself. The statement made in the letter is appalling, and I am sure the American people will not submit to this sort of treatment for the men who served the country during the war. These men who were wounded are entitled to be considered the wards of the Nation and entitled to every care and consideration which it is possible for the Government to give them.

They should be made to understand that the Government and its agents in every department are charged with the responsibility of seeing that they are properly cared for, and they should be made also to feel that during the rest of their lives, while they are unable to work, that they need not fear want, and particularly should they be given to understand that while they are suffering from wounds they received while in the service they will have not only the best medical attention but the best of attention of every kind that the Government can give.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. These boys are certainly still in the military service, because they complain they have not received any pay for some five or eight months, according to the reading of that letter, and they ask you to see that they get their pay.

I take it from that that they are still in the military service.

Mr. MADDEN. The pay they are calling to my attention as not having received may be the allotments or allowances on account of their wounds through the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, as I caught the reading of the letter one of the complaints was that the authorities endeavored to force the man to accept a discharge in order to get rid of him.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I observe that if a man is discharged before he is cured it will militate against his receiving the proper compensation in after years, provided he has incurred a permanent injury?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This bears on a very important matter that is now under consideration before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to furnish hospital facilities for discharged soldiers. It is quite important that we should know, it occurs to me, and I wanted to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the record does show that these soldiers are under the charge of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. If they are, it bears directly on the question of furnishing hospital facilities to the extent of $85,000,000, according to the requests from the Public Health Service.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether these men are under the direct charge of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance or not, but I assume that they are, because I assume that the men have made application for allowances on account of their wounds. Now, if they have not for eight months received any compensation under the allowance, the War Risk Insurance Bureau ought to be called to account. On the other hand, if they are still in the service and have received no compensation for eight months from the War Department on account of their service in the Army, then somebody else ought to be called to account. And if, again, they have not received the sort of medical care to which they are entitled on account of their wounds received in the service, then those who are in charge of the Public Health Service should be called to account. Every man in every department of the public service who is charged with responsibility in the treatment of these men should be called to account, and if they have failed in any particular to give the men the kind of treatment they are entitled to as the heroes of the Nation during the Great War, if they are in the military service they should be at once court-martialed and placed behind the bars. [Applause.]

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. LAYTON. They can not be lacking in medical attention, can they, when there are 2,300 physicians on the rolls of the Public Health Service, costing the country nearly $5,000,000? What are those men doing?

Mr. MADDEN. We are finding difficulty in ascertaining what they are doing. But it must be apparent to everybody, from the statement just read by the Clerk, that they are not giving attention to the men who are wounded and are almost dead for want of care. It is a disgrace to the public service to have a letter of this sort sent in connection with the failure to care for the men who gave themselves to their country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This particular colonel, if I remember the letter aright, made the assertion that all the Congressmen in that county could not faze him or reach him. Does the gentleman from Illinois expect his loud voice to reach this colonel in Chicago, or is he going to pursue other methods to reach him?

Mr. MADDEN. After I get through making this public statement of the case I propose to take up the matter with the Secretary of War. I propose, if necessary, to take the matter up with the President. I propose, if it is necessary then, to take it up with the Surgeon General's office, and if I can get no satisfaction in any other way, I propose to prefer charges against these men and have a military court try them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS] that I would like to make a short presentation of the details of this bill, and then I will yield to the gentleman time to dispose of as he desires.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to read for probably 10 or 15 minutes from manuscript, which I have prepared with some care. My eyes are getting old, although my legs are pretty good. [Applause.]

This bill carries appropriations amounting to $214,020,000, but legislation which has already passed this House, if concurred in by the Senate and approved by the President, will increase the appropriations by $77,500,000, according to the estimates of the Pension Office, making a total of $291,520,000, or the largest pension appropriation ever authorized by Congress. The appropriations for the fiscal year 1920 amounted to $215,000,000, and for the year 1919, $223,000,000. No previous appropriation bill for the payment of pensions exceeded $200,000,000. If we add the appropriations for the care of former soldiers in the soldiers' homes, which is estimated at $6,274,000, the appropriations for the care of the survivors of all wars down to that with Germany will amount to practically $298,000,000, or some $80,000,000 greater than for the current year.

But this great appropriation does not tell the whole story of the cost of caring for the men who have served the country in war. This Congress and many succeeding Congresses will have to appropriate for the care of the survivors of the war with Germany as well as for the care of the survivors of all former wars; and we may call these appropriations by other names, made under other titles, but they should all be considered together to understand the obligations on Congress under legislation already enacted with the machinery for their administration. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance estimates the amount necessary to pay compensation for death and disability for the next fiscal year practically $198,000,000; the Federal Board for Vocational Education estimates its expenditures for the next fiscal year at $125,000,000; and the Public Health Service has estimates of $10,000,000; the Public Health Service has estimates before another committee of the House for the building of hospitals for the survivors of the war amounting to about $90,000,000; and the estimates for the administration of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance amount to $11,000,000.

These estimates together amount to $434,000,000 as the appropriations that will be necessary to discharge the obligations of the Government to the survivors of the war with Germany; and add the appropriations carried in this bill when it comes back to the House with appropriations to meet the increases authorized by the Fuller and the Sells bills which have already passed the House, will make a total of $732,000,000 as the appropriations to be made to meet the expenditures for the care of the survivors of all our wars. This grand total can be better understood by comparing it with the total ordinary disbursements of the Government for the fiscal year 1916, which amounted to $724,492,999. It will be seen that this Congress is called upon to appropriate more money for the care of the survivors of all our wars than the entire ordinary disbursements of the Government in the year preceding the declaration of war with Germany.

I do not call attention to these estimates for the purpose of complaining or of magnifying the cost of war, but simply to give the House the probable appropriations that are called for under different estimates, and to meet obligations that have already been incurred under legislation that is already on the statute books. The appropriations to care for the survivors of all the previous wars, carried in the annual pension appropriation bill, will decrease as death thins the ranks of the veterans of the Civil War and the War with Mexico; but those for the care of the survivors of the war with Germany will increase, in my judgment. There are many young men who returned from France, and even from the home camps, their health impaired, and there are others who returned to civil life in apparent health and strength who may in the near or distant future become disabled from the experiences of war.

In 1866, one year after the close of the Civil War, there were 126,722 pensioners on the roll, receiving $15,450,549 in pensions.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state right there how many were on the roll at this late date?

Mr. CANNON. I will give it in a moment. And let it be remembered that there were 2,200,000 men and, counting reenlistments, in round numbers, 2,800,000 men in the Union Army during that war for the preservation of the Union. I repeat, in 1866, one year after the close of the Civil War, there were 126,722 pensioners on the roll, receiving $15,000,000 in pensions annually. Many of them were survivors of the War with Mexico and some of them were survivors of the War of 1812.

There was no service act prior to 1890, and it was not until in 1912, under the leadership of Gen. SHERWOOD, that the act was passed which covered all the honorably discharged soldiers in the Union Army and gave them a service pension. From 40 to 50 years after the close of that great struggle there were no pensions to soldiers except for disabilities contracted in the line of duty.

In 1890, before the service-pension act of that year went into effect, there were 537,944 pensioners on the roll; and in 1902, before the service-pension act, to grant pensions to the survivors of the Civil War, regardless of disability, there were more than a million pensioners on the roll. The pensions in all that time were for disability, and up to the act of 1890 for disability incurred in the service. But the roll increased nearly fourfold in the 25 years following the Civil War, and the appropriations increased in the same or greater ratio.

It is not improbable that the same will be true of this last war. The Surgeon General of the Army, in his report for 1919, shows that in the year 1918 there were 2,422,362 admissions to the hospitals for disease; 182,789 admissions for ordinary injuries, and 227,855 admissions for battle injuries. Here were nearly 3,000,000 admissions to the Army hospitals in the year 1918, and, while some were no doubt duplications or the same men admitted to the hospitals more than once, no one can estimate how many of these men with hospital records may be found totally or partially disabled and the cause traced to their war service. The Surgeon General reports that in that one year the Army lost 40,692,302 days from disease and 12,545,442 days from battle injuries; and that there was an average of 155,957 men in the hospitals for every day in the year. Disease as well as wounds left its mark on these men, and no one can now estimate how many of them will in the future be found suffering from disability which can be traced to the service. The law has been enacted and the machinery created to meet such developments, and Congress will have to appropriate the necessary money to meet the estimates when they come from the various bureaus of the Government which have charge of the machinery to care for the survivors of the war.

No party can escape this obligation if it would, and I do not believe any party would escape these obligations if it could. They are the pledges of the Government, approved by the people, to the men who went out to defend the Government, and there is no more sacred obligation any Government can have. The estimates I have given represent the money cost of meeting the obligation for the next fiscal year. I have no doubt the estimates for the future will be greater, and within 10 years Congress will have to appropriate a billion dollars a year to discharge this obligation to the survivors of all our wars. It is a big obligation but one that the Government has already accepted, the laws enacted, and the machinery created for its discharge. The estimates will come to Congress in accordance with the law and they will have to be considered and the appropriations made. I call attention to the situation that no Member may deceive himself by the division of these various appropriations into a number of bills under different titles and some of them from other commitees than that on appropriations. The only way to understand what will be the necessary appropriations for the care of the survivors of our wars is to group the estimates together, and that I have done that the House may have an estimate of this one great obligation to the men who served the country in war and their dependents and who are the wards of the Nation so long as they live whenever they become disabled from earning a living.

That has been the policy of the Government from the beginning, though the pensions for disability and for service were comparatively small before the Civil War, and much smaller then than now, and smaller even now for the survivors of that and former wars than for the survivors of the war with Germany. As the country has grown and prospered, we have shown a higher appreciation of the men who risked their lives for us all, and we have increased the pay of the soldiers, increased the pensions, and increased the other obligations of the Government to them.

These things are all written into the law and into the contract. We will not try to repudiate any part of the contract, and the best way to carry it out is to understand what it is and prepare to meet it from the revenues of the Government, and to see that this contract is not impaired by other contracts which will call for increasing the public debt and further depreciating the standard of value in purchasing power and thereby reducing the pensions we have written into the laws. We have had the complaint of the veterans of the Civil War that the cost of living during the last war reduced the purchasing power of their pensions and the House has responded with the Fuller bill, and we may create a condition which will bring the same complaint from the disabled survivors of the war with Germany and their dependents, with demands for increases in compensation, which is only another title for pensions. We have seen that the high cost of living is closely associated with the high cost of Government, and these obligations to the men who have or will suffer disability from service in the Army and Navy and their dependents are of such a character that Congress will keep them in spirit as well as in the letter of the law. [Applause.]

Will the gentleman from Illinois consume some time now?

Mr. McANDREWS. I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is no quorum here. I think my colleague ought to have a better audience.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ackerman	Bland, Ind.	Brinson	Burdick
Andrews, Md.	Bland, Mo.	Britten	Burke
Bacharach	Booher	Brooks, Ill.	Caraway
Bankhead	Bowers	Brumbaugh	Carew

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the pension appropriation bill, H. R. 13416, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 294 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, H. R. 13416, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, we, the House of Representatives, are to-day seeking to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany, an interesting but tragic procedure—interesting as showing how far the passions of a time may obscure the vision of men, tragic as a commentary upon what has been the slow assassination of the hope of the world.

The peace treaty, as submitted by the President, has been under consideration by the Senate for many weary months and has failed of ratification not only in its original but in any form.

It is now proposed by the Republican majority of House and Senate to negotiate a treaty and make peace, according to terms of their own devising, not in the method of the Constitution wherein two-thirds of the Senators present must concur, but by the method of invoking the legislative function of the House and Senate and passing a joint resolution, to the passage of which, if it be within our jurisdiction, a bare majority only is necessary.

I respectfully submit that such a course is without constitutional warrant.

I wish to examine the grounds for such action and to raise and somewhat discuss the question whether the House has any authority to join in such proceedings, and also to inquire by what authority the Senate may approve a treaty by majority vote, when by the express stipulations of the Constitution a two-thirds concurrence is required.

There are some rules of constitutional law so well settled that citation of authority is unnecessary and discussion is idle. I enumerate them simply that the premises for my deductions may appear.

It is conceded that every part of the Constitution is mandatory unless it clearly appear that a discretion is vested; that the very genius of our Government is the division of power between the several governmental departments; and that the power to do the same thing has never been given to different and unconnected governmental agencies, where by the language of the Constitution it was invested in one with full power of execution.

It is conceded further that the people of the United States are sovereign and that the Government and its departments are but the agencies by which the people execute their will. The charter and delegation of authority and the expression of sovereign will of the people is the Constitution and the Federal Government as a whole, and no department of it has a power the exercise of which is not delegated in express terms, or necessary and proper to the exercise of one so delegated or else implied as being one resident in the General Government as necessary for its existence.

It is also conceded, as a general rule, that the investure of power to deal with a given subject matter in one department excludes its exercise by another.

No one will deny that it was competent for the people to constitute one department of the Government their agent for one thing and another department for another. That this separation of power is the peculiar genius of our Government and one of the bedrock principles of the Constitution has been decided too often and commented upon too freely to be open to debate.

The question then, on the threshold of the discussion, is whether there is anything in the Constitution vesting the treaty-making power in the House of Representatives, either expressly or as necessary to the exercise of some power expressly granted, or necessary to execute some power elsewhere vested in the Government or some department or officer.

In looking to the Constitution for the enumeration of the powers of the Congress, including the House as part thereof, we find only two powers which could even in the remotest degree raise the question. Congress is given the power to declare war and to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers specifically granted to the Congress and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

It thus appears that nowhere is the power to make a treaty or to make peace specifically granted, and if it exists it must do so as being necessary to carry out the specific powers of Congress or some power vested by the Constitution in the Government or officer.

Is it such? The only specfic power having even the remotest relation to making peace or a treaty is the one to declare war. No one can possibly contend that the power to make a treaty of peace or the making of peace is in anywise necessary to the exercise of the power to declare war. It was competent to vest the power to make peace in some other department or agency of Government, and the fact that it is not resident in Congress could in nowise hamper the exercise of the power of declaring war. To argue that it is necessary as accompanying the power to declare war is to argue, assuming that the people had vested the power to make peace in some other agency, that Congress could not exercise the power which it had. This is absurd, and yet we have heard this very argument advanced since this resolution has been under discussion.

In the second place, can the power of the House to pass this resolution be sustained as a law necessary to the exercise of a power vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in some department or officer thereof?

By examining the Constitution it will be noted that the power given to Congress is to pass a "law necessary to the execution," and so forth, "of some power vested in the Government or some department or officer," and the inquiry naturally presents itself, first, whether the doing of what we seek to do is the exercising of the legislative function, the passing of a law, or whether it is the exercise of a power which in its nature is not legislative in character. Let it be noted that the undoubted rule is that in passing upon the question of the exercise of powers in respect to its authorization the unbroken rule is that mere forms will not suffice, that substance only is material, and constitutional limitations can not be eliminated by the use of the vehicle of form.

In the first place, the section we are discussing is found in that part of the Constitution wherein is enumerated the legislative powers of the Congress, and, in the second, it is immaterial that the effort to exercise the power takes a legislative form if it be in fact not the exercise of legislative power.

On the subject of the treaty-making power, permit the patron saint of our Republican friends to enlighten them and visit his condemnation on their course. Alexander Hamilton, Federalist, 75, says:

> The essence of the legislative authority is to enact laws or, in other words, to prescribe rules for the regulation of the society, while the execution of the laws and the employment of the common strength, either for this purpose or for the common defense, seems to comprise all the functions of the executive magistrate. The power of making treaties is plainly neither the one nor the other. It relates neither to the exercise of subsisting laws nor to the enaction of new ones and still less to the execution of the common strength. Its objects are contracts with foreign nations which have the force of law but derive it from the obligation of good faith. They are not rules prescribed by the sovereign to the subject, but agreements between sovereign and sovereign. The power in question therefore seems to form a distinct department and to belong properly neither to the legislative nor to the Executive.

In Foster v. Neilson (2 Pet., 253) it is said:

> A treaty is in its nature a contract, not a legislative act.

It would appear, then, that the treaty-making power is not to be classed as legislative in character, and it is not remarkable that the framers of the Constitution with their desire to separate the departments of Government should constitute a special agency for the exercise of it—the Executive, with the concurrence and advice of the Senate.

Is it then "necessary" to pass this resolution that the Government or some department or officer can exercise some power expressly conferred upon it or them? Is this law necessary as ancillary to some other power in Government or department or officer? It certainly can not be contended that it is, if the Government, department, or officer is somewhere else clothed with a power so complete in itself and so broad in its authorization as not to need such assistance.

It will be noted that under the language of the Constitution there must be a power expressly granted to some other agency of government and the law must be necessary to its exercise. The power under discussion is the power to make treaties, and we find it granted to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of those present concurring. It certainly can not be contended that any action by the House is necessary to enable this agency to act. The power is full, ample, and unmistakable. So I respectfully submit that nowhere is express power given or is there one by necessary implication.

Again, the treaty-making power is expressly granted to the President and Senate conjointly, and if constitutional provisions are mandatory the agency named was the sole one selected, and we can not take from or add to it. Each provision of the Constitution is supposed to declare the will of the people, and each is presumed to have been adopted with a reason sufficient to the people; the specification of one is the exclusion of the other. For good and valid reasons, confidence was reposed in the President and Senate, with its two-thirds requirement, and in their good judgment, knowledge, patriotism, and discretion. Had the people desired the House to join they would have said so.

Again let me edify my friends across the aisle, who so ardently urge this usurpation. Mr. Hamilton said, in Federalist, 75, discussing the treaty-making power:

Though this provision has been assailed on different grounds with no small degree of vehemence, I scruple not to declare my firm persuasion that it is one of the best digested and one of the most unexceptionable parts of the plan.

Again listen, you defenders of the Constitution:

Another source of objection is derived from the small number of persons by whom a treaty may be made. Of those who espouse this objection a part are of opinion that the House of Representatives ought to have been associated in the business.

And so forth.

Listen, my friends. He is talking to you, his children:

The remarks made in a former number will apply with conclusive force against the admission of the House of Representatives to a share in the formation of treaties. The fluctuating—

And may I say that when you pass this resolution you will begin to fluctuate—and taking its future increase into account, the multitudinous composition of that body forbids us to expect in it those qualities which are essential to the proper execution of such a trust.

Truly with prophetic vision he must have viewed you now.

Accurate and comprehensive knowledge of foreign politics; a steady and systematic adherence to the same views; a nice and uniform sensibility to national character; decision, secrecy, and dispatch are incompatible with the genius of a body so variable and so numerous. The very complication of the business, by introducing a necessity of the concurrence of so many different bodies, would of itself afford a solid objection. The greater frequency of the calls upon the House of Representatives and the greater length of time which it would often be necessary to keep them together when convened, to obtain their sanction in the progressive stages of a treaty would be a source of so great inconvenience and expense as alone ought to condemn the project.

Mr. Jay said, writing in the Federalist, No. 64:

They who wish to commit the power under consideration to popular assembly, composed of members constantly coming and going in quick succession, seem not to recollect that such a body must necessarily be inadequate to the attainment of those great objections which require to be steadily contemplated in all their relations and circumstances, and which can only be approached and achieved by measures in which not only talents but also exact information and often much time are necessary to concert and execute. It was wise, therefore, in convention to provide, not only that the power of making treaties should be committed to able and honest men, but also that they should continue in place a sufficient time to become perfectly acquainted with our national concerns, and to form and introduce a system for the management of them.

And so forth.

Gentlemen, having been calling loudly upon the name of Washington of late and urging that his position on certain matters was according to their contention, have preached the soundness of his advice. In 1796 the House of Representatives requested of Washington that he send them all papers and information, and so forth, in respect to which the Jay treaty with England, which caused such opposition and popular discontent, was ratified, and in response President Washington wrote the House, of date March 30, as follows:

Having been a member of the general convention and knowing the principles on which the Constitution was formed, I have ever entertained but one opinion on this subject; and from the first establishment of the Government to this moment my conduct has exemplified that opinion—that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

The letter is too long to quote in full, but anyone interested may find it in Richardson's Messages of the Presidents, volume 1, pages 194, 196.

It is also interesting to note that before the writing of the message the President took the opinion of his Cabinet and others prominent in the Government.

After the receipt of this message the House, on April 7, by a vote of 54 to 37, passed a resolution, in part, as follows:

Resolved, That it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, "That the President shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, etc.

I might well quote the positions of Presidents Grant and Polk, but I must not dwell too long on this phase of the question.

It will thus be noted that in the Constitutional Convention at the time of its framing and afterwards, both in the opinion of those who took part in the work and those who presented the constitutional merits of the draft to the people, the opinion was unvarying that the treaty-making power was vested exclusively in the Executive and Senate. For further confirmation as to the correctness of this position see—

Butler Treaty-Making Power, volume 1, chapter 10; Willoughby, on the Constitution; Story on the Constitution; Watson on Constitution; Devlin on Treaty-Making Power.

I have not thought that it would now be seriously contended otherwise had not the present effort been made to substitute for the discretion of the President and Senate, with its two-thirds concurrence, the bare majority judgment of the Senate and unwarranted action of the House.

I will assume, then, that it is conceded that the House has no treaty-making power, and it remains to inquire whether in the case at bar an effort is being made to exercise it as a matter of fact.

The resolution provides that the state of war with Germany is at an end, that all laws passed by Congress to endure during the period of the war are to end when Germany shall signify her acceptance of our offer of peace; that Germany must declare within 45 days that she has terminated her war with the United States; that she must waive and renounce all rights of her nationals to any rights or claims her citizens would have had against the Government or citizens of the United States that would have been obliterated had we joined in the treaty of peace of Versailles; that the United States does not waive any of its rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages that the United States has become entitled to under the armistice agreement of November 11, 1918, or which the United States acquired in the progress of the war, and Germany is required further to agree that all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed and made by the United States are ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

Some gentlemen have stated that this does not contain the subject matter of a treaty but is simply an ending of war.

If it were not humorous it would be tragic. Perhaps it is both.

A treaty is a compact made with a view to the public welfare by the superior power. Public treaties can only be made by the supreme power, by sovereigns who contract in the name of the State. See Holmes v. Jennings (39 U. S., 540), Edge v. Robertson (112 U. S., 580).

Would the above resolution if agreed to in terms by Germany be a compact? A compact is an agreement. Is it an agreement between sovereigns? There can be no dispute as to the sovereignty of the parties, and it will require a moment only, if any time at all, to perceive that it has all the characteristics of agreement.

Agreement means a meeting of minds to do or not to do certain things specified. This resolution requires that Germany agree to certain things; it provides that she will relinquish and waive all rights which she now has as a country at war; she is to agree that certain rights of certain of her citizens now existing shall be extinguished; she is to grant, confirm, and acknowledge certain rights in the United States to certain of her property. In short, she is to write into the resolution all the stipulations of the treaty of Versailles which could in any wise affect her or her citizens or the United States and their citizens in regard one to the other. She is to relinquish rights to property and bind herself to do and not to do many things.

Surely no sane man can or will deny that this resolution is the tender and offer of an agreement binding in honor, if accepted, on the parties, and containing that character of stipulations which have been entered into heretofore exclusively by treaty.

But I have heard it said that this is simply a legislative recognition of a fact that the war is over, and that this is valid even though Germany does not accept. The answers are apparent. Admitting for the present, for the sake of argument, that the mere declaration of a state of peace does not have to be done by treaty and is the exercise of a legislative and not a treaty power, it is impossible to separate this part of the resolution from the other. We surely could not presume that the Congress would pass the one without the other. The fact that we are declared to be at peace, even though Germany rejects the offer, does not help the situation, for the question is whether the House has the power to make the tender at all, and not what consequences would flow if it were accepted.

If the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should negotiate an agreement with Germany containing these identical terms, would anyone contend that it was not a treaty? If, then, it would be a treaty under these circumstances, it must be likewise when parading through the House under the guise of a resolution, for else we would have the treaty-making power resident in separate agencies, which we have seen can not be.

But it is being urged that Congress has the power to declare peace, since it has it to declare war, and while this is not strictly in issue, since we have seen that the resolution does more than this, yet it might be of some interest to consider this for a brief while.

Wheaton's International Law, fourth edition, says:

> By the forms of the Constitution the President has the exclusive power of making treaties of peace, which, when ratified, with advice and consent of the Senate, become the supreme law of the land and have effect of repealing the declaration of war—

And so forth. I have already endeavored to point out that no such specific power was granted, and none was necessary and proper to be exercised by the Congress in its legislative capacity, but there are a few other observations which I would like to bring to the consideration of gentlemen.

It is interesting to note that the framers of the Constitution did not intend to confer upon and did not understand that the House had any such authority.

When they reached the clause which authorized Congress "to make war" (original draft), Mr. Pinckney opposed the vesting of this power in the Legislature and urged various objections to it. He made remarks indicating a general understanding that the making of peace was a treaty function, vested in the Executive and the Senate, and urged that the power to declare war should be vested in the Senate, for he said:

> It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace. (Journal, 548.)

The question was squarely presented when Mr. Butler moved to give the Legislature the power to make peace, since it was to be given the power to declare war. This motion was voted down.

It will thus be seen that the question of whether or not the Legislature or Congress, and the House as part of it, should have the power to make peace, and the convention decided that it should not.

It would have been strange, indeed, that the Constitutional Convention, while giving to a given agency the power to initiate a state of war, had not given to some agency the power to make peace, unless it was that the convention thought that this very essential power was sufficiently included in one already conferred. The conclusion is unavoidable that they must have thought that it was comprehended in the power to negotiate treaties, the only one expressly mentioned in the Constitution which could include it.

From that time to this the unbroken practice and interpretation in practice has been to make peace with an existing sovereignty at war with us through treaty and by the constitutional agency, the President and the Senate.

Contemporary interpretation of the Constitution, practiced and acquiesced in for years, conclusively fixes its construction. (Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cran., 299; Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 309; Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264; West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How., 507; Lithographic Co. v. Sarony, 11 U. S., 53; Pollock v. Bridgeport Co., 114 U. S., 411.)

But it is said that Congress has the power to declare a state of peace, because if the Senate and President should ever, through willfulness or inability, continuously and continually fail to make a treaty, the state of war would be continuous, with all its limitations, inconveniences, and losses. It has been urged here, and doubtless will be, that the power exists because the President and Senate have not as yet succeeded in effecting a treaty, and the question is asked if we are to wait and how long?

This line of reasoning destroys all constitutional limitations and overturns the Constitution. In short, it is argued that because one agency of the Government has not performed its work to the satisfaction of another separate, coordinate, and independent agency, in nowise concerned, that this fact creates the power in the second to undertake the task exclusively committed to the first. By parity of reason, the Executive might take the position that, Congress having failed to pass necessary laws, he would promulgate them by Executive order, though legislative powers are committed exclusively to Congress. Likewise the judiciary might usurp both Executive and legislative functions, for if Congress can have created for it a power by the failure of the agency to whom committed to exercise it to the satisfaction of the Congress, then any other department of Government can exercise the same prerogative. There is nothing that makes the legislative department inherently superior to others, and if it can pass judgment on whether they are doing their work properly, and if, in opinion, they are not, derive power to deal with the subject itself, other departments may do the same. This would bring governmental chaos and is opposed by every theory of government under written constitution and every reason for the adoption of such a form.

It is further argued that Congress has the power to make peace, because it is conceivable that it is possible for our Government to wage war, to utterly destroy the opposing nation, and to incorporate its people and territory either as a State or as a Territory. It is argued, or may be, that in such cases making peace through the exercise of the treaty power would be impossible, for the reason that a treaty implies necessarily a contract which in turn requires at least two parties, and since the opposing Government no longer exists peace could not be made. From this it is argued that since peace can not be made or declared by the treaty power and must be declared by government in some way, the power to do so must be in some other than the treaty-making agency; that this is the Congress and hence Congress does have power to declare peace under some circumstances and hence can declare it now.

While it is exceedingly difficult to conceive of the state of facts upon which this argument is based ever coming into being, it might prove interesting to examine it and with it the argument based in substance on the reasoning that in cases of civil insurrection successfully put down peace can not be declared through the treaty-making power, since the Government at war with certain of its citizens does not recognize that an antagonistic sovereignty exists and a treaty is a contract between sovereigns.

It is conceded that every consideration of sound policy demands that government have the power to make and declare peace. It is conceded that a declaration of war, of itself, without other legislation, works a change in the legal status of the citizens both toward their own government and also toward the citizens and government of the enemy country. It is also admitted, I suppose, that immediately upon a declaration of war there comes into existence, at least in our own Government, powers which do not exist during a state of peace, affecting most vitally the ability of the Government to defend itself and also the rights, privileges, and immunities of the citizen in person and property and his freedom of action in vital particulars. It is and will be conceded, I suppose, that before the status of the citizen is changed from that of peace to that of war an act of government is necessary declaring either the change of status or else the fact upon which the change depends. This is absolutely necessary that the citizen may avoid giving aid and comfort to the enemy, may know his duties and obligations, and it is equally necessary that officers of government may also know their duties. We work this change from peace to war by a declaration by the Congress. It will be as readily conceded that when once the status of the citizen has been fixed as one of war, some act of government is equally necessary to change it once again to that of peace. The same considerations of policy and good government, and, indeed, the very dictates of self-preservation, demand that government must make the declaration. It is unthinkable that each citizen should have the privilege of deciding for himself when the fighting or negotiating should end or when his peace-time status should be restored.

I take it, then, that it will be admitted by all that it requires some act of government to restore the status of peace when once the Government and its citizens have been given the status of war. How else would the citizen know that the war-time powers of the Government had ceased; that his former enemy had become again his friend? How else could officers of government know their powers and duties? And so I cheerfully concede that in the cases assumed above there is, and ought to be, a power in government to declare a peace in those cases where the treaty power can not be exercised for the lack of a government with which to contract and agree. But I deny that it follows that it is in any agency other than the treaty-making one, when there is, as a matter of fact, an enemy country toward whom we have assumed the status of war.

We have seen that a condition of war is a status; that is, a certain relationship to the enemy country and its citizens imposed on itself and its citizens by government by the declaration of war. Status means relationship, and this, of course, assumes, as a necessity, the existence of something to which to be related. A man or country can not bear a relationship to something which does not exist. It must follow, then, that in cases where one country completely destroys another with which it is at war and obliterates its sovereignty, the war status of the victor country and its citizens ceases to exist at all, for the reason that there is nothing to which to have the relationship.

So in such circumstances the making of peace is impossible. There is nothing with which to make it. All that is necessary and all that could take place is a notification by the Government to its citizens and to the world, a notification, it is true, made necessary by considerations of good government, but still but a notification that the status of war has been changed or obliterated and no longer exists in fact. Under such circumstances the notification should properly come from a political department of the Government, either by presidential proclamation, as was done by the then President, from time to time as peace was restored in the several States during the Civil War, or else by the Congress, and it is not necessary to inquire here which.

What I have said is applicable to a state of insurrection or civil war where the parent government successfully puts down the insurrection. There is no opposing sovereignty with which to treat, no opposing government or enemy citizenship with which to have a war status, and hence all that is required is some sort of official notification of the facts.

But does it follow where there is in existence an enemy sovereignty capable of continuing war, legally at least, one capable of choosing whether it will continue the status of war as far as itself and citizens are concerned, that a peace status can be restored simply by a declaration of one of the countries that it is so?

It can not if an agreement be necessary, for agreements between this and other countries are committed for their making solely to the treaty-making power, the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present.

We have stated, and certainly it is conceded, that a state of war is a status, and that a state of peace is likewise such. Each has its privileges and its obligations, and a state of war implies not only the attitude of one belligerent but the relation of each to the other. In a peace status the citizen of one country can trade with the citizen of another. In a state of war this can not be done. It is not a state of peace, then, if by the Government of either country trade is prohibited, that country considering itself at war, even though the other country has chosen to say it is at a state of peace.

The making of peace implies that old differences have been settled and are no longer a ground of war under international law. It can not be a state of peace when either of the countries, having never relinquished its attitude of war, may lawfully renew the actual fighting whenever it chooses. In a state of peace it is held to be unlawful under international law to seize the goods and imprison the citizens of a friendly country, but this is permitted when a country is at war; then the citizens of the other country are enemies. It is not a state of peace when, though one country has declared that it is at peace, the other is at liberty to seize the goods and persons of the first. When countries are at war the citizens of each are the enemies of the citizens of the other and intercourse and trade is prohibited. It will be noted that these limitations flow from the fact that one country chooses to retain the war status as far as it is concerned. In short, there is a status of war even though one of the parties assumed to say that it is at peace.

These considerations and illustrations might be multiplied, showing beyond dispute, I submit, that when the status of war has been assumed by warring Governments which continue to exist as sovereignties, with the powers of government and the exercise of governmental will unimpaired, with power to continue the war status, as far as itself and its nationals are concerned, the only way in which a peace status can be obtained is by mutual agreement and consent.

This being true, under our Government it can be attained only by the exercise of the treaty power, since this only has jurisdiction of agreements with other nations with respect to national matters.

This was evidently the intention of the makers of the Constitution. It was so understood by those who preached its merits to the people prior to its adoption. It has received the sanction of uniform practice throughout our history, and surely at this late hour this House will not depart from the teachings of the fathers.

Permit me to call attention to the fact that the sole and only question here is whether the House is seeking to exercise the treaty-making power. Those cases holding that it, when exercised, must not intrude on subject matters solely committed to other agencies, that the power must be exercised subject to constitutional limitations, are in nowise in point or germane here. It may be that the right to levy duties being committed solely to Congress, the treaty-making power can not be exercised to usurp this function. It may be that the power to admit new States to the Union being committed to Congress, the treaty power can not operate upon this subject matter, but these things are beside the question. They have to do with the limitation of the power or the exclusion of subject matters upon which to operate. The question here is not the limits or limitations of the power, but where does it reside?

If to those who agree with me I seem to debate the obvious, let me plead in excuse that the attempted usurpation is as plainly such.

The question is important, not so much in its effects, for the resolution will have none as far as legal efficacy is concerned, but important as an assault on the Constitution. Surely the motive must be powerful to cause gentlemen to take this action.

Do gentlemen opposed to the treaty of peace as drawn, the hope of a suffering world, slowly done to death by reservations of its life, now propose "to cut the head off and then hack the limbs, like wrath in death, and envy afterwards"? Is this poor thing of rags and patches all that America offers to her dead?

Is this to be the substitute for a noble plan, this wastrel from its home, so poor its rightful parent would not nurture it? Or having acted as we have, is this our alibi, done so that it will perhaps appear "our purpose necessary and not envious; which, so appearing to the common eye, we shall be called purgers and not murtherers"?

If the motives of gentlemen be those of political expediency and party advantage, I would remind them that the people will not repose confidence in the party that for party advantage, real or expected, will override the fundamental law of the land. If it be urged that sentiment demands an early peace, I would remind them that it does not demand it at the price of constitutional government. Sentiment does not demand a violation of the Constitution and never will until we are prepared to abandon all respect for law and the orderly processes of government.

If it be assumed that a certain section of sentiment demands this action, I would remind gentlemen that then a certain sentiment is making, knowingly or unknowingly, an assault upon the fundamental law of the land, the very condition which was contemplated when each of us by oath was made its defender and friend. Strange, indeed, if the condition which was to cause us to spring to arms in defense of constitutional government is to be made the excuse for surrender and a joining in the assault.

Grievous days if the guardians of the temple are to sell the golden service to win the favor of those who know not what they ask.

Mr. Chairman, our Constitution was born from the loins of wisdom, which gathered knowledge with the centuries, learned its lessons in suffering and failure, and gave its child to us only in the prime and midday of its strength.

Through the years it has been our guardian, mentor, friend. It served us in infancy, stood beside us in the hour of civil strife, saved the vanquished from the annihilation of revenge, and showed the victor the path of mercy and justice, made possible the reuniting of a severed people, and restored the severed bonds of fraternal love. It has made us great. Living by its rules, we exemplify the greatest liberty, prosperity, and enjoyment of opportunity ever attained by man in government. And now, in the midst of a world torn by war and suffering, with the voices of discontent vocal throughout the earth, some crying for the abolition of all law and some for changes radical and untried, it stands proclaiming those basic principles of government and human right by which our happiness and well-being have been made possible. Will we observe its law? The Constitution stands safe and secure from all enemies without our shores, but in its love it bears no weapon of defense against its children. They only can wound and kill. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Supposing the Congress of the United States should pass a resolution declaring that the war was at an end, and the legislative branch of the German Government should pass a like resolution, would the gentleman still say that the two bodies together had no right to come to a mutual understanding?

Mr. VENABLE. Absolutely, for the reason that under our Constitution the power to make international agreements is vested exclusively in the treaty-making functionary, and the Congress has not the right to speak.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire when we would be at peace provided the President at no time would make a treaty?

Mr. VENABLE. I undertook to answer that position. I do not know whether the gentleman was present or not. The gentleman conceives a case where government has totally failed. What sort of position would we be in if Congress should totally fail to function? Would the President have the right to constitute himself the lawmaking authority? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] is correct, it requires these representatives of 100,000,000 people to involve this country in war; but once it is involved in war God Almighty himself could not get us out of it if Woodrow Wilson did not want us to get out. [Applause.] The gentleman suggests that the idea that this House and the Senate can stop the fight which it and the Senate started would be humorous if it were not tragic, and it might be both. The idea that there is no way to get this country out of war unless the President lets us stop is tragic and is humorous, too. The gentleman bases his entire argument upon a very curious fallacy, which is that it takes a treaty to stop a fight. Under the ordinary laws of nature and of common sense anybody who can start a fight can stop that fight if the other fellow is willing. [Applause.]

In this case Germany has sued for peace, and all that is necessary now is for somebody to tell her that she can quit, and under the Constitution all powers given, not otherwise specifically assigned, can be exercised by Congress, and the time necessary has arrived when the treaty makers failed to function.

The gentleman speaks of this as if we were making a treaty. We are not. Germany sues for peace and we deliver an ultimatum and we say, "Yes; you may quit under certain conditions." If they accept them, then the treaty-making power can go to work and make a treaty. We are not negotiating a treaty. We are announcing an ultimatum. The gentleman's argument flows gracefully on in eloquent and rounded periods just as soon as he leaves his first premise. If his premise were correct, it would be a logical and persuasive speech, but it is all bottomed on the singular and curious fallacy that wars can only be terminated by written treaties; that nations can live in peace only when their agreements to do so have been signed, sealed, registered, and recorded. That fallacy exploded, his brilliant argument hangs wavering in the air without foundation and ceases to be of force or effect. If Germany accepts our ultimatum, then the treaty makers can begin again. Every man with horse sense knows that this war is over, and if is high time that the clock struck officially the hour of its end. We can not afford to have a river of horrors and expenses of war engulfing our Republic till somebody is willing to take advice he does not like. The people have vested in the representatives all reserve powers necessary to preserve the Republic and its citizens. This is a government of checks and balances, and if other departments fail Congress must do its duty. That is what Congress is for and that is why it wields the thunderbolt of the will of a hundred million Americans.

The gentleman from Mississippi instances something that took place in the Constitutional Convention which he evidently has misapprehended, as it demonstrates the opposite to what he had in his mind. I presume he had in his mind the recollection that comes to my mind, that they had under consideration at the moment, not the present Constitution but a proffered one, which had this clause in it, that among the things Congress could do was that it could make war. Mr. Ellsworth, of Connecticut, suggested adding peace, so it would read that Congress could make war and peace. He made a fine argument in support of it. One of his colleagues suggested that he did not understand what that meant, that it did not mean declare war; it meant by making war to carry on war; and if you add to it making peace, you would be making it say that Congress could carry on war and carry on peace. He said that if it said declare war that would be a different thing, which it now does, and Mr. Ellsworth saw the point and voted against his own suggestion.

There is nothing in the Constitutional Convention that I remember to indicate any further than that; there may have been some similar instance on some other day.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Not just yet. Jess Willard, out in my district, was champion of the world a little while ago, and Dempsey and he got involved in war. Dempsey hit him in the jaw and the war ended. [Laughter.] There was no treaty. [Laughter.] Treaties are not necessary between nations in this world any more than it is necessary for you and me to go into partnership. A treaty is requisite if we are to be engaged in business together, and if nations desire to assume relations of such a character that the people can do business and carry on affairs together there must be a treaty. But they can live at peace without a treaty. Because we have peace with Germany it does not follow that we must have a treaty with Germany and go into business with her. The treaty power is lodged in the President and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LITTLE. I would rather not, but go ahead.

Mr. JUUL. I want to remind the gentleman that the Congress of the United States abrogated the treaty with Russia because Russia would not recognize passports granted to the Jews. And yet we continue to do business with them.

Mr. LITTLE. And live at peace with them. No treaty is necessary in order to live at peace with another nation. What became of our Mexican treaties? The power that declares war, the power that starts the fight, always, under the laws of God, common sense, and nature, has the implied power to declare peace. [Applause.]

It is true that the Congress of the United States has no right, having declared peace, to follow it with a treaty. The Congress has authority to refuse funds and soldiers and thus cause a cessation of hostilities. Congress can do this without any resolution by mere refusal of appropriation and soldiers. King Charles had the gentleman's constitutional views, that the executive can raise money and keep up war and government without legislative aid, and they cut his head off. The power which starts a fight is inherently granted the power to stop that fight. He that can begin can end. [Applause.]

Ah, but they say the Constitution of the United States indicates otherwise, that the President and the Senate have the sole right to stop the fight. Where in the Constitution is that power granted? They are told that they can make treaties between the different nations and ourselves, but where in the Constitution is the President and the Senate told that they can stop a fight without a treaty? [Applause.]

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Not at present. They are simply negotiators for the Republic. We have waited for the treaty makers and we have no treaty with Germany. But it does not follow we must keep on at war. As the gentleman so aptly and eloquently says, "It is absurd." It is like a marriage. We do not have to get married to anybody if we do not want to. But when we do somebody must establish the conditions under which the marriage is to be made.

So if the gentleman from Mississippi is correct in his position, he simply puts himself in this position, that if the Presidents should be obstinate, bullheaded, self-willed, fanatical, obsessed by some one idea, and determined they could involve this country in war for a thousand years and nobody could stop it. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I have called your attention to the fact that the whole argument of the gentleman from Mississippi is based on a theory that we are making a treaty, when it is evident that we are merely delivering an ultimatum.

But there is a bigger reason than all these things. We can not handle everything with technicalities. The President has no right to declare war, and yet a few months ago he directed a force of troops into Mexico, sent Gen. Pershing a hundred miles into that country, and established a state of war. The Constitution did not authorize him to do that, but Congress backed him up. Are we going to be told that although we backed up the President of the United States when he violated technically the Constitution, when we try to stop hostilities and save the lives of men and immense sums to the Republic that he is going back on us? He sent a force of troops into Mexico, when Congress might have brought him to account for it, and is he so obstinate and so important that he will refuse to back up Congress when it tries to save money and the sacrifice of life? Why, certainly not. I have too much confidence in and respect for the President of the United States to think that he would think of doing any such thing. Unconstitutional for the Senate and the House to pass this resolution and say that hostilities which the House and Senate began by resolution are ended by resolution! Why, Pershing on the front could do that very thing. Germany sued for peace. They asked that hostilities cease, and Pershing agreed to the armistice. He had authority under the Constitution and the powers Congress gave to do that. He and our allies did it by an ultimatum of what they should do before we granted peace, and our armies are camped on the Rhine because Pershing could say that the fight shall stop. Can not the Congress of the United States declare an armistice? If Germany turned around and wanted peace, as has been suggested, then the war is ended without a doubt.

The Constitution gives Congress authority to declare war, which carries with it, logically, authority to stop war, unless the Constitution specifically gives that power to somebody else. That venerable document authorizes the President and the Senate to make treaties with nations with whom we are at peace or at war, but no right to stop the war unless a treaty is made. So that authority is still vested in Congress. But the Constitution goes further and says that Congress can make any laws necessary for carrying out the powers previously given and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government. Thus there is the blanket authority vested in Congress to stop every gap that has not been met by the Constitution. So when the Senate and the President have failed to come to an understanding we are forced back upon the inherent power and the general authority the Constitution gives Congress to meet the emergencies of the Republic. The Senate of the United States has taken the treaty and given to the Executive, which negotiated it, the advice the Constitution required from that august body. The Constitution supposed, of course, the President would accept the advice the Constitution ordered the Senate to give him and then two-thirds of the Senate would concur and we would have a treaty and peace.

But an extraordinary situation has arisen because the President declines to take the constitutional advice of the Senate. If the gentleman from Mississippi is right, constitutional powers are exhausted and an emergency has arisen for which the fathers of the Republic in all their wisdom failed to provide. The gentleman thinks our resolution is absurd. Is it any more absurd and impossible than the condition that arises when the President scorns the advice the Constitution arranges for him. New ills demand new remedies. Fortunately for America, the Constitution has empowered Congress with whatever authority is necessary, with all powers vested in the Government not otherwise located, as well as the implied authority to cease fighting, which comes with its power to begin fighting. The logic of common sense points the beacon light clear in this seeming midnight darkness of the hour. Men cry for concentration of power in a single pair of hands in great trials of nations. In the days of the French Revolution, the English Revolution, the Austrian Revolution, the German Revolution, the Russian Revolution—every time in history the legislatures have been stronger in emergencies than any single executive. Under the powers given it by the Constitution, the authority lodged nowhere else by the Constitution, when the treaty-making powers fail to treat and war's menace hangs over us, Congress and Congress alone, when the enemy sues for peace, can say, "The war we began by resolution we now declare stopped by the same resolution that started it," and if the President wishes to veto that resolution, admit that he can not stop the war, confess that he will not permit anybody else to terminate it, let him answer on the pages of history for a thousand years in the tribunal where is given the judgment of mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, can not the gentleman from Illinois grant me two minutes more?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more time. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. As I suggested, out in Toledo the fight ended without a treaty. This war is over anyway, and what difference does it make if we should pass such a resolution? A friend of mine, a little fellow, an editor out home, was going up the steps and another man hit him in the back, all because of a row about saloons. The little man turned around and leaped down and fell on top of the big fellow. The little fellow was on top, the big fellow falling backward. The big fellow, although he was bigger than the other man, called for help, and some of the crowd around about said, "Heath, had not you better get off?" and Heath said, "Is this fight over? If it is not, I am very well situated." This fight is over, Germany is done, our country won, the fight ended, they cried for quarter, and the power which began this war is in a position to end it right now, if there never is a treaty. So what is the use of getting away from the rules of common sense and talking about technicalities that do not exist? A Roman ambassador at Carthage said to the Carthagenians, "I hold peace and war in the folds of my toga—which will you have?" Has this Congress, the great power which declared this war, sent an ambassador to Paris who is the only man that can announce the termination of a war he could not begin? Has it come to this, my friends, that we send a President of the United States to Paris to sit at a peace conference of the world and say to the universe, for 100,000,000 Americans, "I have peace and war in the pockets of my swallow-tail coat—which will you have?" [Applause.]

Mr. MCANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I thought the gentleman from Kansas agreed to yield to me when he had finished his statement.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman will excuse me, but if they will yield me two minutes I will be very glad to yield to him.

Mr. WINGO. My object was not controversial, for I am sure that the gentleman does not want to make an inaccurate statement. The gentleman is in error when he says that Mr. Ellsworth proposed in the Constitutional Convention the proposal to give Congress, in addition to power to "declare war," the power to "make peace." What the gentleman refers to was the original proposition of vesting in Congress the power "to make war." Then Mr. Ellsworth did call attention to the fact that the Executive was the proper one to "make" war, and that what they should do was to vest in the legislative department the power to "declare" war. For that reason the amendment was adopted changing the word "make" to the word "declare." Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, proposed an amendment to give Congress the right to "make peace," and Mr. Butler and two other gentlemen were the only ones who supported that proposition. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] will read the debates in the Constitutional Convention he will realize that the fathers were wise, because they seemed to foresee the present day, when the party in control of Congress might, in a partisan, dictatorial spirit, as does now the Republican steering committee, say to the country, "You will take our kind of peace or you will get none at all."

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I yield.

Mr. LITTLE. I can not thank the gentleman for his information, because he has not given any. The statements I made about Mr. Ellsworth are accurate. It is true that Mr. Butler did make the motion referred to by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], but that does not bear on the immediate proposition. Mr. Ellsworth did make the suggestion that I referred to, and if the gentleman would study the debate he would realize it.

Mr. WINGO. I appreciate the advice from the gentleman, but to show him that I have studied the debate I hope that he will keep all of his remarks in the RECORD——

Mr. LITTLE. That is the idea.

Mr. WINGO. And he will find that on the very same day, August 17, 1787, the proposition that I refer to, that of giving Congress the power to "make peace" came immediately after the proposition of giving it power to "declare war." Mr. Ellsworth did not offer the amendment to vest the power to "make peace" in Congress, but that amendment was offered by Mr. Butler, and was unanimously voted down. The gentleman does not seem to catch the point I was trying to call to his attention about which I say that he is in error. If I wanted to make the retort obvious to my sweet-tempered friend, I would state that I can give him information, but I can not give him comprehension.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. WINGO. My only object in calling the gentleman's attention to this was that I did not want him to fall into a historical inaccuracy, which he did when he stated that Mr. Ellsworth urged that power to "make peace" be vested in Congress. The record of the debates shows that Ellsworth took the opposite view, stating that it should be easier to make peace than to declare war, and supported the proposal to vest the treaty-making power in the President alone. This, too, was rejected, and the provision now in the Constitution vesting this power in the President with advice and consent of the Senate was adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. No; I can not.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman afraid to yield?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no. If the gentleman will get me plenty of time, I will be very glad to yield to him.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. No. Let us have one at a time.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman will come over to see me some time, I will show him the place in the book, if we can find one.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I have read it time and again. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who makes the suggestion that I am afraid to yield, desires, I will be very glad to go into the question with him and argue it, and I will grant him two hours to my one, as to whether or not this House has any constitutional power to propose a treaty as proposed by this so-called peace resolution.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. No. If the gentleman will get me time, I will be very glad to do so. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad that this discussion has come up. I trust the Republican steering committee, that undertakes to say to the country that it shall have its particular brand of peace or none at all, will allow us sufficient time to discuss not only our power but the merits of the proposed resolution. I am anxious to restore peace and will do all I can to bring about peace-time conditions, but I decline to be fooled by a political resolution that instead of concluding peace will worse confound the confusion that already exists.

I repeat, I am very anxious to have peace. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is correct, and this House has the power to make peace, why have he and the other Republicans who are in control sat here so many long, weary months and not exercised that power and brought about peace? If he had that power all the time, why has he waited and why has the country waited for peace when he had in the "folds of his toga" the power to declare peace? Why do he and his fellow Republicans continue to make peace the football of partisan politics?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES]. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, it has been laid down as an unquestionable proposition of international law that there is a legal as well as a moral necessity that with the ceasing of the causes which justified the inception of the war the war itself should cease.

Believing in this doctrine, Mr. Chairman, and also being possessed with an intense desire for peace, I earnestly and conscientiously began to investigate the proposition as to whether or not, under the Constitution of our Nation, we could bring about peace by a joint resolution of the House and Senate. I have made what I consider a thorough investigation. I know I have made an honest investigation.

I have found the great weight of authority holds there are three ways or methods by which war may be concluded and peace again established:

First, by the unconditional submission of one belligerent to another; second, by a de facto cessation of hostilities and a de facto renewal of relations of peace by both belligerents; and, third, by a formal treaty of peace. I have been unable to find any other method than the three enumerated.

I take it we are dealing with the third proposition—that is to say, a formal treaty of peace. If not, then we are dealing with nothing.

Therefore we must assume that the joint resolution under consideration by its phraseology is an attempt to bring about a treaty of peace. Then the question presents itself, in what manner and by what authority can this be accomplished?

The Constitution specifically provides how war may be declared by Congress, and, to my mind, it is just as specific as to making peace.

It is as plain as the English language can make it, that the President shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur. Nowhere in the Constitution, nor anywhere else as for that, is there a provision that when two-thirds of the Senate fail or refuse to concur that the House of Representatives can assume jurisdiction of treaty making.

It has been argued by some that the power to declare war necessarily includes the power to declare peace. That theory was exploded early in the history of our Government. All governments have specifically fixed these powers by constitution or otherwise. Some have placed the power of declaring war, also of making peace, in a single individual. But, as has already been said, our Constitution provides that the President, and he only, with the advice and consent of the Senate, can make a peace treaty. If the framers of the Constitution had intended the real representatives of the people, namely, the House of Representatives, had to give advice and consent to the President in making a peace treaty, then, undoubtedly, that provision of the Constitution would have read, "The President shall have the power, by and with the advice and consent of both Houses of Congress, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Members thereof present concur." Also if it had been intended by the framers of our Constitution that the making of peace treaties was a matter of legislation, as contemplated by this resolution, there no doubt would have been a provision in the Constitution to the effect that every treaty which shall have passed the House of Representatives and Senate shall, before it becomes a treaty, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the treaty, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall become a treaty.

That is what is sought to be done by this resolution, without any constitutional provision authorizing such procedure, and in open and flagrant violation of the Constitution.

In view of the fact the makers of the Constitution specifically excluded the House of Representatives from any consideration of peace treaties, I can not understand what prompts the leaders of a great party to drag into our deliberations a matter so foreign to the jurisdiction of this House.

To give this House a voice in the making of peace treaties was no doubt anticipated at several times during the making of the Constitution, as can be ascertained by reading the journal of the Constitutional Convention by Madison.

On August 17, 1787, in the debate on this question in the Federal convention there is this record:

> Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature power of peace, as they were to have that of war.
>
> "Mr. Garry seconds him," he said. "Eight Senators may possibly exercise the power if vested in that body and 14 if all should be present; and may consequently give up part of the United States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature."
>
> "On the motion for adding the words 'and peace' after 'war,' it was defeated by a good majority."

I am sure that it was unanimous.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. AYRES. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was defeated unanimously.

Mr. AYRES. I thought so.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The vote was by States. I think there were two or three members of the other opinion, but it was recorded as a unanimous vote. May I suggest this, further, to the gentleman while I am on my feet: The wisest writers on the Constitution discussed that point. Justice Story and Chancellor Kent both take the view which the gentleman now advances, which is different from that which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] stated a moment ago.

The gentleman who is now speaking is correct, as I read the history of the convention and the commentaire of Story and Kent, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] is incorrect.

Mr. AYRES. I want to read what Mr. Justice Story said relative to this matter. This is section 1173:

> In the convention in the first draft of the Constitution the power was given merely "to make war." It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power "to make peace," but this was unanimously rejected, upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress under the confederation of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Mr. J. I. C. Hare, in his treatise on American constitutional law, says:

> The President is as much the representative of the entire people of the United States as any Member of Congress can be of his district, and should therefore exercise the discretionary powers confided to him by the Constitution in the way he may deem best calculated to promote the welfare of the country, which may not be in the way deemed best by Congress. Take, for instance, the case of a war which Congress thinks unnecessary or unjust and wishes to close on terms that the enemy are willing to accept. Still, it is the right of the President, and not of Congress, to determine whether the terms are advantageous, and if he refuses to make peace the war must go on.

Dr. William Rawle, in his treatise on American constitutional law, says:

> Treaties, by which peace is completely restored, may, as already shown, be made by the President and Senate alone, without the concurrence and against the will of the House of Representatives.
> It has been made a subject of doubt whether the power to make war and peace should not be the same, and why a smaller part of the Government should be intrusted with the latter than the former. Sufficient reasons may be assigned for the distinction. Peace is seldom effected without preparatory discussions, often of length and difficulty, the conduct of which, of course, belongs only to the President and Senate. War is always an evil; peace is the cure of that evil.

In Halleck's International Law, volume 1, may be found the following by that author:

By the Constitution of the United States of America, the President has the exclusive power of making treaties of peace, which when ratified with the advice and consent of the Senate become the supreme law of the land, and have the effect of repealing all other laws of Congress, or of States, which stand in the way of their stipulations.

And I will state there are many other authorities sustaining that view, which I will not have the time to recite.

The only manner in which the House of Representatives can interfere with such power would be for Congress to compel the President to make peace by refusing the means to carry on the war. There is no question but what Congress can do that, but that time has passed, and we are now considering a treaty of peace. It is also true that the House can refuse to enact such legislation as is necessary to carry out the provisions of a treaty after it has been ratified by the President and the Senate, but that is not the question we are called upon to decide in this resolution.

I am confident there can not be found a single authority on constitutional law that will sustain the contention of the supporters of this resolution. Simply because the Constitution does not in words prohibit the House of Representatives from taking jurisdiction of such matters and subjects as are to be considered by the President and Senate under its provisions is no reason why it should assume it has such jurisdiction.

If we are justified in taking that position, why not also take the position we have the authority under the Constitution by joint resolution to confirm the appointments of ministers and ambassadors, members of the Cabinet, judges of courts, postmasters, and all other appointments, as there is no provision in the Constitution prohibiting it? It is just as logical in one case as in the other. We have a provision in the Constitution which reads:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Why not say, because there is no provision in the Constitution prohibiting the Senate from taking original jurisdiction of revenue bills that it may do so by joint resolution?

I have heard some say, "Oh, well, if both branches of Congress assume jurisdiction in this matter, neither questioning the jurisdiction of the other, but by joint resolution make a declaration of peace which imposes certain conditions on the German Government and which that Government accepts and agrees to carry out, who can find fault or raise the question of it being unconstitutional?"

I think a fair answer to such logic as that is to call attention to another provision of this same Constitution, which provides that all cases affecting ambassadors and other public ministers and consuls, and also in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court of the United States shall have original jurisdiction. Is there a lawyer in this House who will contend for a moment that if parties to a legal controversy in which a State should be a party and some district or State court would assume jurisdiction and neither party to the controversy objected, that a judgment rendered by such a court would be valid? I can not conceive of any arrangement whereby the Supreme Court of the land could be ousted of its original constitutional jurisdiction and transfer it to an inferior tribunal and expect a valid decree.

If that be true, can it be said with any greater logic that this House by a joint resolution can take jurisdiction of a subject matter which is clearly by the Constitution lodged exclusively in the President and Senate? Can it be conscientiously and sincerely contended that any action taken by this House in this matter would be valid and binding?

I am just as anxious as any Member of this House to see peace declared, and feel it should have been done long ago, and believe if the Constitution had delegated such power to this body to make a declaration or treaty of peace it would have been accomplished long ago, and I believe the framers of the Constitution made a mistake when they assumed that all the brains and dignity would be lodged in any one branch of this Government, especially in view of what has occurred within the past year; but I can not bring myself to feel that, owing to my desire for peace, I am willing to do an unlawful or unconstitutional act, nor would I, if I disliked—yes, I will say hated—the President as do some of the Members of this House, permit it to cause me to violate the oath I took that I would support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and would bear true faith and allegiance to the same.

To bear true faith and allegiance to the Constitution does not admit that by reason of intense partisanship, or because of the hatred you might have for the President or the uncontrollable desire you might have to embarrass him, to knowingly vote for a measure which is clearly in conflict with its provisions.

I am willing to go as far as any Member of this House in demanding and upholding all the powers the Constitution has given us. There is no question but the House of Representatives has the right to exercise its judgment as to whether or not it will approve or disapprove a treaty made by the constituted authorities—that is, the President and Senate. The House is not compelled to vote for an appropriation to carry out the provisions of such treaty.

We have the undoubted right to determine for ourselves, upon the merits of a treaty, whether we will or will not enact such legislation necessary to make it operative. This question was first raised early in the history of the Nation—in 1794 and 1795 over the Jay treaty—and has been a subject of much controversy many times since that date. The great weight of authority is in favor of this position I have stated, but to this extent and no further, however, are we a part of the treaty-making power of the Nation. This power can be exercised only after a treaty has been made and submitted to us for the purpose, and sole purpose, of enacting laws to carry out its provisions. That power does not in any sense authorize the House of Representatives to, in the first instance, take part in the deliberations of making a treaty, or as for that matter, by resolution, declare peace.

Judge Cooley, one of the greatest authorities on constitutional law, says:

The full treaty-making power is in the President and Senate, but the House of Representatives has a restraining power upon it, in that it may, at its discretion, at any time refuse to give assent to legislation necessary to give a treaty effect. Many treaties need no such legislation, but when moneys are to be paid by the United States they can be appropriated by Congress alone, and in some other cases laws are needful. An unconstitutional or manifestly unwise treaty the House of Representatives may possibly refuse to aid, and this, when legislation is needful, would be equivalent to a refusal of the Government, through one of its branches, to carry the treaty into effect. This would be an extreme measure, but it is conceivable that a case might arise in which a resort to it would be justified.

President Jefferson, in his message to Congress relative to the purchase of Louisiana, recognized the extent of the authority of this House. He said:

In my communication to you of the 17th instant I informed you that conventions had been entered into with the Government of France for the cession of Louisiana to the United States. These, with the advice and consent of the Senate, having now been ratified and my ratification exchanged for that of the first consul of France in due form, they are communicated to you for consideration in your legislative capacity. You will observe that some important conditions can not be carried into execution but with the aid of the Legislature and that time presses a decision on them without delay.

All the Presidents from Washington up to and including President McKinley have recognized this principle.

If that was the only question it would be easily solved. This question as to whether or not the House of Representatives is a part of the treaty-making power has been before this body many times, and it has gone on record on more than one occasion that it had no jurisdiction in such matters. In 1794 and 1795, in the controversy over the Jay treaty, a resolution was passed by the House as follows:

Resolved, It being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution that the President shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties, but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress, and it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

Again on April 3, 1820, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, then Speaker of the House of Representatives, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of the territory belonging to them, and that no treaty purporting to alienate any portion thereof is valid without the concurrence of Congress.

This resolution was debated until April 5, when the House passed to other business without any decision.

May I ask the gentleman in charge of the time that I may have 5 or 10 minutes additional?

Mr. MCANDREWS. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Again, in 1871, the House of Representatives passed the same resolution, word for word, as was passed by the House in 1794, which I have already recited, showing that 77 years afterwards they were in the same frame of mind relative to their treaty-making power as in the very beginning of our Government.

In 1881, it is said, the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, discussing the treaty-making power, concluded the House had no share in it and submitted a report on House joint resolution 132, relating to the subject, as follows:

In the opinion of your committee there is no conflict in these provisions. The words "all bills for raising revenue," in section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution, do not embrace treaties; a treaty is not a bill for raising revenue, and the requirement that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives" is not a limitation upon the treaty-making power, but is only a condition imposed on the ordinary law-making power of the Government. The President and the two Houses of Congress constitute the ordinary law-making power of the Government; the President and two-thirds of the Senators present constitute the treaty-making power. Neither of these powers has anything to do with the other, and to require the consent of the House of Representatives to make a treaty valid would violate the Constitution by making the House of Representatives a branch of the treaty-making power.

In debate in the United States Senate December 16, 1903, Senator John C. Spooner, who is recognized as authority on the Constitution, said, in answer to Senator Bailey—and I am reciting Republican authority, hoping it may have some effect on my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle. This is what Senator Spooner said:

The point of the Senator's argument was that the House was no part of the treaty-making power. That is true. A treaty which the President and the Senate may lawfully enter into would be no better if it provided for approval by the House, but would be an attempt to confer by contract a power upon the House which under the Constitution it does not possess, which it claimed long ago, in President Washington's day, but which it abandoned then and has never since asserted.

In 1897 Senator Cullom, of Illinois, said in a report he made on a reciprocity treaty:

Section 2 of article 2 of the Constitution provides that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The President and the Senate are, under the Constitution, the treaty-making power. The initiative lies with the President. He can negotiate such treaties as may seem to him wise and propose them to the Senate for the advice and consent of that body, which is as free and independent in its action upon the same as the President is in exercising his power of initiative and negotiation.

The power of the President and the Senate is derived from the Constitution. There is under our system no other source of treaty-making power. The Congress is without power to grant to the President or to the Senate any authority in respect to treaties, nor does the Congress possess any power to fetter or limit in any way the President or the Senate in the exercise of this constitutional function. It can not enlarge or in anywise limit or attach conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power.

Whether the treaty is one which is self-executing or one which requires legislation by the Congress to give it effect, it must first, in any event, be negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate. Whether he will negotiate a treaty and when and what its terms shall be are matters committed by the Constitution entirely to the discretion of the President, and whether the Senate will advise and consent to it, with or without amendment, is a matter committed entirely to the discretion of the Senate.

If a treaty be such as to require legislative action, and when entered into by the President and ratified by the Senate does not meet the approval of Congress, it has the power to withhold the legislation requisite to give it effect, but with the preliminary steps of negotiation and ratification the Congress has nothing whatever, under the Constitution, to do.

I should judge that Senator Cullom, recognized as a statesman of ability, long service, and vast experience as a legislator and a close follower of the Constitution, ought to be considered fairly good authority.

I want to particularly call attention again to what he said relative to the want or lack of power of the House to deal with treaty matters:

The power of the President and the Senate is derived from the Constitution. There is under our system no other source of treaty-making power. The Congress is without power to grant to the President or to the Senate any authority in respect to treaties, nor does the Congress possess any power to fetter or limit in any way the President or the Senate in the exercise of this constitutional function. It can not enlarge or in any wise limit or attach conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power.

I want to inquire what are we doing now by considering this resolution if not to fetter and limit the President in the exercise of his constitutional functions? Who of the supporters of this resolution can truthfully say it is not attaching conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power? Every line and syllable attaches conditions to the exercise of the treaty-making power. The argument of the supporters of this resolution is that they are not seeking to make a treaty, but only by joint resolution to bring about peace between this Nation and Germany. While I do not accept this explanation, as to my mind it is solely an effort to make a treaty with Germany, however, for the purpose of meeting the argument of the proponents of this resolution, I will accept that theory for the moment. It certainly can not be denied that it is an attempt on the part of this House to assume jurisdiction of a foreign relations matter clearly within the prerogative of the President. In support of this position I desire at this time to call to the attention of the House a message of President Grant, delivered to the House of Representatives on January 30, 1877, returning, with his objections, the joint resolution of the House (H. J. Res. 171) in reference to the congratulations from certain other countries. He said:

The Constitution of the United States, following the established usage of nations, has indicated the President as the agent to represent the national sovereignty in its intercourse with foreign powers and to receive all official communications from them. It gives him the power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties and to appoint ambassadors and other public ministers; it intrusts to him solely "to receive ambassadors and other public ministers," thus vesting in him the origination of negotiations and the reception and conduct of all correspondence with foreign States, making him, in the language of one of the most eminent writers on constitutional law, "the constitutional organ of communication with foreign States."

If this resolution should pass, can it be construed that we are at peace with Germany and Austria? This within itself would not restore diplomatic relations with those countries. It will take more than a joint resolution passed by Congress to do that.

The framers of this resolution must feel proud of the fact that they have provided in it that if these countries do not "renounce" all their rights and privileges which may have been left them, and so notify the President within 45 days after this resolution becomes effective that they have done so, we will have no commercial or financial dealings with them. In other words, we say, "Notwithstanding the fact you surrendered once, surrender again or starve."

I can not conceive of a more humiliating position for a strong nation with a generous and fair-minded people to take than to pass this resolution.

It is not only an admission that we are incapable of making peace as provided by our Constitution and as defined by all constitutional and international law writers, but also because of our position as a powerful Nation we will impose unfair and unconscionable demands. Such proceedings will discredit us as a Nation and ought to destroy any party or organization favoring it.

The House of Representatives has certain duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, and to the Senate there are delegated certain powers which the House does not enjoy and certain duties with which the House has nothing to do. If the Senate has failed in the performance of these duties, it is not the business of this House to undertake to perform them. As for one, I do not intend to be used as a cat's-paw to drag from the coals of fire the chestnuts some one else put there. Let whatever branch of the Government responsible for the condition we are in at this time assume the responsibility and not try to divide it with those in no way responsible. This House never shirked a single responsibility during the war. It met every demand made wherein it was authorized and empowered by the Constitution to do so. It should not now commit an unpardonable blunder by violating the provisions of the document that gives it existence in order to extricate some other branch of this Government from an embarrassing position in which it may be at this time, but for which the House is in no way responsible and over which it has no control or jurisdiction. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. [Applause.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I expected to discuss this question as it bears upon international law and upon the power of the Congress. In passing through, however, I heard the statement of the distinguished gentleman who said that we on this side of the Chamber were insisting that unless we had the kind of peace that we wanted we could not have peace at all. If I may be permitted, without at the present time discussing its legal effect, I desire to enter my protest right here and now. I had hoped that there might be full discussion. Indeed, my associates on the committee were kind enough to say that there might be possibility of amendment and suggestion, but the chairman of the Democratic committee came to Washington and announced publicly that his party would vote solidly against this declaration of peace, and that if we passed it the White House would veto it. And I am now replying to the suggestion not by this side of the Chamber, but over there, and your President is saying and has been saying, "You can not have peace until the peace suits me, the President of the United States." The treaty of peace was amended. It was amended by a majority of the body elected by the people. It was defeated by a Democratic minority. The people of this country believe in international arbitration. I stood here before my colleagues and for an hour, after the armistice was signed, begged and pleaded that we stand behind the President on an international compact of arbitration such as meant a league of nations. I expected that he would come back here with the dove of peace. He came back here with a basket filled with the British lion, not with the dove of peace for America. He came back here with a treaty that gave Great Britain in arbitration six votes for our one. He came back with the proposition which allowed to a superstate the ordering of your boys and my boys again into war to maintain the rape of China by that great democrat, the Mikado of Japan. [Applause on the Republican side.] He came back with a treaty which announced in the language of that old league of nations, the Holy Alliance, that the men to make peace with the world were appointed by God.

He came back with a proposition that we must obey the dictates of a court, and while the President of the United States was speaking in Idaho or somewhere in the West, saying that Canada could not have a place in the council of the League of Nations, it was discovered in another Chamber of this body Canada had an agreement signed by Wilson and Lloyd-George and Clemenceau that Canada should have a representation on the council. That is when he got sick. [Applause on the Republican side.] They uncovered a secret treaty whereby England would have six votes to our one, and you gentlemen are trying just as hard to get rid of him as we are, and you know it. You tried to "bell the cat" here the other day when my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], a real Democrat, spoke, pleading with the President to say that he would not be a candidate for a third term. You were unanimous, and now it was most heartily approved by gentlemen on my side of the House, it must be unanimous. But what is the use of asking him to agree?

He agreed when he ran the first time that he would not run the second time. Your platform pledged him to that. And now our Democratic friends charge us with delaying peace, when an amendment of the Senate under the Constitution has the right to amend the treaty, and then, instead of voting for the treaty prepared by Mr. Wilson and amended by the majority of that body, he controls just enough votes to defeat the treaty, and now says to the people, "If you want peace you must have it on my terms." How did they beat the treaty? By a minority. How did they amend it? By a majority, representing three-fourths of the people of this country. They amended it along American lines. I am a little bit tired of hearing this talk of "You must have peace according to our terms." I say to you, gentlemen, the boot is on the other foot. It is the gentleman in the White House who is holding this treaty for what he thinks is a great partisan political issue, and you know it as well as I do. You know that he expects you to indorse his League of Nations. You know he wants to go to the country on that. And as a Republican I welcome that issue, as to whether this is an American country or whether it is not. If you want to make the issue, we will meet you in November; we will meet you where people know and understand things—and they will understand—and the result in November will convince the world that the Senate did right when they inserted into that treaty the statement that no money should be paid out of our Treasury without an appropriation of Congress and this country should not enter into war without a legal declaration of war.

I wish I had time to answer the suggestion, but I will do it on Thursday, if I live and have my health. There has been this conflict of authority. The United States has always followed the doctrine that the treaty is the supreme power, and the Congress of the United States has always passed laws, has always passed appropriations, in conformity with a treaty made by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate. But those treaties following the Revolutionary War and the War of 1812, and following the Mexican War, were all treaties whereby we agreed to pass laws that took money out of the Treasury of the United States. And when the question came up for discussion, some of the Members of Congress said, "We do not want to pass this." But they were told they must pass it, because under international law and international honor they ought to carry out the agreement of the President and the Senate, as they were the treaty-making power. But for the first time in the history of our Government the President of the United States has entered into a treaty that not only involves damages but it involves the proposition that the United States must send our sons, our boys, our brothers——

Mr. MADDEN. The treaties that were ratified by the Senate in years gone by on which appropriations were made did not amend the Constitution, did they?

Mr. MASON. No; they did not amend the Constitution. There have been changes in international law time after time. It has not kept pace with civil and criminal law, but there were never greater strides made in international law than there was when Jefferson became the Secretary of State of the United States, and when he announced certain doctrines that were in strict violation of what had been international law. And yet they have been accepted. For instance, we became a Republic——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MASON. I will take the constitutional question up on Thursday.

Mr. CANNON. I yield five minutes more to my colleague.

Mr. MASON. Thank you.

For instance, as an illustration of the method of international law, before this Republic was founded the recognition of a new State by any other State was a casus belli by the parent State. After Thomas Jefferson announced the doctrine of the United States that we had the right of "recognition without intervention," it was accepted all over the world, and in no less than 12 or 14 cases have the United States in absolute violence of ancient international law recognized new States against the protest from the parent States, but not a cause for war. And the argument has been used all the while whenever this question came up for discussion in Congress to make appropriations to carry out the terms of peace; it has been one of the questions that have always come up; but the Congress of the United States has always yielded, and with high sense of honor, to carrying out the agreement of the President and the Senate, and they have made all those appropriations. But there has never been a treaty of peace attempted before where there was an attempt to give legislative power, resting alone in the Congress, of making war, to a superstate of gentlemen appointed by the rulers and congresses of any other nation in the world. The argument used in those congresses was, "Mr. Congressman, are you going to appropriate to carry out the treaty with Great Britain?" "Sure." "Do you believe in it?" "I do not believe in it." "But your President has agreed to it." Now, recall this, that all of those treaties sounded in money appropriations, but for the first time we are now invited to enter into a treaty of peace that involves the action of Congress in the sacrifice of American lives and American honor. It leaves Congress no power to say whether they will go to war or whether they will commit an act of war, or, if they go, which side they will go with. And the Senate very wisely, representing four-fifths of the people of the United States, has said, "Now is the time we are going to notify Great Britain to the effect, 'You have fooled us nearly a century; you have robbed us right along; you are taking $200,000,000 a year from the people of this country; you do not even pay the interest on your bonds; you are denouncing us in your papers as a Nation of strutters; that we did not go into the war until we knew which side was going to win, and that we did not fight.'" Notwithstanding that, we sit silent.

Now, the Senate answers, "Mr. Great Britain, hereafter when you ask America to do anything under this treaty like going to war, we notify you and the world that Wilson and the Senate can not make war. You can not make an agreement that will drive us into war. You can not make an agreement that will bind us to send our boys to fight the battles of the mikados and the kings. They intend by this notice"——

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. I have only a minute. If you will give me a little time out of yours——

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five additional minutes.

Mr. MASON. I do not want to take it out of the time, for we are really not here to discuss this. I want to use the last half minute to say that we will notify the world that hereafter whenever it is decided to do so we may be willing to go into war, we are willing to have arbitration, but the Senate and the President of the United States can not force us into a position where you can come to Congress and say under international law, "You have got to carry out the agreement made by the President." We have adopted a new rule of international law. It is a rule that comes of Americanism, and it is notice to the world that no power this side of God Almighty can force us into a foreign war until the American Congress, representing the American people, has spoken in favor of that war. [Applause.]

Mr. McANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my Republican friends that, however much it may disappoint them and however much it may chagrin them, they have not got a thing on earth to do with the treaty of peace, because both the Constitution and the law have wisely placed the decision of that matter in the hands of the President and the Senate.

Unanticipated by the Speaker, possibly, otherwise he might have been forbidden, the distinguished blind Chaplain of this House this morning tried to guide you good friends of ours off of the rocks and out of trouble when he implored you to "render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's." Why do you not let the President of the United States and the Senate settle their own business?

Mr. MASON. Which is he, Cæsar or God? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I want to bring you back from wandering afar off to some of your own business sadly needing attention. There is plenty of House business here for you to transact. Why do you not attend to it? Why do you have to leave your business unattended to and go over to the other side of the Capitol to meddle with something that you have got nothing to do with?

Why, every time your majority leader has gotten up on this floor and implored you to begin to economize, I have applauded him, and the newspapers have applauded him. But they have gotten tired of applauding without action. The country has been waiting too long in a state of expectancy. I want to invite your distinguished majority leader to read some of the editorials of your leading Republican papers to-day, which are saying, "Mr. MONDELL, the time now is for action. We are tired of words. We want economy to begin." They are saying to your majority leader, "Mr. MONDELL, we know that you hold the legislation of the House in the hollow of your hand. We know, and the people of this country know, that you can bring about economy if you will do it. We are holding you responsible. If you are in earnest about the matter you can bring it about, because you have got your Republican colleagues whipped into line in such a way that they will obey your orders." Then, why do we not have some of it?

The gentleman from Wyoming spoke about this legislative appropriation bill coming back to the House—with how much unnecessary additional appropriations put in by the Senate for unnecessary idle-clerk hire? A million and a half dollars put into that bill on the other side of the Capitol in addition to many millions of unneeded appropriations already in that bill when it left the House! Do you know what was in that bill when it left this House? It provided for 1,076 messengers. Think of it! Do you know how many watchmen it provided for? Five hundred and fifteen. You know that not a third of them are needed. We recently passed the Agricultural appropriation bill providing for 754 messengers additional, and providing for 76 watchmen for the Secretary's office. That bill, the Agricultural bill, went to the Senate and came back here to the House; notwithstanding the fact that it originally carried over $30,000,000 of appropriations, it came back here to the House with over $2,000,000 added to it, and notwithstanding the fact that at last, in behalf of the people of the country, the people had succeeded in inducing that garden-seed graft to be eliminated from the bill. That saved nearly $300,000 on that one item. And yet the bill comes back to this House with over $2,000,000 additional, and the gentleman from Wyoming admitted here this morning that there has been added by the Senate $1,500,000 in the legislative bill for unneeded clerical hire. It has been admitted here so many times that it is useless to repeat it, by such men as the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who is familiar with such matters, and by other men, posted Members, that we still have 40,000 idle, useless, unnecessary clerks on the pay roll in Washington.

Do you know what is going on in the land while you are making so many assertions for economy and taking so little action? The people are becoming disgusted. Here is a whole sheet of 50 different kinds of positions, with numerous clerks to each one, that the Civil Service Commission has just issued and sent broadcast to the country, asking for new people to be examined under the civil service; 50 different kinds of positions and numerous clerkships to each kind of position on that one sheet. Here is another advertisement, a whole sheet with 43 different kinds of positions, with examinations to be held, and here is still another one, of April 5. I ask unanimous consent to place these in the RECORD, to let the people of the country know what really goes on in behalf of economy here in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the announcements referred to:

SHEET 1. CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATIONS ANNOUNCED FOR SPECIFIED DATES.

Examinations for the following positions in the Federal civil service have been announced. Most of them are for positions in Washington, D. C.; some are for positions in field branches.

In addition to the salaries indicated, a temporary increase of $20 a month is authorized to June 30, 1920, to employees in practically all positions listed who receive not more than $2,500 a year and whose services are satisfactory.

Competitors for positions marked with an asterisk (*) are required to report for examination; those for other positions listed are not assembled at any place, but are rated on their training, experience, etc.

For full information concerning all pending examinations, apply to the secretary United States Civil Service Board, post office or custom-house, any city, or to the United States Civil Service Commission, 1724 F Street NW., Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATION, CLERK, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS, BEGINNING APRIL 5, 1920.

The United States Civil Service Commission announces an open competitive examination at Washington, D. C., only, for clerk, Bureau of the Census, on April 5, 1920, and daily thereafter, except Sundays, until further notice, for filling vacancies in the Bureau of the Census, Washington, D. C., at salaries ranging from $900 to $1,020 a year. Promotions through the various grades to $1,080 and $1,380 will be reasonably rapid for those whose services justify advancement.

Appointees whose ability and qualifications justify such action will also be allowed the increase granted by Congress of $20 a month, beginning with the second month of service.

This examination is being held only to secure additional employees for the decennial census force, and the work being temporary, no employee of the Census Office will be admitted.

Applicants must have had at least three months' clerical experience.

Applicants will not be eligible for appointment or transfer to any other bureau or service as a result of this examination.

All citizens of the United States who meet the requirements, both men and women, may enter this examination; appointing officers, however, have the legal right to specify the sex desired in requesting certification of eligibles.

Eligibles will be placed in groups, as follows:

(a) Those who have been graduated from a college or university of recognized standing.

(b) Those who have graduated from a standard high school or completed a course of study equivalent to that required for such graduation, and who have had one year's business experience.

(c) Those who do not qualify under either group (a) or (b).

Competitors will be examined in the following subjects, which will have the relative weights indicated:

SUBJECTS.	Weights.
1. Spelling (20 words of more than average difficulty)	10
2. Arithmetic (fundamental rules, common and decimal fractions, percentage, and their business application)	30
3. Penmanship (the legibility, rapidity, neatness, and general appearance of the competitor's handwriting in the subject of letter writing)	15
4. Letter writing (a letter of not less than 150 words on some subject of general interest. The competitor may select either of two subjects given)	30
5. Copying and correcting manuscript (test in making a smooth, corrected copy of a draft of manuscript, which includes erasures, misspelled words, errors in syntax, etc.)	15
Total	100

Applicants must have reached their eighteenth, but not their fiftieth, birthday on the date of the examination. Age limits do not apply to persons entitled to preference because of military or naval service.

Persons who are addicted to the habitual use of intoxicants, who have been guilty of infamous or notoriously disgraceful conduct, or who are physically or mentally unable to perform the required duties will not be eligible for examination or appointment.

Applicants must submit to the examiner on the day of examination their photographs, taken within two years, securely pasted in the space provided on the admission cards sent them after their applications are filed. Proofs or group photographs will not be accepted. Photographs will not be returned to applicants.

This examination is open to all citizens of the United States who meet the requirements.

Applicants should at once apply for Form 304, stating the title of the examination desired, to the Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C. Applications should be properly executed, including the medical certificate, and filed with the commission at Washington in time to arrange for the examination.

The exact title of the examination, as given at the head of this announcement, should be stated in the application form.

Issued April 1, 1920.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman also inform this side of the House who these Cabinet officers are who have asked for that help? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, these department heads asking for all of these unnecessary clerks have been Republicans, who have been in the jobs for years, even back to the time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. [Laughter.]

Mr. JUUL. Do not the heads of the departments have to do with that?

Mr. BLANTON. They are Republicans in these positions, who have been inherited by the Democratic administration, and we can not get rid of them. They hang on like leeches to their jobs, and you Republicans hang on to them now for that reason. You are afraid to jar them loose from the public pay roll, and you know it. [Laughter.]

That is why the country says to Mr. MONDELL, "If you are in earnest, if you are sincere about this economy program, for God's sake wake up and make your Republican colleagues vote to take this money out of the bills and keep it in the Treasury."

It has been suggested here by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] so many times that it might be tiresome for me to repeat it now, that this Government has no money of its own except what it takes out of the pockets of the people. We keep on taking it out.

Why, do you know that I nearly died this morning laughing to myself when the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] began to talk about economy. I happened to think about those 13 surveyors general in that bill that has recently come back to the House that he put back into that bill himself after upon his suggestion of economy his colleagues on the committee had cut them out with a snickersnee, doing away with all of such offices and thereby saving money for the people, and then when he found out that Wyoming, his home State, was about to lose a lot of the public money that was being spent there, he could not stand it. No; he could not stand it; he came back here and took the floor, and in that eloquent, persuasive manner of his, which is overpowering in this House in the Committee of the Whole, he put every single one of those 13 surveyors general and their incidental 13 sets of office forces back into the bill, right in the face of the fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States of America, Hon. Clay Tallman, had gone before that committee and said, "We do not need them; we should centralize this work in Washington under one head and save this money." Right in the face of that he put them back, costing thousands of dollars to the people of this country unnecessarily.

Then I laughed again when I thought about the military bill that we recently had up here before the House. There was a chance to cut it down and down, as there was once before when Mr. LaGuardia was here and tried to reduce it and the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] overpowered him, beat some of his amendments, although some of them went through, and he failed there. But some of our colleagues were overly persuaded by the big bunch of Army officers who sat in that gallery hour after hour with eagles and stars on their shoulders, the glimmer of which overpersuaded my friends down here, and they provided a new construction corps in the Army, against the advice of the Secretary of War, in order to make new positions for those pet officers with their pet uniforms on, so that they could better attend the various Army and Navy Club functions here in Washington with a little more fashion and on bigger salaries. When the Committee of the Whole voted that extra corps into our Army reorganization bill, after it was all over, after it had been put in, Mr. MONDELL came in here on the floor of the House with tears streaming from his eyes in crocodile fashion, and said, "Oh, I am so sorry it was done. Oh, you Republican colleagues of mine made an awful mistake. You voted against the good of your country." But did he ask you to change it? No; and I had to get up here on the floor with a pitchfork and prod him and stick him and punch him and push him to make him call his colleagues together when the bill got back into the House to vote out that provision, which he did under pressure, if you please. And thus the money for this extra corps was saved for the people. Why can he not get some real economy in this House, economy that is real, upon a business basis, that amounts to something in the way of sure-enough, honest, sincere retrenchment? Why, all retrenchment and all economy means self-denial on the part of some people. When we get into financial stress in our private business affairs we retrench, and to do so we have to make self-denial. With this Government owing $25,000,000,000 now and facing a deficit of $3,000,000,000 more, we have got to make self-denial, all of us. Every department of this Government and every citizen of this country must make some self-denial, and we have got to begin now if we are to rescue this country from bankruptcy. Is the gentleman from Wyoming going to begin? Is he going to get you friends of ours in here and put the whip to you and make you stand up for the country when that bill is finally voted on? The chairman promised to give us a vote on that Senate amendment adding $1,500,000 for unnecessary clerk hire. Is he going to make you stand up here and vote that million and a half dollars out of that bill? Will he do that? If he does not do it, he is not doing the duty he owes to the people of this country. He is not doing the duty he owes to the Republican Party, which is preaching economy from one end of this land to the other. He is not doing the duty which he owes to this House, because the majority leader of this House owes a certain duty to the whole House, not merely to the party which placed him in his position. I hope he will give us a chance to vote that out and keep it out of that bill.

The chairman promised us that he would give us a vote on those Subtreasuries that have been put back into that bill by the Senate. How are you going to vote on that? You know they are useless. You know that this Government does not need them. You know that they are expensive. You know that this Government can save needed money by doing away with them. We ought to do away with them. We did do away with them here in the House, but when the bill went to the Senate they were put back again. How are you going to vote on that? I admired the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] when he stood up here this morning, with a Subtreasury in his district and in his city, and told you that he wanted it taken out of the bill, because it would save money that is needed for this Government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCANDREWS] desire to use any further time?

Mr. MCANDREWS. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I will use all of the 15 minutes that have been yielded to me; but probably when the peace resolution is reached on Thursday the gentlemen in charge of the debate will not have any time at their disposal, and I would like to take this opportunity to express my emphatic disapproval of the resolution and my intention to vote against it when a vote is taken. Also there was a line of argument used by the gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. MASON], to which I would like to make brief reply.

I think I am as desirous of seeing peace made as any man in this body. I think that the Democratic side of this House are desirous that peace be made, but we will not make ourselves a party to an endeavor to make peace in a manner that is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The treaty making power is lodged in the President and the Senate, and theirs is the responsibility, and I am hopeful that an agreement will yet be reached before this Congress adjourns. Also it is unthinkable to me that the great Government of the United States, after our splendid cooperation with our allies on the battle fields of France, will undertake in a manner of this sort to make a separate peace with the enemy. Up until this hour the only one of the allies that has endeavored to make a separate peace with the enemy was the Russian Bolsheviki in the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, and I would not be a party, and I dare say that the Democratic side of this House will not be a party, to joining the Bolsheviki in a performance like the treaty of Brest-Litovsk. [Applause.]

I would like to quote for the special benefit of gentlemen on the other side of the House utterances on this point by a very distinguished authority, a very distinguished leader, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE. If you gentlemen are in a spirit of merriment this afternoon I would like to see what you think of what Mr. LODGE said in June, 1918, with reference to making a separate peace with the enemy.

Here is what Mr. LODGE said in his speech in June, 1918:

> The President who delivered the war message and the Congress who voted for war would be guilty of the blackest crimes if they were willing to make peace on the status quo ante bellum and recreate the situation which existed before the war.

That is what you gentlemen are seeking to do. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

> If we send our armies and our young men abroad to be killed and wounded in northern France and Flanders with no result but this, our entrance into the war with such an intention was a crime which nothing can justify.

So say I. If we get no better results out of this war than the resolution you gentlemen propose to enact, then I say we can not justify our action.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Let me finish reading from Senator LODGE first.

> The intention of Congress and the intention of the President was that there could be no peace until we could create a situation where no such war as this could recur. We can not make peace in the ordinary way. We can not, in the first place, make peace except in company with our allies. It would brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

If in June, 1918, we could not make peace in the ordinary way, if we could not make peace except in company with our allies, and if to do so, to use the language of Senator LODGE, would be to "brand us with everlasting dishonor and bring ruin to us also if we undertook to make a separate peace," then I would like to inquire what has so changed the situation as to justify the adoption of the resolution now proposed? Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman two questions.

Mr. BLACK. Ask one first and we will see about the other. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was not the statement made by Senator LODGE, with respect to the kind of peace that we should make, an assailment of the position taken by the President that we should have a peace without victory?

Mr. BLACK. No; I think not. The President made his peace-without-victory speech, as I recall it, in January, 1917, and Mr. LODGE made the statement I have referred to as late as June, 1918.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. May I not call attention to the fact that the speech made by the President for peace without victory was made on the 22d of February, 1918?

Mr. BLACK. Oh, no; it was made before we got into the war and after the President had, in December, 1916, asked of the belligerents to submit the terms on which they would make peace.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], who spoke a short while ago, took the position that the Senate ought not to ratify the peace treaty because in article 10 it commits us as one of the ratifying parties to the recognition and the preservation of the territorial integrity of the signers of the league. In response to a question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]—"Is not that undertaking to amend the Federal Constitution?" he said, "Why, certainly, and for that reason I would not favor a treaty of peace of this sort."

Well, now, our Republican friends have been insistent from the very outset that we should have a reservation in that treaty that specifically affirms the integrity of the Monroe doctrine. I would like for any man to point to me the constitutional provision that affirms the Monroe doctrine which says that the Government of the United States shall adopt the policy of preventing the European nations from interfering with the territorial integrity of other Republics on the Western Hemisphere. There is no clause in the Constitution dealing with that subject, and yet it has been the policy of the Nation since the days of President Monroe and there is not the least particle of difference in principle between this and in undertaking to preserve and recognize the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the members of the league. There is, of course, difference in the policy; there is none in the principle. The American people may or may not approve the provisions of article 10 of the league, but certainly it does not repeal any part of our Federal Constitution.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman may have noticed in this resolution which is to come up on Thursday a proposed treaty of peace with Germany which requires Germany in 45 days to agree to certain things, but we have not noticed that our Republican friends have put in any requirement as to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine. Does that mean that they have abandoned the Monroe doctrine?

Mr. BLACK. They have taken so many diverse positions that no one can tell to-day what stand they took yesterday or will take to-morrow. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. In just a moment. Now, gentlemen, I yield to no man in my reverence for the Constitution of the United States. I remember that it is recorded in the New Testament that a lawyer came to the Savior and said, "Master, what is the greatest of all the commandments?" The answer was, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy soul, with all thy strength, with all thy heart. That is the greatest commandment, and the next unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. And upon these two," He said, "rest all of the law and the prophets."

And in a similar way, upon the Constitution of the United States and the Declaration of Independence rest our entire system of law and government, and I yield to no man in my reverence for them. [Applause.]

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

I know that these gentlemen who are championing this peace resolution say the League of Nations is a visionary hope. But I recall that one of the greatest of the prophets in the Old Testament said that where there is no vision the people perish. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The trouble with the Republican Party to-day is that it is not a party of vision. For five years now the world has been deluged in blood, and humanity has been passing through its valley of sorrows. Shall this international anarchy give way to peaceful and orderly processes, or shall we fold our hands behind our backs, coolly gaze upon the ruins and devastation of war, and repulse the only great opportunity which is presented? The League of Nations may be a vision and a dream, but humanity has caught the ray of hope which it offers for the settlement of international disputes by mediation and arbitration instead of by fire and sword, and no man or set of men will be able to permanently stifle the great idea.

In a world torn and bleeding from war, where only years can heal the gaping wounds, the United States of America stands as the towering figure of the time.

We have stepped out into the arena of the world's affairs, not as a conqueror with bloody, dripping sword, not as a tyrant flinging the weight of clanking chains at helpless and bewildered peoples, but as a strong and powerful friend seeking to stanch the bleeding wounds of the helpless and repair the wrecks of government which are strewn in the wake of battle fields.

Our motives may not always be properly appraised, and even those we desire to help may at times misjudge us, but if we always keep in mind an unselfish purpose, free from the lure of conquest and imperialism, we are sure to win their confidence in the end and remain for years to come the foremost Nation in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not think our Democratic friends were going to get so disturbed over what is going to happen on Thursday that they would begin their bombardment on Tuesday. This seems to be just the popping of the pickets, with the roll of the heavy artillery to come later; and then the passage of the peace resolution. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I am not a lawyer, least of all a constitutional lawyer—certainly not an international lawyer. I do not pretend to know all about the Constitution, but I have some ideas in regard to it, and one of these is that the fathers when they framed the Constitution did not establish an autocracy. [Applause on the Republican side.] I think they established a representative democracy, if that is the proper term, a Government of the people representative in its character—a Republic. The Chief Executive and those joined with him in the duty of negotiating peace having failed to agree on a treaty, certainly the fathers did not leave us powerless to declare. This House, representing the people, having declared that in the opinion of its Members a state of war existed, can now, as representing the people, announce the fact, known of all men, that the conditions of war no longer exist. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] says that we on the Republican side lack vision. I think not. Our vision, we think, projects itself as far into the future as his, but we seem to visualize different ideals. His ideal seems to be one in which the great Republic of the west, with its virile people, its wonderful wealth and limitless resources, shall become one of a considerable number of nations, large and small, bound by solemn obligation to become interested in every petty quarrel of any people anywhere on earth, placed under obligation to send its men and its money anywhere and everywhere from Arabia to Cape Horn, from Vladivostok to the Rhine, every time anyone anywhere has a difference of opinion with regard to the geographical boundaries of any one of the provinces, principalities, or nations of the world. Our opinion is that if we start on a policy of that sort, the power and prestige and glory of the Republic that now is the greatest and mightiest in all the world will dwarf and dwindle and diminish until from being the greatest, the mightiest, and best approved we will be the least esteemed and the most thoroughly hated people on the face of the globe. We on the Republican side have another vision and ideal. It is that of a Nation strong, mighty, independent, the master of its own fate and destiny, holding aloft the light of liberty, devoted to justice and righteousness, exerting an influence the world around that shall grow and multiply and become more and more powerful, not because we use our might in interference with the petty, trifling differences of any or all of the peoples of the earth, but rather because, free of entangling alliances or selfish ambition, we reserve to ourselves the right to judge when, where, and how our influence and power shall be exerted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to talk on the peace resolution or matters related thereto, and with these few remarks I desire to say a word or two with regard to the bill that is now before us. I want to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and his subcommittee and the full committee for the splendid example they have given to the committees and to the House on the way to bring in an appropriation bill. They have brought in a report of 12 pages, which enlightens one with regard to this measure and all it pertains to—12 pages within which one can find an answer to almost any question that would be likely to be asked with regard to pensions or to pensions and war allowances generally. It is a splendid piece of work. Of course it is just what we would expect from the gentleman from Illinois, who always does whatever he does excellently well. [Applause.]

One of my important duties at this particular juncture is from time to time to call attention to expenditures. I was not particularly startled by the figures on page 3 of this report, because I had conned the various items that make up that table more or less in view of our possible expenditures for the next fiscal year, but I had not realized that the sum total would be as great as is set out. The committee estimates that in the next fiscal year our expenditures on account of pensions, compensation allowances, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, vocational education for soldiers, and expenditures of that sort, will amount to $630,000,000. I do not see how the amount could be reduced, and I do not think it ought to be reduced, but it is a most striking commentary upon the cost of war and ought to be a solemn warning to the people of this Republic against placing themselves in a position where they are under obligation to engage in every little war and warlette that may occur anywhere on the face of the globe. Six hundred and thirty million dollars is two-thirds of what it cost to run the Government before we went into the European war, and this sum can not well be reduced in the immediate future to any considerable extent; eventually the day will come when it will be likely to expand rapidly. No man can say what its total shall be when the time comes, when we shall be called upon to give aid and comfort and support to the men who bore the standards of the Republic in the late war as they become old and dependent. We will meet them all cheerfully. We will meet all of the charges that may be made on the Treasury in this behalf with cheerfulness, but they should remind us of the price of war and the fearful drain that war is upon the resources of a people for a long period of time. We have already paid to the survivors of the Civil War in pensions a sum in excess of the total cost of the conflict, and we will pay many millions more to these men before they are gathered to their fathers.

Mr. Chairman, I made a statement yesterday, published in quite a good many papers, touching the financial situation. I made it because on Saturday a statement appeared in certain newspapers conveying the very misleading idea that in the month of March we had very greatly permanently reduced the public debt. I think the Treasury of the United States is under most excellent management. I only wish that some of the other departments of the Government were as well managed as the Treasury is and has been; but as I suggested in my statement of yesterday, the Treasury can not perform miracles, and while the Treasury did temporarily reduce the floating debt over $700,000,000 in March it will be called upon to sell certificates in April and in the merry month of May in a sum in excess of the amount by which the debt was temporarily reduced in March.

The statement in question is as follows:

Contrary to popular belief the peak of our war expenditures was not reached during the war but some months after the signing of the armistice and bequeathed us a deficit, or war overhang, not covered by bonds or provided for by current revenue of upward of two and one-half billions of dollars, which has been carried in short-time certificates running from three months to a year. Such an enormous volume of uncovered indebtedness would be a serious menace at any time. It is particularly so at a time when the country is trying to recover from the abnormal conditions of war.

The increasing gravity of the difficulties arising out of this enormous volume of indebtedness that must be renewed from time to time is indicated by the fact that while all of these certificates that were offered sold readily in the spring and summer of 1917, bearing an interest rate of 3 per cent, less than two hundred millions of a recent Treasury offering of certificates at 4½ per cent were sold and the Treasury will be in the market in the very near future for loans on short-time certificates at 4¾ per cent, with the probabilities that the rate will have to be still further advanced and may go to 6 per cent, or twice the interest rate of the certificates of three years ago.

During the month of March short-time obligations of the Government became due and were paid out of the first installment of the income and excess profit taxes, to an extent that brought a temporary reduction of over seven hundred millions in the outstanding deficit or temporary indebtedness; but, as above stated, the Treasury was immediately in the market for further loans and during the present month must dispose of a further large volume of temporary certificates.

It is very easy, indeed, for one to be misled in this matter of floating indebtedness by the amount outstanding at one date as compared to another, for, of course, these certificates must be paid when they become due. The date when they fall due is so timed as to make the payment possible out of revenue due at that time; but the very next day, week, or month may bring a tremendous increase through a further issue of short-time certificates in anticipation of revenues due at the time of their maturity.

The officials of the Treasury have handled a trying situation most admirably, but the Treasury can not perform miracles and the best management of the Treasury can not avert disaster unless we keep public expenditures within our income. A growing stringency in the money market reflected in increased interest rates rendered the handling of the enormous floating debt increasingly difficult. It must not be increased by a dollar or disaster threatens. On the contrary, we ought in the next fiscal year be able to reduce it somewhat; in fact, we must do that if we are to sustain the national credit.

I am now satisfied that we shall be able to reduce the estimates carried in the Book of Estimates a billion and a quarter, but this great reduction will not save us if we give way to the constant and continuous clamor for expenditures outside of the estimates for increased pay, for rivers and harbors, for new and unnecessary adventures in public expenditure, for excessive appropriations for our Military and Naval Establishments. All these must be kept within bounds or the floating debt will be increased to our peril.

We can not meet further expenditures through the issue of bonds. If anyone had any doubt on this subject, that doubt must have been settled upon hearing the statements recently made by the Secretary and Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and the president of the Federal Reserve Board before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. Further bond issues could only be floated at greatly increased interest rates, at the cost of a considerable reduction in the market value of outstanding Government securities, with the grave danger of wrecking the specie basis of our currency with the certainty of increasing the price of commodities and further enhancing the cost of living. Under these conditions a further bond issue is unthinkable.

Let me repeat in all earnestness and with all the emphasis at my command that we must not increase our floating debt or we shall invite disaster; that we must not issue bonds if we desire to keep on a specie basis and avoid a panic; that we must keep our total expenditure for the fiscal year that begins June 30 next well within our income. If we do not, we are inviting Treasury conditions which, acting upon the financial situation in the country, will bring nation-wide disaster.

We can not, we will not, reduce the public debt out of current revenues this fiscal year; however, we may come within a hundred million of breaking even, let us hope. But we do have the opportunity of keeping within our income in the next fiscal year, and we will accomplish it if we do not give way to extraordinary demands which are made here, there, and everywhere for an increase in payments out of the Public Treasury. [Applause.] One of the most insistent demands which has been made on us for a long time has been on behalf of increased pay for the officers of the Army and the Navy. I do not pretend to say that if we were not paying our officers too much at the outbreak of the war we are probably not paying them as much as we should now, but that is a matter which it seems to me we could best pass upon after we have demonstrated through the passage of our appropriation bills that we are able to keep our expenditures well within our income. If we can demonstrate that when we have passed the last appropriation bill some two or three weeks from now, we shall be in a position to cast up the account for the coming fiscal year and determine how far we can go in the increase of salaries and wages and compensation not only to the men of the fighting establishments but to those of the civil establishments, none of whom receiving more than $2,500 a year have had their Federal income increased since the war began. I do not claim there is not some argument for some increase in Army and Navy pay, but I do very much regret that the splendid men of the fighting forces of the country have been misled into commercializing their claim for increased pay. I hold in my hand a letter at the top of which appears the name Prudden, King & Prudden, incorporated, publishers' representatives, and the address and date, Chicago, March 22, 1920. The letter is addressed to a newspaper man in my State. After the salutation it goes on to say:

Mr. Matteson, chairman of the Western Council of American Association of Advertising Agencies, 140 North Dearborn Street, Chicago, has written them as follows—

Then a page and a half of argument, mostly very exaggerated argument, in favor of an increase of pay for the officers of the Army and the Navy, Public Health Service, and the Coast Guard. The last paragraph runs as follows:

The advertising agencies corporation, composed of 120 of the leading advertising agencies of America, believe it understands the grave situation very thoroughly—

And so forth.

The letter then proceeds to request the editor to whom it was addressed to use his editorial columns in advancing this cause, and advises him that they will be very glad, indeed, to furnish him material in defense of these increases of pay. Now, whatever may be said about the virtue and propriety of an increase of Army and Navy pay, there will be no difference of opinion as to the lack of either in the method thus pursued to secure it.

If the men of these services believe themselves entitled to more pay, they ought not to have commercialized their cause. After receiving a few letters of this sort from paid advertising agencies, gentlemen will better understand the editorials and letters that they receive from hither and yon in behalf of these increases.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the genleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield me five minutes additional?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDS. The page-and-a-half letter that the gentleman refers to in support of an increase of the pay of officers of the Army does not mention the fact, does it, that practically all the officers of the Army received increased compensation during the war by reason of the increase in rank?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no. The gentleman knows, because he has given this matter much study, that during the war practically all officers of the Regular Establishments, both military and naval, received compensation in excess of their compensation before the war by reason of the increased rank, overseas pay, and allowances.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes; and further, it does not call attention to the fact that practically all of them will receive increased rank under the Army reorganization bill which passed the House a few weeks ago.

Mr. MONDELL. No; this particular article does not give such information.

Mr. FIELDS. I have noticed that they always overlook that fact.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman has used the term "increased allowances." What does that amount to specifically?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know just what the increased allowances would amount to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What are those allowances?

Mr. MONDELL. There were some increased allowances during the war period; some of them have been extended by legislation from the committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished and worthy member.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That term "allowances" is used sometimes rather loosely.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, commutation of quarters is one of them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But these allowances vary entirely with the economic situation and——

Mr. MONDELL. I think that the provision for compensation of quarters is an increased allowance. However, the fact remains that during the war nearly every officer in the Regular Establishment had a considerable increase over his prewar pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I would like to have some opportunity to correct some things in which I think the gentleman is in error.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman insist that these men have not had increased rank and pay?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I insist that the construction the gentleman puts upon increased rank seems to resolve itself into more money than that term really will justify. The fact is, they did not get 20 per cent increase of pay abroad, but they got 10 per cent; and the fact is that they were living under conditions much more expensive than if they had been stationed at home.

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly; but the fact also remains that some officers in the Army received during the war practically double the pay they had before the declaration of war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will find, if he will look over the list of promotions, that that statement is not accurate.

Mr. MONDELL. That statement is, I think, entirely accurate with regard to some officers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does that justify not paying the others because a few got it?

Mr. MONDELL. They practically all got increased pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They did not all get it, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know of any officer in the Regular Establishment who was capable of duty, whose rank or compensation, or both, was not increased by reason of the war. And if there are any exceptions, they are so few they are not worth considering.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Take the increase of pay from second lieutenant to first lieutenant, for instance, and it is $300——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman can go into that question of increase in his time. I am sorry I have not the time. At any rate, I am not contending that the fact that the officers received increased pay during the war is an argument against considering their claims for increased pay now; it may be a reason for them to possess their souls in patience.

I am not saying now that Congress should not at the proper time consider the matter of increased pay for the officers of the Army and the Navy. I am trying to emphasize the fact that the first duty of this Congress is to see that the Government pays its bills out of its income. [Applause.] Now, that is their first duty. If we can demonstrate that we can do that, there will be no disposition on the part of the Congress to do injustice to any man anywhere in the Federal service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I yield one minute further to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. I still say that until quite recently most of these gentlemen were receiving very considerably more in pay and allowances of one sort and another than they were before the war. But that is past and gone, and the Congress will, I am sure, in due time be very glad to consider their reasonable requests for increase, but I do regret, in view of my very high regard for their services, that they have taken to the hiring of commercial agencies to advertise their requests and suggestions.

Mr. CROWTHER. I would like to ask the gentleman if the officers do not have an advantage in these times of the high cost of living in greater reduced rates in the purchase of the necessities of life?

Mr. MONDELL. They have opportunities for purchase at wholesale cost which, to a family of five or six persons, is probably worth at least $500 to $600 a year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, namely:

Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress, $214,000,000: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons, pensions, for services rendered within the fiscal year 1921, $20,000.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the gentleman does that I would like to have five minutes. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his motion?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, since the details of this bill have not been discussed any, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact, so that it may go into the RECORD, that in 1887 our pension appropriation was, in round numbers, $76,000,000; in 1897 it was $141,000,000; in 1909 it was $163,000,000, in round numbers; in 1914, in round numbers, it was $180,000,000; in 1917, counting the deficiency, it was $163,000,000. It had been reduced since 1914 from $180,000,000 to $163,000,000 in 1917. This present bill is, in round numbers, $214,000,000, and then it provides for $20,000 for administration. As the gentleman from Illinois this morning indicated, taking into consideration other appropriations we have made for increases, it runs it up, as I believe the gentleman said, to $297,000,000. That was the figure, I believe?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Around that sum. Something over $290,000,000. And, as he said, it is the biggest annual pension appropriation that Congress has ever proposed to pass.

There have been before the committee for some time several measures to take some of these pensioners off the pay roll. I have had a bill myself before the committee for some time to take from this pension roll every German citizen who has not lived in the United States for 25 years and is still on the pension rolls—German citizens who have given aid and encouragement against our flag. I have a bill here that would remove from the pay rolls every pensioner who does not live in the United States of America.

Are you not in favor of that kind of a measure? Are you not in favor of a person who is pensioned and kept alive by the money of this Government being required to live here and be a citizen of this country? If you are, why do you not insist upon my measure being passed? Otherwise, you will just keep on increasing this pension roll with that kind of cattle kept on the pension roll of this country—people who do not live in this country, who are enemies of this Government, and who gave aid and encouragement against our flag in time of war.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I was in error, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was in error, a short time ago in regard to the amount that he stated as the highest total of a pension bill. The largest appropriation that was ever made for pensions of all the wars was in 1919. The amount then was $223,000,000. That was the high-water mark.

Mr. BLANTON. But with the increases in the other bill, placed there by this House, if passed by the Senate, it will run it up to $290,000,000, will it not?

Mr. CANNON. To $291,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Then that is to be the biggest annual pension appropriation ever passed by this Congress?

Mr. CANNON. If it passes; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It undoubtedly will pass, and possibly it may be increased by the Senate. We must call a halt some time. I shall vote against this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion, that the committee rise and report the bill to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois renews his motion that the committee rise and report the bill without amendment to the House, with the recommendation that the bill be passed. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year 1921, had directed him to report the bill back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 2.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2807. An act to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos;

S. 2811. An act for the relief of the York County Savings Bank, of Biddeford, Me.;

S. 3187. An act to dispose of a certain strip of land in Waterville, Me.; and

S. 3610. An act for the relief of William S. Britton, formerly second lieutenant of Infantry, who has been erroneously dropped from the rolls of the United States Army.

MINORITY VIEWS ON PEACE RESOLUTION.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the report on House joint resolution 327 has just been filed. I ask unanimous consent to file the minority views to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to file the minority views on the peace resolution to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 7, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required to cover the estimated deficit in the operation of the waterway transportation systems under the War Department (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 7, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we give Thee thanks that Thou hast called us to the ministry of freedom; that Thou hast set us to stand guard over the rights of men; that Thou dost commission us to administer the affairs of a great Nation in the interest of justice and freedom and peace. We pray Thee to qualify us for this high office, and this day may we have Thy guidance in the performance of our duties. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., April 7, 1920.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JAMES E. WATSON, a Senator from the State of Indiana, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. WATSON thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Curtis	Henderson	Norris	Warren
Edge	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Watson
Elkins	Kellogg	Page
Fernald	Kendrick	Phipps
Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Sheppard

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was requested to state that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

I wish also to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague Mr. OVERMAN.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the list of absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KNOX, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. SWANSON answered to their names.

Mr. LENROOT, Mr. MOSES, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. NEW, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. LODGE, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. POMERENE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4082) to amend section 4878 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of March 3, 1897.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13416) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer:

S. 2807. An act to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos;

S. 2811. An act for the relief of the York County Savings Bank, of Biddeford, Me.;

S. 3187. An act to dispose of a certain strip of land in Waterville, Me.; and

S. 3610. An act for the relief of William S. Britton, formerly second lieutenant of Infantry, who has been erroneously dropped from the rolls of the United States Army.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Civic and Commercial Association of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the transfer of the United States Coast Guard from the Treasury Department to the Navy Department, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of Charles A. Learned Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation providing increased pay for the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard Service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of A. J. Babcock Camp, No. 20, United Spanish War Veterans, of Flint, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Sells bill, granting pensions to Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the American Association of Engineers, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the establishment of a department of public works, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the Kiwanis Club, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the repeal of certain provisions of the so-called Lever Act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the Louisa St. Clair Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Kenyon Americanization bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a memorial of the Board of Commerce of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the fuel-distribution order of the Director of Railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also (for Mr. NEWBERRY) presented a petition of the Board of Commerce of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the efficiency of the Patent Office, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. POMERENE presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from James T. Connell, on behalf of sundry citizens of Columbus, Ohio, and a petition of the Wolf Tone Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom, of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the recognition of the Irish Republic, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4195) for the relief of George A. Bihler (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4196) to provide relief to persons who owned wheat of the crop of 1917 before the announcement of the Food Administration price-fixing policy with respect thereto, and who sold such wheat after August 11, 1917; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. CAPPER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GAY submitted an amendment to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13416. An act making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BRIDGE ACROSS LAKE CHAMPLAIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3813) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain between the towns of Shoreham, Vt., and Ticonderoga, N. Y., which was, on page 1, line 6, to strike out "railroad."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792, the Army reorganization bill, and I ask that the Secretary continue the reading of the bill for amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the pending bill provides for a system of universal military training. If that plan shall be carried out, it contemplates educating to a limited extent all the youth of America for the duties of soldiers. It would be a kind of academic education; it would not be an education which would make our youths real soldiers. If we wish to increase our Army and to provide for a fighting force in the future, the proper and legitimate course to pursue is to provide that one-third of the Army of the United States shall be enlisted for a period of one year as volunteers, and then at the end of the year be discharged, and another set of men be enlisted for a year. In the course of five years in that way we would have a trained Army of 500,000 soldiers who had served one year in the Army of the United States and had performed all the duties of soldiers. Such a system would establish a fighting force in time of peace, and the men who would be thus trained would be trained in all the duties of soldiers. They would receive not merely an academic training and an acquaintance with the manual of arms, but they would be trained in all the duties that pertain to policing and taking charge of camps and to the martial work of the soldier. They would, in other words, perform the duties of soldiers.

If you give the youths of America one year's course in the Regular Army, they will make the very best soldiers, and by discharging them at the end of the year and enlisting another hundred thousand men the next year, and repeating that process for five or six years, we should have an Army of trained soldiers at very little expense to the Government that would meet all of our immediate necessities. If we had had an Army of 500,000 trained soldiers at the beginning of the recent war, whom we could have sent over to Europe following the declaration of war, we should have been in a much better position than we were.

A system that would compel the youth of America to go into camp every year and undergo a species of academic training, keeping them away from their work, it seems to me is rather contrary to the spirit of American institutions. It is not our object to become from the bottom up a military Nation. We do not desire to be a country such as Germany was before the Great War, such as France is to-day, and such as some of the other continental nations of Europe are, where the chief duty of a young man is to enter the army and remain in the army as a soldier for the best part of his young life.

What we need is a small, efficient fighting Army. Let us have a regular standing Army of 300,000 men, if you please, though I should be glad to have the number fixed at 400,000, and then let us provide for the only system of training which, it seems to me, would be of value in war, namely, the training that a soldier receives by actual service. Therefore I reiterate what I have already said, that if we want to build up an efficient trained Army ready for service at the least expense and with the most efficiency we should enlist 100,000 men every year for one year's service, make them perform all the duties of soldiers for one year, and then at the end of one year discharge them.

As a matter of historical knowledge, we have an illustration of the efficacy of that system in the experience of Prussia, following the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, in 1806, when the Prussian Army was utterly defeated and destroyed. Napoleon then compelled Prussia to enter into a treaty by the terms of which the Prussians were not to maintain an army of more than 100,000 men, I believe it was, though perhaps it may have been a little more. My recollection is, however, that it was 100,000 men. What did the Prussians do? They lived up to the technical requirements of that treaty with Napoleon; they maintained an army of only 100,000 men; but every six months they would discharge the 100,000 men and put in 100,000 recruits. So they kept on until 1814, prior to the great battle of Leipsic. When the collapse of Napoleon was brought about, Prussia had an army of over a half million trained soldiers whom they had secured under that very treaty in that way.

Despite the treaty, which did not allow the Germans to maintain an army of more than 100,000 men, they had secured that great army by the method of enlisting men up to a strength of 100,000, and after they had trained them as real, actual soldiers, not as college students, discharging them and putting in new men. As I have said, the result was that at the end of the period between 1806 and 1814 they had succeeded by that method in getting a trained army of over half a million soldiers. I think the exact number was 750,000 or 800,000 soldiers, who participated in the defeat of Napoleon at the great battle of Leipsic.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I simply wish to ask him whether that system was a system where the soldier who was to be trained was absorbed with the regular soldiers of the German Army? I did not hear the Senator's statement in regard to that.

Mr. NELSON. Yes. The Prussians were allowed to maintain a limited regular army of about 100,000 men. They were only allowed to maintain a regular army, a standing army, as it were, of that size under the treaty which was forced upon them after their defeat at the battles of Jena and Auerstadt.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How long was the period of training?

Mr. NELSON. My recollection is that the period of training—I can not be exact about it—was six months. Recruits were taken into the army and kept in the ranks and trained as a part of the regular army for six months, and at the end of that period they were discharged. Then the Prussians would enlist another set of men; and by pursuing that system, under the treaty which allowed them to have only 100,000 soldiers at one time, they had, when the final struggle occurred, over a half million well-trained soldiers—I think the number was 750,000 or 800,000—who joined with the allies in bringing about the fall of Napoleon in 1814.

It seems to me that, instead of having all our young men go into training camps and play soldier two or three months every year, the best way is to let the young men volunteer and go into the Army for one year, be real soldiers, receive all the training and perform all the duties and work that the private soldier has to perform, and then at the end of the year discharge them and enlist another hundred thousand, and repeat that operation until, as I have said, in the course of five or six years we would have half a million trained soldiers, real soldiers, not academic soldiers, not those who have been playing soldier around the campuses of colleges and universities.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator believes, however, that we should have for national defense a more adequate system of preparation than can be obtained through the medium of a small standing army, does he not?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly. If I had my way about it, I would provide, as is provided in this bill, for an Army, in round numbers, of about 300,000 men, 200,000 to be three-year men, as provided in the bill, and I would have 100,000 of them enlisted for the period of one year, to be discharged at the end of the year, and then enlist another 100,000 for a year and continue that operation year after year. In that way, as I have said, in five years we would have half a million well-trained soldiers, much better trained for service, much better trained for war, than men who are trained for a few months on college campuses.

This suggestion may seem to the officials of lofty intellect in the War Department and to some of our statesmen of equally lofty intellect as rather queer; they may call this a kind of a "hayseed military doctrine," if you please; but, after all, I have brooded over this question for a long time, and I can not see any virtue or benefit to be derived by the American people from the scheme of universal training proposed by the pending bill.

I have myself served as a soldier, and I have as high an opinion of the soldier in the United States Army as any man in this Chamber; yet, after all, I do not want to see the American people become a nation of soldiers; I do not want them to become infused with that military spirit which to-day is apparent in certain parts of the Old World. I want our people to go on as they have been going on and to live the lives they have lived in the past, at the same time making provision for an effective Army, able to take care of us in time of need, until it is necessary to increase the Army largely. If we sweep the youth of the country into the Army and give them the training provided in this bill, what will be the effect? I imagine the effect will be similar to that we have seen growing out of the war in Europe; they will receive an academic military training; they will see all the pomp and panoply of war, with none of its hardships; they will not even have to do police duty or anything of that kind; they will see the fine side of war, and only a little of that. Then, after they have undergone such military training they will be like a good many young men of whom I have heard who have had college or higher educations, who come back home and say, "I have too much education; I am not good for the work on the farm; I am not good for the shop; I have to get to some soft and easy place in order that my knowledge and education may find proper vent and expression." If we embark upon this pretentious scheme of universal military training, we will lessen our rural population and the population of the small towns, and we will discourage the spirit of work, the spirit of industry that characterizes our people, and they will become infused with a war spirit and think that they ought to have something better than the drudgery of the farm or drudgery of the village shop.

Mr. President, I shall take no more time to discuss that aspect of the pending measure. I wish, however, to direct the attention of the Senate to another feature of the bill which strikes me as showing the top-heaviness of the structure proposed to be erected. Section 36 provides for a transportation service. The section reads:

> There is hereby established a transportation service which, under regulations to be established by the President and in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall have the duty of transporting the personnel, matériel, and supplies of the Army of the United States by rail, water, motor, and animal transport—

And so forth.

It is all right to establish that branch of the service. It is at present under the Quartermaster Department. I have no objection to its establishment as a separate service, but here is the paragraph that strikes me as startling:

> The permanent personnel of the transportation service shall consist of one chief of transportation, with the rank of brigadier general, and 750 officers, in grades from second lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, and 12,500 enlisted men.

Now, just think of that force! That was probably the force that was needed during the Great War in Europe; but with the small Army that we expect to have now, in time of peace, when we have only to transport troops back and forth within the borders of the United States, and occasionally send some troops to the Philippine Islands, a few marines to Santo Domingo, and some to the Panama Canal Zone, it is inconceivable to me that for these limited purposes for such a small Army as we are about to have we shall have occasion to use such an elaborate board of transportation—750 officers, under the head of a brigadier general, and 12,000 enlisted men in this service—to carry on the transportation of our little Army here by land and water in time of peace!

There are some other features of the bill that are akin to this. The bill is top-heavy. It makes provision for a lot of officers, unnecessarily so. I think it is important that we should maintain what I call a skeleton service—a service, for instance, in the transportation system that would easily expand and grow in time of war; but to maintain such an enormous service in time of peace for the transportation of this Army strikes me as a piece of utter extravagance that we ought to avoid.

I am not unfriendly to the Regular Army of the United States. I should be very glad to see that Army composed of 400,000 men instead of 300,000; but I do not want to make the Army what I call too top-heavy. I do not want to have such a large body of officers drawing big salaries and entailing a big expense on the Government. I am utterly opposed to that in time of peace. We want to maintain a framework in all these branches that can be readily expanded in time of emergency; but we do not want to keep a body of men as large as that—12,500 enlisted men and 750 officers; think of that!—for the transportation service of our Army by sea and land.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, can the Senator advise us how many officers and enlisted men were employed in connection with the transportation service during the late war?

Mr. NELSON. I can only do so indirectly. I presume we have all been lobbied more or less on this bill. I have been lobbied a little bit myself, and a gentleman called on me yesterday or the day before about this very matter. I said to him: "I do not object to having a transportation corps established as an independent branch outside of the Quartermaster Department, but I can not see any occasion for such an immense force in it." "Why," he said, "that is what they have now in the Quartermaster Department, and it is not increasing the force. It is just turning them over to this new bureau or new division"; and I take it that this is practically the force that they maintained during the war, or a large part of it. I am not prepared to say just what they did. You know they had a lot of these dollar-a-year men.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. NELSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They had a force ten times as large as this during the war.

Mr. NELSON. They were mostly civilians that were appointed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; they were soldiers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to say that we had a force ten times as large as this during the war?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; in the transportation service. That is only 120,000 men.

Mr. NELSON. Take the percentage, now, that the transportation service would absorb. If you count the aggregate of our Army as 300,000 men, you can see what a percentage of that little Army would be absorbed in this transportation corps. Then, if you take the other services—and I will not weary the patience of the Senate with them at this time—there are other branches, new branches, established in this bill that are of the same character and the same kind of extravagance in relation to expense.

All of us who are conversant with the matter know that our Army, in proportion to its numbers, is the most expensive Army in the entire world. There is no other army, in proportion to its numbers in men and officers, that is as expensive and costly as the Army of the United States.

With the exception of the higher officers, the pay of the officers in foreign armies is much less. The pay of the men, as you all know, is a mere nominal sum, except in Great Britain and her colonies. I do not know what the pay of the English Army is to be in the future. The old pay of the British soldier was a shilling a day, a little less than 25 cents. I believe during the war their pay was doubled, so that they got twice that, or 2 shillings a day. I am not sure about that. The Canadians got about the same pay that our soldiers got during the war, and the Australians got a little more. I think the Australians got paid at the rate of a dollar and a half a day, while our men got at the rate of about a dollar a day, in round numbers. As I said, we have the most expensive army in the world, and it is because our scale of pay, both for enlisted men and officers, with the exception of the higher grades of officers, is higher than in any other army.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been very greatly interested in what the Senator is saying, and I indorse it all. I want to call his attention to the particulars as to the increased expense by separating these services as proposed in this bill:

Elimination from personnel as prescribed for the four separate activities under S. 3792—

The one which we are now considering—	Annual saving.
1 brigadier general	$6,000
395 other officers	1,185,000
8,400 enlisted men	12,663,084
Total annual saving of officers and enlisted men	13,854,084
Reduction in civilian personnel made possible by consolidation:
Administrative offices in Washington (5,195 clerks, etc.)	7,792,500
Outside of Washington (7,734)	11,601,000
Total annual saving in civilian personnel	19,393,500
Aggregate annual saving	33,247,584

That is what it will mean if these various services are consolidated as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota, as I understand.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am not finding fault with their distributing the work as they have done in the matter of the transportation service. I think separating it from the Quartermaster Department is wise and wholesome. What I object to is providing such an immense force in that service in time of peace for such a limited Army.

There are one or two matters that make me think that this is a good deal of an officer's bill.

The bill provides, among other things, for warrant officers, who are to be appointed by the President, and to have the rank and pay of second lieutenants, but they are not to have the benefit of promotion. No matter how able or intelligent a warrant officer may be, no matter how good an officer he might make, he has no show of promotion. He is put in a class by himself, with no chance to get any higher. You might almost put a label over his forehead like the inscription over the door of Dante's hell:

All hope abandon, ye who enter here.

No one may hope to get any higher in rank if he is a warrant officer.

Here is a matter which shows how one-sided the bill is in another respect.

Under the system that prevailed before the war a soldier who during his course of service had become efficient, and had become a corporal or a sergeant or a first sergeant or a quartermaster sergeant, and had served his time out and had been discharged and wanted to reenlist, had to reenlist as a private. He could not enlist in the rank that he had when he was discharged from the service. The result of that was that a man who had served his period of three years or four years, and was discharged as a sergeant, if he wanted to reenlist could not reenlist as a sergeant, no matter how good his record might be; but he would have to reenlist as a private, and then he would be at the mercy of the colonel of the regiment as to whether he would be put back into the rank of a sergeant, or above that rank, or not.

Mr. President, I succeeded in having an amendment put into the bill which we passed June 3, 1916, an act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes, which was modified a little, but which the military authorities at that time acquiesced in. It reads:

Provided further, That any noncommissioned officer discharged with an excellent character shall be permitted, at the expiration of three years in the active service, to reenlist in the organization from which discharged with the rank and grade held by him at the time of his discharge, if he reenlists within 20 days after the date of such discharge.

I do not find that provision in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What section is that?

Mr. NELSON. That is on page 23, section 27.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is left undisturbed by this bill. That still remains law. Section 27 is not repealed.

Mr. NELSON. I am thankful that is left in that way; but it should be amended. As the law stood then, we had only noncommissioned officers, sergeants, and corporals—sergeants of various classes. It was applied to them. But by this bill you make a new class of noncommissioned officers whom you call warrant officers. They are to be appointed by the President, and they are to have the rank and pay of second lieutenants, but they are not in line of promotion. They are back numbers, as it were, not allowed to become officers because of their service as warrant officers.

The bill ought to be amended so as to cover these warrant officers. If they have been appointed and have served as warrant officers, they should have the scant privilege of coming in again at the rank borne at the time of discharge.

Mr. President, I have taken up more of the time of the Senate than I intended to take. When I rose I simply wanted to say a few words about the matter of universal military training. I merely wish to say in conclusion that in my opposition to this scheme of universal military training I am not actuated by that gospel or principle which some of the so-called pacifists have. I do not want our country to be helpless in time of war; I want it in time of peace, as far as possible, to be prepared for war. But I want that preparation to be in effective and legitimate channels. We should make provision for a limited number of trained men who can be called out whenever needed, and I do not believe the way to accomplish that is by trying to make all our young men in the country college-campus soldiers, giving them a mere academic training.

I am opposed to that, in the first place, because it takes in all the youth of our country, and I do not want them all infused with the military spirit. In the next place, I am opposed to it because it takes the young men away from their other duties and imbues them with a spirit that is opposed to the hard work and drudgery of life. It takes them away from the ordinary vocations of life and begets in them a spirit contrary to the spirit of our institutions, a spirit that would make our country a military country like the nations of the Old World. I do not want America to become as Germany was before the war, nor do I want it to be in the condition in which France is to-day. I want a good little Regular Army, with a skeleton force of officers which can expand when the occasion arises, and I want a few hundred thousand trained soldiers whom we can get in the course of five years in the manner I have indicated. If we pursue that course and take that step, we will not only save the country a great deal of money but we will avoid many of the distressing incidents that would occur under this scheme and system of universal military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I merely want to make some observations concerning the transportation service and the warrant officers, to whom the Senator from Minnesota has referred.

As the Senator from Minnesota said, the transportation service is made a separate service in this bill, and there are assigned to it 750 officers and 12,500 enlisted men. I want to call the attention of the Senate, however, and especially of the Senator from Minnesota, to the fact that the bill also provides that the President may reduce the number of officers and men in any branch of the service in the Army to the extent of 20 per cent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The war is now over, and while during the war we were disposed, I as much as anybody, to put all the power in the hands of the President or other executive officer, I do not believe in carrying on that principle now in time of peace, leaving it optional with the President. The President, in the very nature of the case, would follow the recommendations of the Chief of Staff through the Secretary of War. I insist that we should abandon the system of putting everything into the hands of the President which we followed as a necessity during the war. I went to as extreme a length in that case as anyone in this Chamber, but I want now to take a back track and not leave it to the option of any executive officer to say whether our Army should be large or small, whether the corps of officers should be large or small. I want that to be fixed by law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I fear the Senator misinterprets what I have said or misinterprets the language of the bill. The President can not change the size of the Army above a certain maximum fixed in the bill. The limit is rigidly fixed. The Army can be made no larger than that number. Then that army is divided into its appropriate tactical units and services, and the bill sets forth in those services and combatant branches the standard number of officers and men to be in each service or combatant branch.

It is utterly impossible for Congress to say that the Infantry, for example, shall be a fixed number, no more and no less, and to do it intelligently. As tactics change and weapons are invented and weapons discarded, the tactical organization of an army changes, and it must change to keep up to date. All we allow the President to do is to increase or decrease the number of men in a service or a combatant branch within the maximum limits fixed by the bill for the whole Army. We provide, for instance, that he can increase the number of infantrymen allotted in the bill, but to do so he must take those men from some other branches of the service. He may decrease the number of men assigned to a service or a combatant branch in order to assign them to some other service that in the meantime experience shows needs a few more men.

We grant to the Commander in Chief and the soldiers at the head of the Army, who are supposed to know best how an army should be balanced in all its parts, the privilege of arranging it in its most effective form. The cost to the Government will be no larger. The maximum can not be increased. Congress still holds the purse strings, and we simply permit the Army of the United States to keep up to date; that is all.

I call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to that fact because should it turn out in the future that the transportation service does not need 12,500 men and that another service needs some of those men more than the transportation service does, men may be transferred.

As to the number, 12,500, let me remind the Senator from Minnesota that this service not only is to take care of the transport service and the railway service, whenever our Army does indulge in railway service, but the Motor Transport Service, and with our Army of 236,000 enlisted men, as it is to-day, there are 12,000 men in the Motor Transport Service alone, to say nothing of an Army Transport Corps plying the seas.

Mr. NELSON. What are all those motor transports used for?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For transporting material, transporting goods. They do all the motor-truck service of the Army. Every cantonment you go to, whenever anything is to be transported from the railway into the camp or about the great cantonments, it is the motor transport which carries the goods. There are 12,000 men in the Motor Transport Service alone to-day. The bill combines the Motor Transport Service with the railway service, the seagoing transport service, and the animal-drawn transport service.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator explain why those 12,000 men, even assuming that number to be necessary, require 750 officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not only those 12,000 men who require officers. All the wagon trains are under this transportation service, and all the motor-truck trains for the entire Army, if it moves into the field.

Mr. NELSON. In the days of the Civil War we had wagon masters and train masters, and we did not give them commissions in those days; we did not make them officers. We had plain wagon masters, plain men, enlisted men, who did that duty. Is it contemplated that these wagon masters and train masters shall be commissioned officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have not had civilian wagon masters for years in the Army. That was given up several years ago and civilian teamsters were given up several years ago, because the Army found it impossible to impose discipline upon civilians in time of peace in the service of the Army.

Mr. NELSON. But were the wagon masters commissioned officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were not.

Mr. NELSON. Would you have them commissioned officers now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I certainly would. I would have every man exerting authority in the Army armed with a commission. Otherwise you have no military discipline. Soldiers will not obey civilians. There is no way by which they can be made to obey them.

Mr. NELSON. According to that theory you would not have discipline in the Army among the privates unless you gave them commissions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. I did not say that. You would not have discipline among the privates of the Army if they were commanded by civilians. The Senator knows that. You must have officers in command, otherwise you can not invoke the Articles of War or impose any discipline whatsoever.

This number, 12,500, for the entire transportation activities of the Army, is less than the Army has to-day in the same service. It is a cut-down rather than an expansion. I remind the Senator from Minnesota that in this last war, and, in fact, in all modern armies, the entire transportation of an army becomes a purely military problem, and the impedimenta of a modern army is something enormous. The consumption of ammunition per man, I venture to say, is fifty times as large as it was in the days of the Civil War. It is astounding to contemplate the hundreds and thousands of tons of material that has to be brought up to an army from the rear in these days. This percentage of 12,000 men engaged in the tremendous service of transportation for an army of 280,000 men is not excessive. In fact, it is a smaller percentage, let me say to the Senator, of men allotted to transport service than was the rule in our Army in France during the war.

Mr. NELSON. In the "piping times of peace," which we hope to have in the near future, the Senator does not anticipate that we shall have to handle all the enormous amount of ammunition to which he refers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I did not say that; but we have cut this down away below the figures of the war in percentage. Twelve thousand five hundred men, as a matter of fact, I do not think will be able to take care of it in time of peace. I am inclined to believe that the number, by transfers from other services and branches, as experience is gained, will be increased rather than decreased.

Now, as to the warrant officers, Mr. President, I have every sympathy, as the Senator from Minnesota has, with the noncommissioned officers of the Army. Our provision for warrant officers was put in very largely at the earnest request of the old noncommissioned officers of the Army.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator excuse me for interrupting him further? It is very kind of him to allow me to interrupt him, and perhaps I am overdoing it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. I am very glad to find in the bill the provision for warrant officers. It is a good provision as far as it goes. But the objectionable feature of it is that it cuts off a warrant officer from being in line of promotion. I think the warrant officers should come next after second lieutenants in their order, and they should have a chance, if fit and able to pass the examination, to become commissioned officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not sure that the Senator understands what we mean by the language "warrant officers shall not be in line of promotion to higher commissioned grades." It does not mean that a warrant officer may not be commissioned in a higher grade.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But as a warrant officer he would not be entitled to automatic promotion by seniority into the grade of second lieutenant. That is all it means.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will excuse me again, I understand it as he does, and that is that it does not prevent the Government from appointing a warrant officer as a commissioned officer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly not.

Mr. NELSON. But what I mean is that the warrant officers should be in line of promotion for a commission as second lieutenant next after the second lieutenants. I would not have them ahead of the second lieutenants, but I would leave an opening for those men so that they could become full commissioned officers provided they pass the necessary examination.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble with that is that by the time the enlisted man can reach the grade of warrant officer he is too old to be a second lieutenant. This provision is for the very purpose of giving better treatment to veteran noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army, the old sergeants and quartermaster sergeants, and men of that high grade and type. The provision is for the very purpose of taking better care of them and giving them a better status. An enlisted man, having served 25 years in the Regular service and reached the grade of top sergeant, has reached the age, probably, of 50 years. He can not become a second lieutenant because the average age of second lieutenants in the Army is only about 27 or 28. It would be an anomalous position to provide an automatic promotion from those grades, because those men are so old that they can not fit in with what are known in the Army as the "shavetails," who have just come out of West Point.

Many hundreds of splendid Regular Army noncommissioned officers went into the war and their services were so valuable and their experience so great that the War Department needed them especially in some of the supply services, where they were familiar with the paper work and the business methods of the Army, and many of them were commissioned as captains and majors and lieutenant colonels as emergency officers. When they were commissioned as captains and majors and lieutenant colonels as emergency officers, of course they were discharged from their grade as sergeants in the Regular Army.

When their emergency commissions expired at the expiration of the war, those men who had spent 25 or 30 years in the service were then thrown out into the cold world. They could not reenlist in the Army because they were too old; they were above the age limit. They can not be reenlisted in their old grade, because there is no provision for that, and in addition to that their old places had been filled. But we can take care of those men by bringing them back into the service as warrant officers and giving them the pay and allowances of second lieutenants. That is the reason for section 13 of the bill. It is done to help the very men the Senator from Minnesota wants to help, and he and I are in entire sympathy about it.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, I want to say that while it fits that class of men, yet I take it there will be a lot of others who do not come within that service or age limit which the Senator mentions, who can also become warrant officers. It is not necessarily limited to the class of men the Senator describes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, let the reading of the bill be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair). The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 11, on page 51.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before the reading proceeds further I should like to offer two amendments on behalf of the committee. On page 50, line 4, after the word "officers," I move to insert the words "or as noncommissioned officers." That is a very apparent omission in the framing of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, on the same page, line 14, before the word "months," I move to strike out the word "six" and to insert "three."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 55, line 12, after the word "classified," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That no officer shall be classified below Class A solely because of recent appointment or short service in his grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 13, on page 57.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On page 57, line 13, after the word "examination," I propose to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 57, line 13, after the word "examination," it is proposed to insert "and except also those governing the examination of officers of the Medical, Dental, and Veterinary Corps."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been found that the laws now upon the statute books governing the examination for admission of officers to these corps are entirely satisfactory, and we do not intend to repeal them, as the language if not amended would do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, while we are on the promotion provisions of the bill, I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question. There are a great many instances with which the Senator, of course, is familiar, and which we have discussed here, where certain officers who served abroad have been demoted, while certain officers who served in this country have retained their higher rank. Many such cases involving very gross injustice have been cited. Does this bill in any way take care of that situation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the bill is not retroactive in any sense.

Mr. HARRISON. Will those cases be remedied, so far as the Senator knows, if he has any information from the General Staff about that, before this bill begins to be operative?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My information is that the number of Regular officers who are now holding temporary advanced rank—in other words, officers who have not yet been demoted—is about 25 per cent, perhaps only 23 per cent. The great majority of officers who held advanced rank have been demoted; others are being demoted from time to time, and the expectation is that by July 1 they will all be demoted. The trouble to which the Senator refers was due to the fact that the War Department failed to work out a scheme by which the process of demotion could be carried out in such a way as to be absolutely fair to all of the officers.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The early demotions were arbitrary, or at least they seemed arbitrary to some of the officers in the service.

Mr. HARRISON. And to the public generally, I think.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Some were demoted and some were not. It left some seniors serving under their juniors and created a situation which was very trying and very embarrassing and which injured the morale of the service. I think, however, most of it has passed away by this time.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that recently the department has made certain changes. Suppose this bill should become a law, say, by the end of next month, in May some time, and certain officers are not demoted from their temporary rank before the 1st of July, is there anything in the bill that would retain such officers at their advanced rank?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nothing at all.

Mr. HARRISON. It would not affect the situation in the slightest?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not in the slightest.

Mr. HARRISON. So the demotions will continue irrespective of the passage of this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They will.

Mr. HARRISON. So that in the end there will be no partiality or discrimination shown, although there has been heretofore?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There can not be after this bill shall have passed.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 60, line 14, after the word "scientific," to insert the words "sanitary, hygienic," and in the same line, before the word "technical," to strike out the word "and," so as to read:

To the extent provided for from time to time by specific appropriation, persons specially qualified in educational, scientific, sanitary, hygienic, professional, technical matters, including transportation, production, and finance, may be appointed by the President alone, under such regulations as may be prescribed, to cooperate with and assist the General Staff or one or more of the services.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 46, page 61, line 16, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That in case of an officer of the permanent personnel such active service shall be considered as commencing on the date of rank stated in the commission which he then holds: Provided further.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, section 46 is a section which is to correct a situation created by the one hundred and nineteenth article of war. The matter is a rather technical one to express in proper language, and the committee finds since it drafted this language, including the proviso which is recommended to be stricken out, that another draft is necessary. I therefore request now that section 46 be stricken entirely out of the bill and that a new section, which I send to the desk, be substituted. I may say to the Senate that the purpose of the act will not be changed in the slightest degree, but the new section will accomplish the desired purpose without leaving any doubt whatsoever as to the intention.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 61, in section 46, after the section number and after the title "Relative rank of officers," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section and to insert the following words:

Unless special assignment is made by the President under the provisions of the one hundred and nineteenth article of war, all officers of the active service of the United States in any grade shall take rank according to the date which, in the case of an officer of the permanent personnel, is that stated in his commission or letter of appointment, and, in the case of a reserve officer, shall precede that on which he is placed on active duty by a period equal to the total length of active service which he may have performed in the grade in which called or any higher grade. When the dates of rank are the same, precedence shall be determined by the length of active commissioned service in the Army. When length of such service is the same, officers of the permanent personnel shall take rank among themselves according to their places on the promotion list, preceding reserve officers of the same date of rank and length of service who shall take rank among themselves according to age.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 63, line 14, after the word "officer," to insert "serving in a grade below that of brigadier general, and," so as to read:

SEC. 49. Limitation on detached service.—Unless the President declares that an emergency exists which requires otherwise, no officer serving in a grade below that of brigadier general and assigned to a combatant arm shall be detached or remain detached from troops of the combatant arms for duty in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, for a period of more than three months, unless in the preceding seven years he shall have actually served two years on duty with a troop, company, battery, battalion, squadron, regiment, brigade, division, army corps, army, or other corresponding organizations, or with the training force.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is an obvious omission on line 14. After the word "officers," I move to insert the words "of the permanent personnel," so that it will read:

Not to exceed 2 per cent of the commissioned officers of the permanent personnel of the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 64, line 14, after the word "officers," it is proposed to insert "of the permanent personnel."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 65, line 13, after the word "time," to insert "not exceeding 10 days," so as to read:

SEC. 51. Military training.—All male citizens of the United States (excluding residents of Alaska and the insular possessions) and all male persons who reside therein and who have declared their intention to become citizens, other than persons excepted by this act, shall, upon attaining the age of 18 years, or within 3 years thereafter, be subject to military or naval training, and shall be inducted into the Army or Navy of the United States for this purpose alone, and shall be subject to training therein for a period of 4 months and for such further time, not exceeding 10 days, as may be reasonably necessary for enrollment, mobilization, and demobilization—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 2, after the words "Provided further, That," to strike out "where climatic conditions permit and where it is otherwise practicable," so as to read:

Provided further, That there shall be two periods of training in each calendar year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the amendment which was just adopted would not necessitate a reconsideration of the vote taken in order to strike out this provision, would it? I did not listen to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think no one in the Senate, whether he is for universal military training or against it, would object to these amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. What I meant was, would it necessitate a reconsideration of the vote? I ask the question because, as I understand, the motion will be to strike out all of the provision with reference to military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then a motion certainly will be in order to strike out the whole section. These are minor amendments inside the section, to which, incidentally, I invite the attention of the Senator from Kansas. It is very inspiring that section 51 of the bill, providing for universal military training, is being listened to by five Senators.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in that connection I desire to say that it is a very remarkable thing that, although we are considering now a bill that it is estimated will carry appropriations, if it is passed, of not less than $600,000,000—it depends upon how it is estimated—and perhaps not more than a billion and a half, there have not been more than half a dozen Senators here at any time.

I do not know what the American people are going to say to this kind of legislation. I think it is a very erroneous way to legislate. I think it is very unfortunate for the people of America that this situation exists in the United States Senate. The lowest amount which will be carried by this bill, in my judgment, even if we strike out universal military training, is somewhere in the neighborhood of $800,000,000. Eight hundred million dollars of taxes must be paid by the American people on account of this bill, and yet I do not suppose there has been an average of half a dozen Senators in the Chamber at any time during its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 66, line 9, after the word "periods," to strike out "when two are provided within a reasonable distance of their places of residence," so as to read:

To such extent as may be consistent with effective training and economical administration and subject to regulations prescribed by the President, persons liable to training shall be permitted to elect such training in either of two training periods.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in the sentence immediately following this amendment, I move to strike out "1921" and insert "1922."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 12, page 66, it is proposed to strike out "1921" and in lieu thereof to insert "1922," so as to read:

The military training herein provided for shall become effective in the calendar year beginning January 1, 1922.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in that connection, may I make just a brief statement?

When the preparation of this bill commenced we were in the year 1919; in fact, it was last August. It has now become so late in the year 1920, comparatively—certainly in the fiscal year—that my opinion is that there would not be opportunity for the War Department to prepare the plans for the activities provided for in this bill by January 1, 1921. The reorganization of the so-called Regular Army, or permanent personnel, as it is called in this bill, is so thorough and comprehensive that my judgment is that it will require an entire year for the permanent personnel to get itself shaken into shape under the new order of things. That being the case, I deem it the part of wisdom to give the War Department an entire year to get itself shaped up for the work that is ahead of it under the terms of this bill; and that is my reason for offering the amendment to the effect that the military training herein provided for shall become effective on January 1, 1922, instead of January 1, 1921. I believe it would be a physical impossibility for the War Department to meet the terms of the bill in a shorter period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we are now on section 51, the section providing for military training; and, as the chairman of the committee knows, I have an amendment striking out various sections. I understand that the bill is being read at this time merely for committee amendments, and that this is not the proper time to offer that amendment. I do not want to be precluded from offering the amendment at the proper time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator can not be precluded.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have a very few observations that I should like to make on the question of universal military training, and I do not know but that now would be the best time, if it is as convenient for the chairman of the committee as any other time. If not, I will make it at his convenience.

Mr. President, I have given what consideration I have had the time to give to this important question of universal military service. Giving due weight to the merits of the proposal, I find myself at this time unable to support that part of the bill now before us. While the whole world is longing for peace, and, as an incident, the disarmament of all the great nations, it does not seem to me that we, the leading people in advocacy of peace, should at this time alarm the world by making preparations for the greatest Army ever seen in all the annals of time.

The unfortunate defeat of the peace treaty has left the world in chaos, but it has not killed the universal desire and purpose of the civilized world to obtain some early agreement among themselves, some way whereby senseless, bloody, and inhuman wars shall no longer run riot on the earth. Pending this, I think it would be unwise for us to present to the world the picture of compulsory universal military training of our people.

At this particular time every farm in the land is short of the labor necessary to the full production of the products upon which the starving world must subsist. What might be wise two or three years from now may be very unwise at this particular juncture. The world must get its bearings before we take this extreme course. There is no present danger in our surroundings. We now have over 4,000,000 of well-trained and the best soldiers in the world, fully equipped and ready to answer their country's call on any threat of danger. We are laboring now under an inconceivable burden of taxes and debt. It staggers the imagination of man by its awful magnitude. Twenty-five billions of dollars is our present indebtedness. This, with interest, has to be paid from the pockets of the people, extorted by taxation, and we must reduce this debt before assuming a further enlargement of it by somewhere between $1,000,000,000 and $2,000,000,000 a year.

As I said before, I am unwilling at this particular time to put this enormous additional tax on the already complaining people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 15, page 67.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 7, after the word "law" to strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, on page 70, lines 6 and 7, to strike out the words "That this exception shall not be applicable when suitable provision is made by law for the support of such dependents;" and to insert the following:

That in case any person called for the training shall have dependents within the meaning of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," there shall be paid to such dependents, during the period of training, the amount provided by said law, without requiring any allotment from the recruit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 19, page 71, the end of section 19.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are three minor amendments, corrective in their character, which I want to offer to this section. On line 11, page 71, I move to strike out the words "they may elect" and to insert the words "provided in this act"; on line 15, after the word "military," to insert the words "or naval"; and on line 17, after the word "parents," to strike out the word "and" and insert the word "or," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 56. Registration of persons liable for military training.—In order to carry out the provision of this act relative to military training, all male citizens, and all male residents of the United States (except Alaska and the insular possessions), after attaining the age of 17 years, shall be required to register with such local or other board as may be prescribed by regulation, on such day or days as may be prescribed by the President by proclamation or other public notice, to the end that they may be called for training as soon as practicable after attaining the age of 18 years, or within such deferred period, not exceeding three years, as provided in this act. Any person so registering who may require preparatory education under section 53 of this act may be required to receive it at any time after registration. Any person so registering, who is subject to or eligible for military or naval training under this act, and who is physically qualified therefor, may, with his consent and that of his parents or guardians, be inducted into the service for training at any time after registration and before attaining the age of 18 years.

The amendments were agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 3, page 73.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish to offer another corrective amendment. I move, on page 72, line 21, after the word "act" to insert the words "unless he shall voluntarily enlist in the permanent personnel," so as to read:

Each reservist who has completed the prescribed training under the provisions of this act, unless he shall voluntarily enlist in the permanent personnel, shall be assigned to an organization of the National Guard of the United States or of the organized reserves established for the locality in which he lives. Under regulations to be prescribed by the President, any reservist may, upon change of residence, be transferred to the appropriate organization of the National Guard of the United States, or the organized reserves established for the locality of his new residence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, in section 58, on page 74, line 12, after the word "reserves" to insert the words "from year to year," so as to make the paragraph read:

Reservists assigned under the provisions of this section to the organized reserves shall continue therein for a period of five years, when they shall be transferred to the unorganized reserves. While assigned to the organized reserve, reservists shall be subject to mobilization and additional training for two annual periods of not to exceed two weeks each during their membership therein: Provided, That any reservist assigned to the organized reserves and desiring to qualify as a noncommissioned officer, or as an officer, may, with his consent, be required to receive such additional training as may be prescribed by regulation, and with his consent, may be continued in the organized reserves, from year to year, for a period of 10 years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 15, page 75, at the end of section 60.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding as to the meaning of the phrase "Army of the United States," as used in this section, I move to strike out the words "Army of the United States" and insert the words "Regular Army, National Guard, National Army."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 75, line 7, strike out the words "Army of the United States" and insert the words "Regular Army, National Guard, National Army," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 60. Enlistment and enrollment of veterans.—Until the system of military training herein provided for becomes effective and in order to permit the organization of the organized reserves and the reorganization of the National Guard as the National Guard of the United States without delay, the President is hereby authorized to provide by regulation for the voluntary enlistment in the National Guard of the United States, or enrollment in the organized reserves, of all male persons who honorably served in the Regular Army, National Guard, National Army, or Marine Corps at any time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, for a period of one year: Provided, That such persons may voluntarily reenlist or reenroll for like periods: Provided further, That any person enlisting in the National Guard of the United States or enrolling in the organized reserves under this section shall be entitled to an honorable discharge therefrom at any time within 90 days after making application therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 24, page 78.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to give notice that at a later time, and I hope it will not be very long from now, I shall offer a substitute to take the place of the language in the bill from line 5 to line 16, inclusive, on page 78. The form of the oath for soldiers of the National Guard needs revision, and the committee would like to have a further opportunity to look into it.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 18, page 79.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have some corrective amendments to offer to make the language a little clearer. I ask that they may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The READING CLERK. On page 79, line 16, after the words "command of," strike out the word "troops" and insert the words "any organization"; on line 17, after the words "United States," strike out the word "in" and insert the words "entirely comprised within the limits of"; on line 18, after the word "thereof," add a new paragraph, so that the section will read:

SEC. 64. Officers of the National Guard of the United States: The Secretary of War may detail or assign officers of the permanent personnel to duty with the National Guard of the United States according to the requirements of the service, and, in time of peace, shall assign officers of the reserve personnel, with their consent, to duty with organizations of the National Guard of the United States in each State or Territory upon the recommendation of the governor of the State or Territory concerned, and upon the grant to such officers of State or Territorial commissions in their respective grades by the governor of such State or Territory. In the District of Columbia such officers shall be assigned upon the recommendation of the commanding general of the National Guard of the United States in said District: Provided, That no officer of the permanent personnel shall be assigned to the command of any organization of the National Guard of the United States entirely comprised within the limits of any State except with the approval of the governor thereof.

The commanding officers and staffs of organizations of the National Guard of the United States composed of troops from two or more States shall be assigned from the permanent or reserve personnel of the Army of the United States under regulations prepared as prescribed in section 45 of this act.

Officers so detailed or assigned may accept such State or Territorial commissions, with the permission of the President and terminable in his discretion, without vacating their commissions in the permanent or reserve personnel of the Army of the United States or being prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein. Hereafter no person shall be recognized as a commissioned officer of the National Guard of the United States unless such person shall have been selected from the commissioned officers of the permanent or reserve personnel of the Army of the United States: Provided, That men enlisted in the National Guard of the United States shall be eligible for appointment as reserve officers under regulations to be prescribed by the President, and in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 66, line 23, page 82.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to offer another amendment at this point. On page 82, after line 23, I move to insert as a new paragraph what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 82, after line 23, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

All officers and employees of the United States and of the District of Columbia who shall be members of the National Guard of the United States shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties, without loss of pay, time, or efficiency rating, on all days during which they shall be engaged in field or coast-defense training ordered or authorized under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 7, page 83, in section 67.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On page 83, line 5, I move to strike out the word "discharged" and insert the word "relieved." That is to correct a clerical error.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 18, page 86, in section 70.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In line 18, page 86, after the word "grades" and before the period, I move to insert the words "and like terms of active service under the United States."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 86, line 18, after the word "grades" and before the period, insert the words "and like terms of active service under the United States," so as to make the clause read:

At least one-half of the personnel of the National Guard Division of the War Department shall consist of reserve officers assigned to the National Guard of the United States, who may, with their consent, be ordered into the active service for this purpose, and while so serving shall receive the same pay and allowances as officers of the permanent personnel of like grades and like terms of active service under the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 70, page 87, line 2.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I propose a new section, to be substituted for section 71 as printed. May I say in explanation that the new section is in conformance with the recommendations of the Militia Bureau of the War Department and is, as I remember, almost in exact conformance with the provisions of the bill which has been passed by the House of Representatives. It has to do with the pay of officers and men of the National Guard of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposd amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 87, line 3, after the numerals 71 and the subhead "Pay for the National Guard of the United States," strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Captains and lieutenants belonging to organizations of the National Guard of the United States shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the monthly base pay prescribed for officers of the permanent personnel of their grades, for each regular drill or other period of instruction authorized by the Secretary of War, not exceeding five in any one calendar month, at which they shall have been officially present for the required period, and at which not less than 50 per cent of the commissioned strength and at least 60 per cent of the enlisted strength attend and participate for at least one and one-half hours. Captains commanding organizations shall receive $240 per annum in addition to the drill pay herein prescribed. Officers above the grade of captain shall receive not more than $500 per annum and officers below the grade of major, not belonging to organizations, shall receive not more than four-thirtieths of the monthly base pay of their grades, for satisfactory performance of their appropriate duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Each enlisted man belonging to an organization of the National Guard of the United States shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the initial monthly pay of his grade in the permanent personnel for each drill ordered for his organization at which he is officially present and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours, not exceeding five in any one calendar month; but no enlisted man shall receive any pay under the provisions of this section for any month in which he shall have attended less than 60 per cent of the drills or other exercises prescribed for his organization. Periods of actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed may be accepted in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War. Pay under the provisions of this section shall not accrue to any person during a period when he shall be lawfully entitled to the same pay as a member of the permanent personnel of corresponding grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 76, line 25, page 91.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of line 25, on page 91.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 91, at the end of line 25, after the word "training" and before the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

Of four months or the equivalent training in the National Guard of the United States prescribed by this act or six months' service in the permanent personnel: Provided, That enlisted men in the National Guard of the United States or the permanent personnel, if nominated by competent authority, may, with their consent, be transferred to the training forces in order to receive four months' training as a qualification for such appointment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question arising out of a suggestion which appeals rather strongly to me. It was suggested to me a few days ago that it would be well not only for the national defense but also in the interest of the merchant marine that the service of seamen who had served at sea for the time required under the universal military training features of this bill should be credited to them. I desire to know if the committee has given any consideration to that suggestion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Credit in what way, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That persons who have served at sea the requisite time shall have been considered to have taken the military training which is required by the proposed act; in other words, that if they can show sufficient service at sea they shall not be required to take the training provided for by the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I suggest to the Senator a point which I have not heard alluded to at all, either in the Senate or in the public press, in connection with the discussion of this bill? The bill not only provides military training for the Army, but it provides for it for the Navy. It does not, however, presume to go into any details as to how the training for the Navy shall be conducted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, the seamen whom I have in mind are not members of the Navy; they are not in the Navy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; but it occurs to me, in line with the Senator's suggestion—which I think has merit, although I have not studied it at all—that if any such law as this should pass and young men are permitted to select so far as practicable whether they shall be trained in the Army or the Navy, as this bill provides, then in drafting the regulations for training in the Navy credit might very well be given to those young men who have already been at sea and they might be excepted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator from New York will give that idea some study. It rather appealed to me not only from the military side, but especially from the merchant marine side.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is a very interesting suggestion. I will say to the Senator, however, that the military committee believes that it would not be justified in this bill, prepared only by that committee and having to do only with the affairs of the Army, to attempt to cover any details governing the training for the Navy. So we have simply inserted in the bill a provision that young men on reaching the age of 18 may express their choice as between the Army and the Navy, and wherever practicable they shall be given the choice. Then we leave to regulations to be prepared by the President and acts of Congress to be passed in the future the question as to how the naval training shall be conducted. We merely drop it there; but we incorporate the principle in the bill, and give the boy the choice. Consultation with the Navy Department indicates that they have at present ample facilities for the training of 60,000 men a year; they could take that number each year and give them four months' training with the facilities which they now have, and it would be an enormous help to the Navy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It occurred to me that we could well afford to provide, in connection with this legislation, that independently of the Navy, seamen, American citizens, who have served on merchant ships for the period required by the bill could be given due credit for that period and not be required to go to training camps. The American merchant marine is important whether the seamen or members of the crew belong to the Navy or not; many of our merchant ships would be of very great service in time of war, independently of the Navy, and would render service without being in the Navy, and probably without being under the control of the Navy. So it seems to me it would be well to recognize this great class of citizens in a measure of this kind, independently of the Navy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is probable, however, Mr. President, that not many men below the age of 18 have served at sea in the merchant marine, though we might find some who have done so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think in the testimony we have taken it has been shown that a great many go to sea under that age. At any rate, I hope the Senator from New York will give the suggestion some consideration.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has not been presented to the committee, and I think it is a very interesting suggestion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question or two in regard to the credit, if any, allowed in this bill on account of training received in the colleges or universities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no credit allowed for such training.

Mr. STERLING. I ask the Senator if there is a reason for not allowing such credit?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. The committee gave long consideration to that point; they discussed it with university professors, with the presidents of some of the largest educational institutions in the United States, and with men interested in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, established in something over 300 universities. Some of those educators suggested that the young man in college who is taking the Reserve Officers' Training Corps course should be exempted from attendance at the four months' training camp.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask if there is a Reserve Officers' Training Corps course being given now in the colleges?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is being given in about 300 high schools, technical schools, colleges, and universities. The committee came to the conclusion that for the law of the United States to set aside any group of young men in a class by themselves and exempt them from any of the features of the training which the great mass of young men would be expected to take would be unwise and undemocratic. The committee believe that one of the best things in this proposal for training is the fact that it is going to bring all classes of young men together and establish a touch of the elbow; and to provide in the law that young men who are fortunate enough to be able to go to colleges or universities or, indeed, to high schools should not have to go to the military training camps on the ground that they were receiving some military instruction in the universities, colleges, and high schools would be to make a special class of them.

It is interesting to know, Mr. President—and I hope I can remember the percentage figures correctly—that of all the young men who have finished their education, whatever it may have been, not over 7 per cent in the aggregate go through college, university, or high school. So the class of young men who would be exempt under the proposal that credit should be allowed them because they are in a college or a university or a high school and are taking a military course as members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps would be exceedingly small, and by just that much more they would be exceedingly conspicuous as the result of the exemption. After spending really many days on this very point and hearing much testimony, the committee decided that for all concerned it were wiser for every young man in the United States to be treated exactly alike.

Mr. STERLING. I have wondered whether there would not be an advantage to all in the actual field training which they would not have at colleges or universities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, decidedly.

Mr. STERLING. And that college and university students, as well as the others, ought to share in that training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. Now, let me ask the Senator one more question. I am asking him these questions for the reason that I have had inquiries from the heads of educational institutions in my State in regard to this phase of the matter, and I have sought to answer—and I may say that I have answered them—in some such way; that is, I have supposed that the reason was as now stated by the Senator from New York for not exempting these men from the training required.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just there and take this opportunity to give to the Senator and others who may be interested the idea of the committee of the proper function of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units in our colleges and universities?

Mr. STERLING. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Reserve Officers' Training Corps units were originally intended, if I recollect aright, especially in their upper grades, to give the young man some of the groundwork in military knowledge and tactics which will eventually fit him to become an officer in a reserve army of the United States if we should ever have one. This bill attempts to provide one—something that will be quite unusual in our history.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps units are institutions of great value, and we expect that a young man who is able to go to college and take the Reserve Officers' Training Corps course given to him in the college under the instruction of an officer of the Regular Army of the United States shall have prior to that time attended a four months' training camp and have lived the life of a doughboy for four months; that the Reserve Officers' Training Corps as a result will do him more benefit than if he had not gone to a military training camp in the first instance; and that, further, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will likely be a postgraduate course for him, so that by the time he graduates from his university or college and has gone through the two years or three years of service in his Reserve Officers' Training Corps unit, educating himself to be an officer of a reserve army, he will come out so equipped as pretty nearly to be able to take command, in a minor capacity, of course, of citizen soldiers. So the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, under our conception of this bill, as part of a great system, is to be used as a postgraduate school to increase the number of available officers for the reserve army of the United States; but we considered it vitally important that no man should ever become an officer, regular or otherwise, in the Army of the United States until he has once at least served as a doughboy in camp. We have just passed a section, Mr. President, which, of course, escaped the attention of the Senators present, and I wish to emphasize it now——

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that the provision referred to by him escaped the attention of Senators who were present. I wonder if Senators who are absent have discovered it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Sometimes I think that a little bit of universal compulsory attendance of the Senate would not do much harm.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, why not make the compulsory provisions of the bill apply to the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I did not mean to interrupt the even tenor of the discussion so much, but I wish to call attention to an amendment which the Senate adopted a moment ago without knowing it. Section 76 of this bill provides as follows:

Eligibility for appointment as cadet, United States Military Academy: After the inauguration of the military training herein provided for, no person shall be appointed a cadet at the United States Military Academy unless he shall have completed the initial military training—

Which is the four months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from New York to an amendment to that section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I shall continue to read:

Unless he shall have completed the initial military training of four months, or the equivalent training in the National Guard of the United States prescribed in this act, or six months' service in the permanent personnel—

That is, the Regulars—

Provided, That enlisted men in the National Guard of the United States, or the permanent personnel—

Which is the Regulars—

if nominated by competent authority—

That is, Senators and Congressmen—may, with their consent, be transferred to the training forces in order to receive the four months' training as a qualification for such appointment.

So that after this once becomes law, if it does, and the machinery of this act goes into full operation—and, of course, it can not reach full operation for five or six years—no man can become an officer of the Army of the United States unless he has taken that training with his fellows and rubbed elbows with them and experienced the trials and the tribulations of the doughboy.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I assume that, although the Senator has said that this was adopted without the Senate's knowing it, it has the Senator's approval?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, I drafted it.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator rendered a service when he did.

Now, Mr. President, one further question.

Section 53, in regard to preparatory educational training, provides as follows:

Persons liable to training under the provisions of this act who are not sufficiently educated or instructed in the English language to be able to profit by the military training herein provided for may be required to receive, prior to the training period, such preparatory education as may be necessary to fit them therefor and as may be prescribed by regulation, and they may be inducted into the service or not for this purpose.

Now, if inducted into the service for this purpose, it will be, of course, prior to and so much additional of service to the four months of training required. How would they be required to take that training without being inducted into the service?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under regulations which might be adopted, the man who could not read English or write English—and it is intended to cover that kind of person—could attend night school at his home town, if such schools were conducted, or attend the public schools in the regular way, under regulations to be prescribed by the President, in order that the man might learn to read and write the English language before he went to camp. The section is not mandatory. It is permissive. The committee inserted it because when we examined the figures of the draft coming out of this last war, we found that 24.9 per cent of all the young men in the United States who were summoned under the draft could not read or write the English language. Nearly one out of every four could not read or write the English language.

Mr. STERLING. But the education or training could not, in fact, be compulsory, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, until they were actually inducted into the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it could not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 5 on page 94.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on line 9, page 94, after the word "permanent," I move to insert the words "or reserve." It is to correct an obvious error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 94, line 9, after the word "permanent," it is proposed to insert "or reserve," so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 80. The permanent personnel for duty with Reserve Officers' Training Corps: The President is hereby authorized to detail such numbers of officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the permanent or reserve personnel of the Army of the United States, either active or retired, as may be necessary, for duty as professors of military science and tactics, assistant professors of military science and tactics, and military instructors at educational institutions where one or more units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps are maintained; but no officer shall be so detailed who has not had two years' commissioned service in the Army. In time of peace retired officers, retired warrant officers, or retired enlisted men shall not be detailed under the provisions of this section without their consent. While so detailed they shall receive active pay and allowances.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 19, on page 98.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on line 19, page 98, I move to strike out "21" and insert "19."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 98, line 19, it is proposed to strike out "21" and insert "19," so as to read:

SEC. 84. Appointment of graduates of Reserve Officers' Training Corps as reserve officers: The President alone, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is hereby authorized to appoint as a reserve officer of the Army of the United States any graduate of the senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, who shall have satisfactorily completed the further training provided for in section 82 of this act, or any graduate of the junior division who shall have satisfactorily completed the courses of military training prescribed for the senior division and the further training provided for in section 82 of this act, and shall have participated in such practical instruction subsequent to graduation as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, who shall have arrived at the age of 19 years and who shall agree, under oath in writing, to serve the United States in the capacity of a reserve officer of the Army of the United States during a period of at least five years from the date of his appointment as such reserve officer, unless sooner discharged by proper authority—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 15, on page 99.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on line 15, page 99, after the word "permanent," I move to insert the words "or reserve," another obvious omission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 99, line 15, after the word "permanent," it is proposed to insert "or reserve," so that, if amended, it will read:

SEC. 85. Military equipment and instructors at other schools and colleges: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to issue such arms, tentage, and equipment as he shall deem necessary for proper military training to schools and colleges, other than those provided for in section 77 of this act, having a course of military training prescribed by the Secretary of War and having not less than 100 physically fit male students above the age of 14 years; and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail such available active or retired commissioned officers and enlisted men of the permanent or reserve personnel of the Army of the United States as he may deem necessary to said schools and colleges, other than those provided for in section 77 of this act: Provided, That in time of peace no retired officer or enlisted man shall be detailed on such duty without his consent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to line 2 on page 100.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is an amendment there which I think the Secretary has before him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 100, line 3, after the words "Sec. 87," it is proposed to insert as a side head the words "Miscellaneous provisions: (a)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read to line 10 on page 100.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, after line 10, on page 100, I offer a number of amendments, which fall under the head of "Miscellaneous provisions." They are paragraphed separately, so that the Secretary can read them separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 100, after line 10, it is proposed to insert the following subdivisions:

(b) Hereafter the President shall be authorized to detail five officers of the Medical Service of the permanent personnel for duty with the military relief division of the American National Red Cross.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I may say to the Senate that that is a provision of existing law contained in one of the sections of the national-defense act. It so happens that that particular provision of that section of the national-defense act is the only portion of that section left which will be of any use after the passage of this bill. This bill repeals the section but reenacts that one proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

(c) Authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War to grant permission by revocable license to the American National Red Cross to erect and maintain on any military reservations within the jurisdiction of the United States buildings suitable for the storage of supplies or to occupy for that purpose buildings erected by the United States, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, such supplies to be available for the aid of the civilian population in case of serious national disaster.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That, too, is existing law, which we ask to have reenacted in order to round out the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendment.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

(d) In time of war retired officers of the Army may be employed on active duty, in the discretion of the President, and when so employed they shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grade. Hereafter any retired officer who has been or shall be detailed on active duty shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of the grade, not above that of colonel, that he would have attained in due course of promotion had he remained on the active list for a period beyond the date of his retirement equal to the total amount of time during which he has been detailed on active duty since his retirement. Officers of the Philippine Scouts now on the retired list shall receive the same pay as other retired officers of like grade and length of service, and shall be equally eligible for advancement on account of active duty performed since retirement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just a word of explanation. The bill brings the Philippine Scouts, officers and men, into the permanent personnel of the Army of the United States. Subdivision (d), which the Secretary has just read, is contained in existing law, except for the last sentence, which provides that the officers of the Philippine Scouts now on the retired list shall be merged into the retired list of the Army of the United States. It completes the merger of the Philippine Scouts into the permanent personnel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendments.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

(e) No person under the age of 18 years shall be enlisted in the permanent personnel of the Army of the United States or in the National Guard of the United States without the written consent of his parents or guardians, provided that such minor has such parents or guardians entitled to his custody.

(f) In addition to military training, the enlisted men of the permanent personnel shall hereafter be given an opportunity to study and receive instruction of such character as to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations. Civilian teachers may be employed to aid the Army officers in giving such instruction, and part of this instruction may consist of vocational education either in agriculture or the mechanic arts. The Secretary of War, with the approval of the President, shall prescribe rules and regulations for conducting the instruction herein provided for, and the Secretary of War shall have the power at all times to suspend, increase, or decrease the amount of such instruction offered as may, in his judgment, be consistent with the requirements of military instruction and service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that is a reenactment of existing law, having to do with vocational training in the Army. We transfer that to this act because the national-defense act, which originally contained it, is practically cut to pieces.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the amendments offered by the Senator from New York.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

(g) The Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed, immediately upon the passage of this act, to appoint a board of three officers, who shall revise and codify the military laws of the United States, such revision and modification to be transmitted to the Congress of the United States by the Secretary of War, accompanied by a report of the board of officers herein authorized, in which shall be set forth the substance of the proposed changes in existing law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will merely say that if we can get a recodification of the military laws of the United States, it will be a "consummation devoutly to be wished."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are several amendments that I wish to offer to section 89.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendments.

The READING CLERK. On page 100, line 16, after the numeral "11" insert the numeral "12" and a comma; on the same line, after the numeral "15" insert the numeral "16" and a comma; on line 19, after the numeral "62" insert the numeral "63" and a comma; on line 20, after the numeral "79" insert the numeral "80" and a comma; on line 22, after the numeral "108" insert the numeral "109" and a comma and "110" and a comma; on the same line after the numeral "111" insert the numeral "112" and a comma; and on the same line after the numeral "116" insert the numeral "117" and a comma, so as to make the section read:

SEC. 89. Repeal of certain laws: Sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, and 119 of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," and all laws or parts of laws in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That completes the reading of the bill for committee amendments, with the exception of three or four amendments, which have been either reserved or which I have given notice will be introduced later.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Beginning on page 65, line 4, strike out all of sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61, found on pages 65 to 76, being that portion of the bill which provides for universal compulsory military training.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Curtis	Gerry	Kellogg
Ball	Dillingham	Glass	Kendrick
Borah	Edge	Hale	Kenyon
Brandegee	Elkins	Harris	Keyes
Capper	Fernald	Harrison	Kirby
Chamberlain	France	Henderson	Knox
Comer	Gay	Jones, Wash.	Lenroot

Lodge	Norris	Simmons	Swanson
McCormick	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.	Thomas
McCumber	Phelan	Smith, Md.	Townsend
McKellar	Phipps	Smoot	Trammell
McNary	Pittman	Spencer	Wadsworth
Moses	Pomerene	Sterling	Warren
New	Sheppard	Sutherland	Watson

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are absent on the business of the Senate, engaged in conference on the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] informed me early in the day that he expects to speak on the bill. I do not see him in the Chamber at this moment, and I am not aware that anyone else desires or intends to speak; but certainly before the matter comes to a vote I would like an opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to the charts which are hanging upon the rear wall. I do not know whether it will be possible to get the attention of Senators to this matter, but it seems to me rather important. I am going to ask indulgence of the Senate that I may leave my place and point out some of the salient features of these charts.

So much has been said here about the cost under the Senate bill and so much has been said in another body about the cost under the Senate bill and the cost of the so-called House bill that the Committee on Military Affairs thought it would be advisable to display charts which graphically show the situation which would result from the passage of either of the bills and to compare the two.

As I have said and as has been said by others at an earlier time during the debate, the Committee on Military Affairs had a most exhaustive examination made by the War Department, in the office of the Director of Finance and the Statistical Division of the General Staff, estimates covering the cost of the different elements of the Army as it would exist under the terms of the Senate bill, including universal military training, and estimates made as to the cost of the Army as it would exist in its different elements under the House bill, which does not include universal military training.

There are four charts——

Mr. POMERENE. Before going to that, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. So far as the cost is concerned, it is exactly the same under the provisions of the House bill as under the provisions of the Senate bill, is it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The provisions of the House bill, so far as they relate to the Regular Army, are practically the same as those in the Senate bill. There can be no difference in cost per man, but the Army provided for under the House bill is larger than that provided for in the Senate bill. Under the House bill the Regular Army is 20,000 larger in enlisted strength and 800 less in commissioned strength.

Mr. POMERENE. What is the estimated cost under the House bill and under the Senate bill, exclusive of the provisions in the Senate bill in regard to universal military training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is just what I was coming to. These charts display it.

I know there is a disposition on the part of many Senators to vote against the provision of the Senate bill which provides for universal military training. I understand the situation perfectly. I want the situation as it affects the national defense, the defense of this country in time to come, to be understood. I want it understood where we are spending our money and what we are getting for it, before we finally legislate as to the kind of Army we are to have.

The two charts here [indicating] display what might be termed the "man power" provided under each bill, the Senate bill and the House bill, the maximum size of force which each would produce. The first chart displays the man power that would be produced under the provisions of the Senate bill. The portions of the columns colored in green are the Regulars, the portions of the columns colored in blue indicate the men engaged in training in the four months' training camp, the portions colored in brown indicate the National Guard of the United States, and the portions colored in pink indicate the organized reserves composed of graduates of the military training camps where they have had four months' military training.

Starting in 1921, the Regular Army under the Senate bill would be 280,000. We estimate that the National Guard in the coming year can not exceed 100,000—and that is a liberal estimate. This makes a total of 380,000 men at the end of 1921; 1922, under the terms of the bill, is the first year in which the military training commences. We estimate that not more than 350,000 young men can be trained in the military training camps that year.

As they reach 18 years of age the boys are given the option of having their training in that year or either of the two succeeding years. We put a liberal estimate on that, that half of them, or more than half of them, will take it in their nineteenth year immediately after becoming 18 years of age. We are giving the maximum figures in every case. There are 200,000 of that class, making a total of 830,000. Then as the years go by the number of men increases and reaches its maximum in the four months' training camp when it reaches 540,000 men annually.

We estimate that the National Guard can never reach a number in excess of 350,000 because there are not facilities in the States in the way of armories, stables, and rifle ranges to take care of more than that number. In fact, that is a liberal estimate. But as the camps begin to work and graduate the four months' training camp men, the organized reserves begin to mount very rapidly, so that at the end of five years of training or six years from date, with the Regular Army slowly reducing from 280,000 down to 210,000 at that time, we will have a force, competent to defend this country aganist any attack, of 3,265,000 men in the organized reserve, the National Guard of the United States, and the little Regular Army from which spring in large part the teachers of these forces.

The House bill provides for a Regular Army of 300,000 men, 20,000 larger than that provided for in the Senate bill. Assuming that to be the accepted size of the Regular Army in the United States, we display across the chart to which I now direct attention the figures applicable to all those years, including 1926. With a Regular Army of 300,000 men, as provided for in the House bill, there are the usual provisions for the National Guard very much as we have them, and it is legitimate to make the same estimate as to the strength under the House bill as it is under the Senate bill, which can not possibly exceed in its maximum 350,000. So if we have our Regular Army filled we will have 300,000 men on duty, and the National Guard raised up to 350,000 men, which is pretty hard to attain by voluntary enlistments, and the total available forces under the House bill would be 650,000 men. The difference is very plain as between the two systems.

As to the cost, and this is what everybody wants to get straight on, in this chart [indicating] is shown the cost of the Regular Army.

Mr. POMERENE. Under the Senate bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. This is the cost of the Regular Army, as shown in green on the chart to which I am now directing attention. The brown shows the cost of the universal military training in the four months' training camps, and the blue shows the cost of the National Guard of the United States, which is also used as a vehicle for giving that training equivalent to the training that they would receive in the four months' training camps.

This is the eloquent part of the situation—the cost. Senators will find that in any scheme that may be put forward the Regular Army costs at least two-thirds, if not four-fifths, of all the whole expenditure. Under the Senate bill it starts at $503,000,000 for a Regular Army of 280,000 men, which is slowly reduced in size. We reduce the size of the Regular Army under the provisions of the Senate bill until in 1927 it reaches a cost of $399,000,000.

The National Guard in the first year, of course, is the guard as it exists to-day and, estimated at 100,000 men, it will cost $42,000,000. Then comes the first year of training, and as the training increases and we begin to get the machinery in action we finally reach the maximum of output in the training camps of 540,000 men annually, and for the four months' training we find the cost to be $153,000,000 per year. The cost of the National Guard as it grows to the figure of 350,000 men, which we figure is the maximum that it can grow to, due to lack of facilities in the States in the way of armories and rifle ranges and stables, will be $125,000,000 a year. The maximum annual cost under the provisions of the Senate bill for the Regular Army, the universal military training, and the National Guard will be $677,000,000 at the end of six years.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator how many men it is expected to train under this system of universal military training each year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should have said that in the beginning. It is estimated by officials who managed the draft law, and the medical officers, that there come to the age of 18 years in the United States about 700,000 young men each year who are physically fit for military training. The Navy can take 60,000 of them under the provisions of the Senate bill. They have complete facilities for doing so now at their big training camps at the Great Lakes and at Jamestown and elsewhere, which are amply sufficient to take care of that number for four months each year. That reduces the total to 640,000; 100,000 more can be trained in the National Guard under the three-year enlistment provision, leaving 540,000 to be trained annually in the four months' training camps.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, assuming now that these 700,000 are to be received out of universal military training, the Senator would figure the cost per capita to the Government to be $218.55?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not figured it including the 60,000 in the Navy.

Mr. POMERENE. No; I am including them in the 700,000. The Senator did reduce that by 60,000, those who were to go into the Navy. I am trying to get at the per capita cost.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have here the itemized War Department estimate per man of training men for four months, and the estimate for training a man for four months is $283.60. That includes his equipment, his subsistence while training, his clothing, his pay, his transportation, his upkeep, his quarters and medical care, the expense of the local registration board, his laundry, and his subsistence while traveling. The whole thing is included in the $283.60. That is an inflated estimate, because there is charged against that man out of that $283.60 the sum of $92.80 per year for equipment. Of course the first year it would cost that much to equip him, but that equipment will last much more than one year and can be used in many cases for many years to follow. So that is not a fair annual charge against the training.

Mr. POMERENE. Let me ask this further question: I understood the Senator the other day to say that the cost per capita for an army of from 300,000 to 500,000 would be approximately $1,800.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the Regular Army?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes. According to the figures just given the cost of one of these young men in the training camp for four months would be $283.60. That makes a very substantial difference between the cost per capita in the Regular Army and the cost per capita in the four months' training camp.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is enormous.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize it is enormous, but I want to know the why of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The overhead of the Regular Army, of course, is very heavy. We have to maintain the Watertown Arsenal, the Watervliet Arsenal, the Rock Island Arsenal, and other arsenals, with the great establishments which are all a part of the cost of the Regular Army.

There is, of course, a great overhead in the supply services. There are training camps like Benning, and the service schools, such as the school at Leavenworth, the school at Fortress Monroe, the school at Fort Riley, and the school at Camp Knox; all over the country these great establishments have to be maintained in order to maintain a Regular Army, and the overhead is enormous.

Mr. POMERENE. Am I right, then, in assuming that all of the items which the Senator has just enumerated are included in the $1,800 per capita cost?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are; they are a part of the overhead. It costs that much per man to support a soldier. There has to be this great establishment back of him, which is very expensive.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. All of these overhead expenses are necessary for the training of soldiers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are; and that is just the point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Soldiers in training must have guns; they have to have powder; they have to have everything that is made by Army factories for the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Army factories already exist to-day, so that we are able to do this work without any additional expense. We do not need any additional overhead. The overhead cost decreases, proportionately, enormously.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reason that it is not necessary to make additional expenditure is because we are now organized, in a measure, on a war basis, and, of course, if we keep what we have had during the war and we do not count what we keep because of the war, then the overhead for training the soldier is not so much; but if we count what we keep by reason of being on a war basis, a part of this overhead is chargeable to the training of recruits, just as much as it is for maintaining the Regular soldiers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Tennessee and I have different ideas about the financial problem, and I suppose they can never be brought into conformity. The truth is that we have bought and paid for this overhead and we now own it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the estimate per capita for training these men include the purchase of any more training camps, or have we all that are necessary?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not. We do not require any more training camps; we now have more than we need, if we include the large Army posts and the seacoast defenses, which are ample to take care of thousands of men, particularly from the large centers of population along the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. POMERENE. But will we not be at a very large expense in equipping the camps which we now have?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; I think not. They are all equipped and would only have to be kept in repair.

Mr. POMERENE. I saw a statement a day or two ago emanating from some so-called military authority, to the effect that we would be at very large expense to reequip the camps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Such is not the testimony before our committee.

Mr. POMERENE. I am very glad to know that.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I again interrupt the Senator? If it troubles him, I shall not do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, I wish to ask the Senator a question. In the case of a camp such as Camp Meade, which is purely a temporary camp, it will merely be a question of a short time before the first five-year period passes, when that camp will have to be entirely rebuilt, because it is temporary in its nature and can not possibly last more than a very few years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, again referring to cost, the suggestion was made the other day that it would cost so much to equip these men as provided in the Senate bill. We now have 3,000,000 rifles on hand. They have been bought and paid for, and yet their value is charged in these estimates against the annual maintenance of these men, although we own the rifles, and they will last at least 10 years. I refer to this in order to show Senators on what a liberal basis these estimates have been prepared; in fact, the War Department refused to make them in any other way.

The War Department charges against the cost of the National Guard the cost of a complete field service equipment valued at $179.90 per man. Everybody knows that a complete field service equipment will be good for several years, and yet that item is contained in this estimate of annual cost. I want to emphasize the fact that some of these estimates are inflated. The War Department charges against the maintenance of the National Guard field artillery matériel at the rate of $70.70 a year per man. Of course, the first issue of the field artillery to the National Guard would cost $70.70 per man, but when it is issued it is going to last for many years; and yet it is charged as an annual cost in these tables. Again I say that some of these estimates are inflated. We have 5,000 pieces of field artillery to-day which can be issued at any time, and we have harness and everything to go with it, which are now properly stored. In five or six years from now there will be few people in the country who will know how to use them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it correct to state that these estimates cover all the necessary expenses of the repairs and replacements which are necessary to keep the equipment in just as good condition as when orginally issued?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do. They include every conceivable item.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the cost of the House bill which starts and maintains, assumedly, through a period of years, a Regular Army of 300,000 men. Its cost alone is $525,000,000 at the present prices, upon which all these estimates are based. Add the cost of the National Guard to the Regulars under the House bill and we have a total of $650,000,000; add to that the cost of those provisions of the House bill for voluntary military training—and one can only wildly guess at how many men will present themselves for voluntary training, which, I understand, is provided for in the House bill, but certainly it will cost $20,000,000—and the total will be $670,000,000. The Senate bill provides for an expenditure of $677,000,000; but look at the difference in man power.

Where is the economy in our country depending upon a Regular Army plus an indefinite National Guard, practically alone, to defend the country in time of war, while all our experience shows that, no matter how effective and splendid the Regular Army is, it can never be big enough to defend the country in time of war; that we must rely upon a citizen army?

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to ask the Senator from New York if he will again please state the time at which the proposed training will commence? Is there to be none in the year 1921, so that no appropriation will be required until the fiscal year 1922?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; that is the case.

Mr. PHIPPS. That is my understanding. I doubt, however, if that is generally understood among Senators, for I have heard expressions to the contrary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator that the bill was amended this afternoon to provide that the military training feature of it shall take effect commencing in the calendar year 1922 instead of the calendar year 1921?

Mr. PHIPPS. That anticipates the suggestion I was about to make to the chairman of the committee, if possible to defer further the commencement of the training until the beginning of the calendar year 1922, rather than in the middle of the calendar year 1921.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as I have contended several times during this debate, the cost of the Senate bill is approximately the cost of the House bill. The question then resolves itself into what do we get for our money? Do we get a national defense upon which we can rely to meet any emergency, no matter how grave, under the terms of the House bill, the old system of the Regular Army plus an indefinite National Guard? History shows that we do not. Now, if we can devise a system which will cost no more or very little more and which will develop a national defense which will make this country absolutely secure against any kind of crisis, and which as a matter of fact will keep us out of war, are we not doing the economical thing?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, has the Senator considered the likelihood of the States under the Senate bill asking the Government to build armories and other structures for the National Guard?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not think the States would do so, because the States are already the great benefactors under the Senate bill in that they are allowed to use as State troops the units of the National Guard of the United States stationed within their respective borders.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; but they are wholly under the control of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; not while they are on that duty. They are then completely at the disposal of the States.

Mr. CURTIS. That is while they are on that duty, but otherwise and at other times they are under the control of the Government and they will be treated as Government troops. So the States will ask the Government to build armories and training halls for these men, and before this bill has been on the statute books a year it will be found that the States will be coming here asking the Government to give them buildings for the National Guard under the Senate bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Federal Government practically supports the National Guard now.

Mr. CURTIS. Not in the way of armories.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Except in the matter of buildings; that is true, but the great expense is in the matter of equipment. I do not agree with the Senator from Kansas in believing that the States will all come here and ask us to erect buildings for them, because the States are going to get more out of this bill than they are out of the present situation. They will get a better protection; their guard units will be filled at all times to full strength; and they will be completely equipped at the expense of the Federal Government, as they are to-day, and will be at the disposal of the governor of the State to protect the State against internal disorders whenever he needs them. Under those circumstances I do not think the States are going to ask for more than they are asking to-day, because they are going to get more than they are getting to-day.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Under the Senate bill will the officers of the National Guard be under the control of the State or under the control of the Federal Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The officers of the National Guard of the United States, in the first instance, must be reserve officers of the Army of the United States. Those reserve officers, upon the recommendation of the governor of the State in which they live, may take an additional or subsidiary commission in the State troops; but they must first be reserve officers, and their primary obligation and their principal status is as officers of the Army of the United States. It is left to the governor of the State to recommend from among the reserve officers living in his State those who are to be commissioned in the State troops or National Guard of the United States.

Mr. SPENCER. Then, if the Senator will yield further, I am right in assuming that no officer of the National Guard could be detailed without the consent of the governor of the State in which he serves?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not to command troops in the State.

Mr. SPENCER. So that every officer of the State National Guard would be a man acceptable to the administration of the State?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the purpose of the bill; we did not want to centralize the power of appointment without restraint here at Washington,

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not wish to interfere with the regular order of the Senator's remarks, but I will ask him if he has among the statistics furnished by the department any figures to show at what rate the men who have just finished their service in the late war would become disqualified by reason of age and at what rate, according to mortality statistics, their numbers would be reduced with a view of showing that if we did nothing in the way of universal military training how long it would be before we would be without the reliance which they now afford?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I have not any figures or any estimates on that point. I may say to the Senator that some tables which I was examining yesterday indicate that the average age of the American soldier in the last war was 22 years.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. At what age was he beyond the power of the draft under the draft law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. At 45; but, of course, the Senator knows that as a man grows older he assumes additional responsibilities, and not long after the average man is 22—certainly by the time he is 25—he marries and has a family, and it is all the more difficult for him to take part in the active defense of his country, and it is all the more difficult for the country to call on him and make him serve. That is why it has been that in every great war the average age of the most effective soldier is around 21 years.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. EDGE. I want to return for a moment to the question raised by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER]. The reply of the Senator from New York was not entirely clear to me, as I understand the bill.

Is it not correct to understand that the new provision relating to the National Guard entirely does away with the present system as existing in many States? I am not sure whether it exists in all of them or not. It is usually controlled by the State constitution. In the State of New Jersey, for instance, the officers below certain grades are all elected by the men of the various units. Above certain grades, they are appointed by the governor from membership in the National Guard. I believe, in addition to that, they take a Federal examination, principally a physical examination. Do I not understand that under the bill we are now considering that privilege is entirely removed, whether it is a constitutional provision or otherwise, and that all officers of State units are appointed by the War Department, as the Senator says, from reserve officers, subject to the approval of the Federal Government? Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Approximately, yes. The governor may recommend such of the reserve officers as reside in his State who desire to become officers of the National Guard of the United States as the ones that he thinks would be good men; but the Senator must remember that under our bill the National Guard is no longer organized and maintained under the militia clause. It is organized and maintained under the Army clause of the Constitution, so that your New Jersey statute governing the appointment of militia officers in the State of New Jersey has no effect or bearing whatsoever on this situation.

Mr. EDGE. I understand that, and that is exactly the object of the question—to make it perfectly clear to the Senate that the present National Guard system, as controlled mostly by State constitutions or State statutes, is entirely eliminated by this bill, and the State troops become in effect Regular troops, and the officers are really appointed by the War Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not Regular troops; citizen reserve troops. That is what the guard has wanted to be for years.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as I understand, they become troops of the United States and are only under the jurisdiction of the State when they are called by the governor and that call is allowed by the United States Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. When that call is allowed?

Mr. CURTIS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they have the right to call them.

Mr. CURTIS. The call must be granted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It must. The bill says that they shall be entitled to their use when not in the active service of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Would not that be a matter of discretion for the department?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President.

Mr. CURTIS. I remember that just a short time ago we had the governors of three or four States asking for United States troops, and the matter was held up here for a month or two before the order was issued by the War Department, and I believe we would find that the same thing would occur under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; because there was no provision of law at that time entitling the State of Illinois to the use of Federal troops. It could only be extended by favor or in case of serious insurrection, which would move the President to use the Army of the United States to put down the insurrection. Now, this bill specifically provides that the States and Territories shall be entitled to use these National Guard troops.

Mr. CURTIS. They are entitled to use Regular troops now if they can not handle the situation in the State. Every State is entitled to protection against domestic violence.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they are entitled to ask for them; that is all.

Mr. CURTIS. It naturally would follow that they should have them. This is the guaranty given in the Constitution.

Mr. SPENCER. Not always.

Mr. CURTIS. Why not? If the States can not have them when they call for them, why enact the provision? The State calls for them through the governor, as occurred here two years ago. The governors of three or four States called for troops and could not get them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Because there was nothing in the law that entitled them to use them. The Senator's complaint about those four States illustrates the necessity for this provision.

Mr. CURTIS. I can not agree with the Senator. I think there will be the same complaint, and it will depend upon whether or not the Federal Government wants to let them go to the States. They go under the control of the Federal Government for all time, and the whole Militia Division is put in the hands of the Federal Government, located here in Washington, instead of the different States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am perfectly well aware that there are some adjutant generals who make that contention, but I challenge their attention to the language of this bill. They have tried to spread that doctrine among a good many of the States and to frighten the officials of the States into the belief that they can not use these troops without the permission of the Federal Government. The language is perfectly clear. They are entitled to their use when not in the actual service of the Federal Government, just as they are to-day. If the National Guard of Kansas should be called into the Federal service to-morrow, under the militia clause the governor of Kansas would have no more control over them. He could not use them. There is no essential difference between the new scheme and the old, except in the appointment of officers and the training, for under the militia clause of the Constitution the appointment of the officers is vested in the governor of the State, and the training must be governed by the State. Under the Army clause the appointment of the officers must rest originally with the Federal Government, and the training must be under the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may interrupt there without disturbing the Senator, of course the United States has to have the superior right to say whether it itself needs these troops.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Somebody has to say, and it is proper that the United States should say; and unless the United States says that it has use for them, then, under the language of the act which the Senator has cited, it is absolutely mandatory upon the United States to let the States use them when they request their use.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly; and the inference of the bill in this connection is that under the very provision of the Constitution which forbids a State from maintaining troops except with the permission of Congress, by this bill we give the States permission to maintain those troops for that purpose. The thing is in exact line with constitutional principles.

I started discussing costs and man power, and have been somewhat diverted; but I thought the Senate would be interested to know where the money is going and how much we are going to get for it.

So long as we expect to maintain a Regular Army of 300,000 men at present prices we will have to pay $525,000,000 a year to maintain it, and then we will not have a national defense. If another great crisis should overtake us, we would have to summon the citizen soldiers, fill up the ranks, train them after the war started, and spend money in the way that we did in this last war, and waste lives, which is worse.

Now, Mr. President, just for a moment I want to bring this picture to the Senate—about the cost of this thing:

The War Department spent $15,000,000,000 in the German War—that is, just for the Army $15,000,000,000. Now, let us assume for the purposes of easy computation that the Senate bill, instead of costing $677,000,000, will cost $700,000,000 per year. It will take 21 years for the cost of the Senate bill army to amount to what was spent in 18 months for our Army in this last war. Twenty-one years will have to go by, under the provisions of the Senate bill, before the taxpayers of the United States will have been called upon to pull out of their pockets a sum of money in the aggregate equal to the sum we had to pay for the Army alone in this war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know how prominent the Senator made this point, but, at any rate, I am going to reiterate it. If you have this system of training, necessarily all the equipment and training camps are kept in complete repair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If you do not have the system, when you want the training camps you have to do over again exactly what we did in this war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly. The Senator from Connecticut and I may not live to see the day, and we do not want to live to see it, and perhaps no man in this Chamber will ever again see a great war; but there is not a man in this Chamber who will get up and assert that there will never be another great war. And when it comes we will be confronted with exactly the same condition of affairs with which we were confronted on April 6, 1917. We will pile up another national debt of $25,000,000,000. We will summon by the draft—and there is no question about that—the young manhood of America and send them to the camps to teach them how to fight after the fight has commenced; and in the next war the chances are very much against our having great, powerful allies fighting off the enemy while we are getting ready.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, would it divert the Senator—he may have done this before, but I did not have the opportunity to hear him—to outline briefly the difference between the voluntary system, as he has referred to it at different times, in the House bill and the scheme proposed in this bill? Will the Senator give just a brief outline of the difference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The difference is just as the respective terms imply. Universal military training implies that every young man is and becomes liable to training, under the terms of the Senate bill. Voluntary training means that no young man is liable, but that any young man may train if he wants to. That is the difference.

Mr. EDGE. I understand that. The House bill provides a certain system for the voluntary training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a section of the national-defense act—which I think is section 54, which was put in in 1916—a provision which is left in the House bill—or perhaps it is enlarged upon—but that authorizes the Secretary of War to maintain training camps for civilian volunteers. No one can tell, of course, how many young men would volunteer. There might be 25,000; there might be 50,000; there might be 100,000. No one can tell. It will cost money, however, no matter how many there are, and the cost of it must be added to the cost of the House bill.

Mr. EDGE. Does not the Senator think that that, perhaps, would furnish a sufficient nucleus, even if only 25,000 or 50,000 volunteered, demonstrating their interest in military development, and thus becoming a nucleus for the officers necessary to have in case of future troubles, especially for the next two or three years, with the training we have already had the advantage of because of the war and because of raising the Army?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, every young man who takes training is an asset in the defense of his country in one way or another. If only 10,000 took it, we would be better off than if none took it. If 25,000 took it, all the better. If 100,000 took it, then you would be really beginning to accomplish something; but no one can tell how many will take it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator if the voluntary training system is not relatively more expensive?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Potentially it is much more expensive, because it will involve later on some demands for special treatment, special privilege, on the part of the man who volunteers to train to fit himself to defend his country.

Mr. THOMAS. We must have the machinery, the equipment, and the officers, of course, for training, whether we have the men or not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true. Whether you have the men or not, you must have the facilities ready for them. You can not tell until a week or two before the camp opens how many men are going to come in. The sure way, the economical way, the democratic way, the adequate way is to move according to the principle of universal obligation and universal opportunity. And I must say that when I look back over what we went through during the 18 months of this war, what we asked our young men to do under a selective-draft law when we went out and drafted them—and I believe in the draft law; I voted for it and spoke for it—when I remember that we had not given them an opportunity to train themselves in advance, when I remember the incidents that have been told to me as to what happened in France on many occasions, especially with the replacements, it constitutes an indictment against the American people.

We have no right to ask our men to go into battle without training. It ought not to be done. That is strong language, but I want to use it. It is true. What would the situation have been had we been compelled to go into battle against the Germans within a month or two after we declared war? It would have been slaughter, and everybody knows it. It took us 13 months and 3 weeks, my friends, to put the First Division over the top in France. Thirteen months and three weeks elapsed between America's declaration of war and the day upon which the famous First Division was deemed well enough trained to attack the enemy in force. What would we have done during those 13 months and 3 weeks had we had no allies? We can not count on such luck forever. I am confident, as every man here is confident, that no country on earth, and no combination of countries on earth, can actually conquer the United States. It can not be done. We are too big and strong. But why waste thousands and thousands of lives in defending this country against a combination when we can defend it just as well, and even better, without such waste of lives?

The only way you can defend it without waste of life, or comparative waste of life, in war—for, of course, war means death and destruction and loss of life—the only way you can wage war economically, so far as human life is concerned, is to give a chance to the young man who may have to be the soldier in that war to train himself before war starts. That is what the Committee on Military Affairs asks the Senate to consider. Are we going to fall back again into that old, complacent attitude that the war is over; that we were the victors; that we do not have to worry; that it will probably never happen again, and get careless about it and complacent about it? What man in the Senate seven years ago would have dared to prophesy that we were to have 2,000,000 men in France in the year 1918? Any man who prophesied such a thing would have been deemed crazy; and yet it happened. Will any man here prophesy that nothing of that sort will ever happen again? I think not. We hope it will not. It may not happen for fifty years or a hundred. The longer the better. But, as chances go, looking back over history, measuring the future by the past—and we have not any right to measure it by any other rule—some day the United States will once more be dragged into some great war, probably unsought, probably in self-defense; and my hope and prayer is that when that awful day comes, if it must come, we will not find ourselves in the situation in which we found ourselves on April 6, 1917. We have loaded ourselves and our descendants for generations to come with a national debt of $25,000,000,000 because we were not ready, even in the minutest degree, and I know, and other Senators know, that we wasted lives on the other side with men fighting our battles who were not trained sufficiently to have a decent chance for their lives in battle.

Mr. KNOX. Does not the Senator from New York believe that world conditions to-day make a future war more probable than was the case 10 years ago?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not sure that I know it, but I suspect it. One can not know about these things. Everybody realizes that the world is in an upset condition. I remember not very long ago hearing the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] say that the spirit of nationalism was more rife and rampant over the world to-day than ever before; and I think it is true. We can not tell what is going to happen. We do not want these catastrophes to overtake us. They are horrible things. War itself is a horror. But sometimes we can not help ourselves. I believe from the bottom of my heart, Senators, that it is the duty of this Government and this country to give its young men a decent chance for their lives if it is going to ask them to fight for the country. We have not a right to make them fight for this country and still deny them the right to fight effectively and have a chance for their lives.

We have had some testimony before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs that would make your hair stand on end about this matter of loss of life and waste of life. I have a letter in my desk, Mr. President, from an officer who commanded a battalion of one of our citizen regiments. That is what this Army was, an Army of citizens, not professionals. This officer commanded a battalion of our citizen soldiers. The night before his battalion was ordered to go over the top, the hand grenades were distributed among his men, and he writes me that he saw men receiving those hand grenades, and going to their sergeants and lieutenants and saying, "For Heaven's sake, how do I use this implement?" And he said that the next day he himself saw them carrying the grenades over the top, and grenades exploding in the hands of men who did not know how to use them.

Is that a fair deal for the young American? No. Whose fault is it? It is the fault of the Government and the people of the United States. You can not lay the fault upon some officer. You can not lay the fault upon some general. You can not lay the fault upon some Secretary of War. It is the fault of all of us, and it will happen again, and it may happen on a much larger scale, my friends, when it does happen the next time, in the event that we have not at our disposal 12 months to prepare to fight after the fight commences, which was the case in our last experience of war.

Economy! What is economy, Mr. President? Is not the saving of life a part of economy? Does not this picture of a national debt of $25,000,000,000 mean something in this discussion about economy, a national debt run up in 18 months?

Does it not seem the part of economy to spend the amounts which are suggested in both of these bills, Mr. President? The curious part of it is that the cost under the two bills is about equal. But is it not the part of economy to spend that sum for a system which will result in training a sufficient number of citizens of this country to enable this Government and this people to meet any emergency, and meet it economically, both as to lives and as to dollars?

Call it $700,000,000 per year, which is more than it can cost, admittedly, under the Senate bill. Once again I call your attention to the fact that we spent $15,000,000,000 on the Army alone in 18 months of war. Divide $15,000,000,000 by $700,000,000 and you will find that the smaller figure will go into the larger 21 times. In other words, it will take us 21 years, under the Senate bill, to spend as much money as we spent upon the Army in 18 months of war.

There is no answer, Mr. President, I submit, if you are going to discuss it upon the plane of economy. There is no answer if you are going to discuss it upon the plane of a square deal to your son and mine, sir, who may in the years to come be called out to defend you and me. There is no answer.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will allow a brief interruption, I recognize that a very strong argument can be made in favor of universal military training. The Senator has just referred to the fact that we expended $15,000,000,000 on the Army for certain purposes, and the conclusion which he would have the Senate draw is that if we had had universal military training we would not have had to expend that amount of money. I hardly think that is a fair conclusion to draw. Germany has had universal military training, of a different kind. France has had universal military training, of a different kind. But their universal military training did not relieve them from all these awful hardships. It did not relieve them from the dangers which appealed to us so much during the past several years.

The Senator has referred in his argument to a frightful incident, namely, the experience of these young soldier boys who were sent into battle without knowledge of how to use grenades. If we had had universal military training before we entered this war they would not have known how to use grenades. Our Civil War veterans, who spent four years in fighting and were certainly trained soldiers at the end of that war, did not know how to use grenades. It is not the lack of universal military training that led to the frightful experience of this officer with his men. It is a mighty sad commentary, however, upon the officers who sent those men into action under the circumstances. It seems to me that is the legitimate lesson to be drawn from the statement, rather than to say that it is an argument in favor of universal military training.

Prior to 1914 the art of war was entirely different from the art of war on November 11, 1918. These things ought to be borne in mind when we are counting the cost of universal military training. I understand that a certain amount of military training is necessary. I will not say necessary so much as advisable. But at this particular time, after the tremendous expense to which we have been put during the last three years and more, the question which addresses itself to me is, Ought we to do this now?

If we are going to do it at all, had we better not wait a little while before incurring this very large expense? That is one of the propositions that appeals to me. There is no system that we can devise that is going to shield this country from all danger, not if we have the very best military training in the world.

Now we have 4,000,000 men all trained. I understand the Senator's argument the other day to the effect that it is not fair to place the future burdens upon them, but in the event that we are preparing for any campaign at all, we should take into consideration the probabilities of needing this preparation in the immediate future, and, looking to that view of it, it seems to me that we can take into consideration the fact that we have the trained force, though it is now demobilized, and consider the further fact that it is improbable that within the next few years we are to get into serious trouble. In view of these facts we had better wait while we are trying to estimate the situation and come to a proper conclusion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio said something to the effect that it would have done no good had we had universal military training in the matter of hand grenades. Hand grenades had been used for two years in the European war before we entered it. No one on this side of the water seemed to be inspired with the thought that we might possibly get into that war and have to use hand grenades. However, I shall not discuss that.

Let me read from testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs given by a colonel of Infantry, a citizen soldier, Col. Donovan, who brought home the One hundred and sixty-fifth Infantry, perhaps more famous as the old Sixty-ninth New York, an outfit that certainly distinguished itself in this war as it did in the Spanish War and as it did in the Civil War. He had been preceded on the stand by Col. Hough, of another regiment of the Rainbow Division, who gave us some rather interesting information about the lack of training. Col. Donovan proceeds:

In substantiation of what Col. Hough has told you I would like to cite a concrete example of the untrained condition of the men that came in.

That is, the replacements.

It was after the Battle of Corpoil. I think we left 50 per cent of the combat battalion there.

That means the casualties were about 50 per cent.

After that fight I happened to be made a lieutenant colonel.

He was a major before that.

I commanded a battalion there. They were sent to us as replacements, and I personally questioned each replacement sent to us. Ninety per cent of those men were untrained. Ninety per cent of those men had never opened the bolt of their rifle; they had never had on a gas mask.

This is all a matter of public record.

We were told we were going up into the St. Mihiel fight. I got these men before us and I said, "Men, here is what we are going to do; now, I want to give you a chance for your lives. You men who are old men, it will do you no good if you have men by the side of you who are untrained. So I am going to ask you to do this." We marched at night for the battle line. We started at 9 o'clock and would march until 5 o'clock in the morning, and then I would let those men sleep until noon, and then I started in training them, and except when they stopped to eat, we trained them until 9 o'clock at night, when we again started on the march. What does that mean?

Speaking to the committee, Col. Donovan complimented us, and perhaps flattered us, by saying:

Let us take you men here, who are intelligent men. Say I am your sergeant in that fight. We are told to go out and take a machine-gun nest. Think what you would do.

I wish Col. Donovan were right here now and could say this face to face to Senators:

The first idea would be the idea of fear that comes to every one of us; there is no use denying it. The next thought would be the gregarious instinct; men will huddle together like sheep, making the surest target for a machine gun. Now, if you were to put on uniforms, do you think that would change your character any?

Mr. President, in most of our wars we have asked our men to change their character by putting on a uniform, and we have regarded them as trained soldiers fit to defend the country as soon as we have recruited them into the ranks. This is a vivid story of what can happen, and what actually did happen, with this splendid regiment which received, after the River Ourcq Battle, of whom Col. Donovan said 90 per cent had never opened the bolts of their rifles.

We may excuse officers for not teaching men how to use a hand grenade, for it is asserted that the hand grenade is a weapon only two or three years old; but what about the rifle? Col. Hough, of an Ohio regiment, Forty-second Division, one of the splendid Infantry regiments that fought alongside of our New York regiment, testifies to exactly the same state of affairs in his regiment.

Mr. President, that gives one pause. That was after we had been at war 14 months. The first men who went over and took part in the line were well trained, but in our terriffic haste to send replacements and fill up the service of supply and to man all the posts and all the duties that have to be manned in a tremendous army in the time of a great war, we found ourselves compelled to go on fighting with replacements only half trained and in some instances not trained at all.

My contention has been that if all the men we drafted to go into the war against Germany had at some prior time, within five years of the date of the declaration of that war, spent four months in a training camp and upon graduation therefrom had been assigned in their home towns to a unit of organized reserves, each man knowing his place, that they would have gone into this last war and within four or five weeks thereafter would have picked up all that they had learned in the four months' training two or three years before that time, added the latest wrinkles in many respects, and would have been able to defend the country, colloquially speaking, at the drop of the hat.

Without some prior training, if we are ever attacked by a first-class power we will find that within the first two or three months of the war our little Regular Army will be wiped off the map. It can not be maintained large enough to defend the country, and then we will have to throw into the vortex of battle men who will go there in the condition described by Col. Donovan. That is a day which I should dislike to see overtake the youth of America. I face such a prospect with horror, and I hope—I suppose not this year, because I know the opposition to the bill and I know the peculiar situation in this particular year—but I hope the time will come when the American people will see to it that their men are trained to defend the country and are trained in such way that, incidentally, they will have gotten out of that training the tremendous physical benefit and tremendous advantage which will come from the educational and vocational features of the training.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no doubt a number of instances, just such as that to which the Senator from New York has referred, could be given. I know Col. Hough very well. He was formerly our adjutant general in the State of Ohio, and he is one of the soldiers of whom we are very proud in Ohio. He served with the Rainbow Division and rendered valiant service.

But if the conditions were as described by the other officer, Col. Donovan, whose testimony has just been read, and I do not doubt that, I take it that the tragedy which occurred as the result of the nonpreparedness of those soldiers was not so much due to the nonpreparedness of the soldiers as it was due to the negligence of the superior officers who sent that class of men to the front.

We were advised by Field Marshal Joffre, and by Brig. Gen. Bridges, who came over here representing the British Army, that men should have nine months' training before they went into battle under present conditions. Now, sir, if that amount of training is necessary in order to have an army such as we would have, fully equipped for war, why do we stop at four months' training?

I am not underestimating the value of training. If I had sons, I would want them to have the training; but under our civilization it is quite a different proposition for me to say that because that is my judgment, therefore every other man's son shall go to camp for this length of time. I do not think that the four months' training, even, will equip a man for service when he has to confront such engines of war as we now have. I can not anticipate what kind of engines of war we are going to have in the future.

But when we are speaking of horrors that have come to us because we were a peace-loving Nation, and because we did not have universal military training, if we are going to take proper notice of the situation, let us look at the other nations which had universal military training, such as Germany and such as France. I think I can sense the situation, and I sometimes think that if there had been no universal military training in Germany the world's civilization would not have been overtaken by the hordes of the German Empire.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator has twice stated that Germany and France had universal military training or service. Germany and France had conscription and compulsory military service for two or three years. Every citizen had to serve in the army. This is far different. This is simply a training for four months.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I understand that, and I made that statement a while ago.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I beg the Senator's pardon, if that is the fact.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps I did not speak of conscription, but I spoke of the system of universal military training over there. I understand that. As I have said, a very strong argument can be made on both sides of the proposition; but what I am finding fault with is that there seems to be a disposition on the part of those who are favoring the pending bill to say that all of our catastrophes were due to the fact that we did not have universal military training.

Mr. President, I do not know that I care to discuss this question; in fact, I had not intended to do so this afternoon, but I desired to refer to these matters, and have referred to them because I do not think that if we adopt the proposed system of military training it is going to be a panacea for all the ills to which our national flesh may be heir. When we are trying to provide for the future, necessarily we are dealing in probabilities. Of course, if we knew we were to become involved in another war within the twelvemonth we would pursue one policy, and if we knew that we were not going to become involved in another war for 20 years we would pursue a different policy. At the present time, with 4,000,000 of the best-trained men that the world has ever seen, I can not understand why we should add to our present financial burdens by fastening upon the country a system of universal military training without knowing what the public generally may think about it. Some men may say they know; perhaps they do. My guess is that if it were a question to be determined by the public the verdict would be against the authors of this bill. I am not, however, so much concerned about that——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a moment—except for the fact that I feel very deeply that at the present time we ought not unnecessarily to add to the taxation of the country. Now I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him, while he is on the floor, how much, in his opinion, it would have reduced the enormous expense of $15,000,000,000 for the Army in the war with Germany if every man had had military training and had been ready to go into the war? The war came on us, with all of its attendant expenses; but how much would those expenses have been reduced by the fact of our having had a system of military training in operation in this country?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if we were to judge by some of the arguments which have been made in this Chamber on behalf of this bill, there would have been no expense at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is what I was aiming at.

Mr. POMERENE. But I suspect that the existence of such a system would not have substantially reduced the expense of the war. I understand that it is a part of military training to know how to drill and to know how to shoot a gun.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. And to have a gun furnished.

Mr. POMERENE. And to have a gun furnished; but that is not all that is contemplated now by the phrase "military training."

Mr. KIRBY and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I have understood that there was some thought of taking a recess or having an executive session. If that be true, I shall not speak this evening. Otherwise, I shall proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator from New York if he prefers to go on this evening? There is a desire to hold an executive session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that an executive session is desired. I assume, or at least I hope, that this particular phase of the bill may be voted on to-morrow at some time. There is no disposition to debate it at great length.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York is agreeable, I should like on to-morrow to speak on the universal training phase of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I shall be more than happy to have the Senator from New Jersey speak. I have no control of that. I could not stop him if I desired to do so.

Mr. KIRBY. I have been recognized to speak, but in view of the request of the Senator from Utah, I yield the floor for the motion for an executive session, expecting to speak to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. In that case, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 8, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 7, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, above all, through all, and in us all, abide with us to strengthen us when we are weak, to check us when we are rash, to comfort us in our sorrows and assuage our grief.

Deepen our faith, strengthen our hope, that we may live in Thy love, do our duty as it is given us to see it, and thus meet all the changes of this life and be prepared to meet our destiny in the life eternal. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BURIAL OF DECEASED SOLDIERS.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4082) to amend section 4878 of the Revised Statutes as amended by the act of March 3, 1897.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill read?

Mr. GARD. Let us have the bill read, so that we may know what it is about.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that he does not think the reading of the bill would give much information, and he suggests that the gentleman from Vermont make a statement about it.

Mr. GARD. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, all this bill does is to amend the existing law providing for the burial in national cemeteries of deceased soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been in the service of the United States by extending its provisions to include certain deceased citizens of the United States who served in the army or navy of any Government at war with Germany or Austria during the World War. In other words, it enables our own boys who were in the armies of the Allies and who died to be buried in our national cemeteries under the same privilege that we now extend to those who served in our own Army or Navy. The reason for haste in the passage of the bill is that there are a number of bodies on the way from Europe, and it is hoped to get this bill passed in time to take care of them in this way. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. I was going to ask the gentleman why it is necessary to pass this bill now, but the gentleman has answered my question.

Mr. GARD. Is this privilege limited to American citizens who served in the armies of the Allies?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is absolutely limited to them. That is the only change of existing law.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have been asked if any provision has been made for markers of the graves of those who died in this war, as has been provided for the dead soldiers of the Civil War? Can the gentleman give me any information as to that?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will turn to the annual sundry civil appropriation act he will find that there is in that act always a provision for expenses of burial in these national cemeteries and for the furnishing of what is known as the Government marker, so that all who get public burial in national cemeteries can have these markers over their graves.

Mr. McKEOWN. There is a provision of law by which markers are sent out to mark the graves of deceased soldiers of the Civil War buried elsewhere?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Wherever they may be buried.

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have no personal knowledge as to whether anything has been done recently to cover the soldiers of this war in that respect or not.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It is now a year and a half since the last gun was fired, since the armistice was signed, and yet no provision whatever has been made for returning the dead soldiers now buried in what is called the "prohibited area" in France. All we have is an indefinite policy asserted by the Secretary of War. My constituents are insisting on their dead being returned. Why can we not have some definite action on that proposition?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will talk with the War Department and get some announcement of policy from them, the Committee on Military Affairs will be very glad to be informed of it.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman by this bill is making a policy concerning the one subject therein contained.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no. This relates to the bodies of soldiers not now in our custody but in the care of the Governments in whose armies they served. These men were not in our armies. They were in the armies of the Allies.

Mr. BLANTON. If we can do by legislation what this bill does, why can we not establish the kind of a policy that our constituents want with respect to the bringing back of our dead, rather than to wait upon the policy of the War Department, which up to this time does not meet with the wishes either of ourselves or of our constituents?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I hope the gentleman from Texas does not expect me to defend the policy of his administration's War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but the gentleman is in a position to help control on his majority side the legislation that comes before this House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I shall be very glad to do my little part toward any legislation that will satisfy the proper desires of the American people to have their soldier dead brought home under any practicable circumstances.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the statement made by the Secretary of War to Senator WADSWORTH in the Senate committee.

Mr. BLANTON. I am familiar with that statement, but that does not bring back now what my people want—their sacred dead in France. That is still in the future.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4878 of the Revised Statutes, as amended by the act of March 3, 1897 (ch. 378, 29 Stat. L., p. 625), be, and it hereby is, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4878. All soldiers, sailors, or marines dying in the service of the United States, or dying in a destitute condition after having been honorably discharged from the service, or who served, or hereafter shall have served, during any war in which the United States has been, or may hereafter be, engaged, and, with the consent of the Secretary of War, any citizen of the United States who served in the army or navy of any government at war with Germany or Austria during the World War and who died while in such service or after honorable discharge therefrom, may be buried in any national cemetery free of cost. The production of the honorable discharge of a deceased man in the former case, and a duly executed permit of the Secretary of War in the latter case, shall be sufficient authority for the superintendent of any cemetery to permit the interment. Army nurses honorably discharged from their service as such may be buried in any national cemetery, and, if in a destitute condition, free of cost. The Secretary of War is authorized to issue certificates to those Army nurses entitled to such burial."

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GREENE of Vermont, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REREFERENCE OF RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the rereference of House joint resolution 315 and House resolution 496. They were referred to the Committee on Rules. They refer to the adjustment of pay for our discharged soldiers and should have been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, these resolutions when I introduced them were marked for the Ways and Means Committee, but for some reason or other they were sent to the Committee on Rules. The rereference is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, do they involve any question of insurance?

Mr. LITTLE. No; nothing about insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, everything usually goes to the Committee on Rules anyway, and it was just force of habit that sent the bills there.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does not House resolution 496 direct the Attorney General to make an investigation of a certain corporation?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; it requires the Attorney General to hold in status quo certain property of this corporation until that property can be assessed or taken over and adjustment made.

Mr. WALSH. That resolution does not belong to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Undoubtedly it does; it is a source of taxation.

Mr. WALSH. It belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary; it directs the Attorney General to make an investigation.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In any event, it does not belong to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WALSH. I think that is true.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this matter can be satisfactorily adjusted if it is taken up with the members of the various committees interested, and the request can be made at some future time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If there is objection to pressing the request now, I have no objection to deferring it. I was anxious that these resolutions should be pending before the committee that has jurisdiction of the legislation adjusting soldiers' pay.

AIRCRAFT.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, Col. Hensley, of the United States Army, has recently returned from abroad, where he made an extensive study of the aircraft and aeronautical situation. He has a number of photographs, motion as well as still life—pictures showing the great German Bodensee now making daily flights, and other dirigibles. He feels and I feel that he has a very interesting and instructive message, which I doubt not Members of Congress will be glad to hear. In presenting his pictures he speaks on the subject so that those interested may have the benefit of his study, both by picture and by description. The Speaker has very kindly allowed him the use of the House caucus room to-morrow night at 8 o'clock, where he will deliver his discourse and show the pictures, and where Members of Congress and their friends will be most welcome. [Applause.]

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed, and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 319 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

CONFERENCE REPORT—POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill (H. R. 11578) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota presents a conference report on the Post Office appropriation bill for printing under the rule.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY—FARM LOAN ACT.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday and the call rests with the Committee on Banking and Currency. The unfinished business is the bill H. R. 8038, to amend section 4 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, extending its provisions to Porto Rico. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] will assume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8038) to extend the farm-loan act to Porto Rico, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has 12 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] 27 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend the farm loan act and extend its provisions to Porto Rico. As I understand it, there are three or four hundred million dollars which have already been loaned through the farm-loan bank to the citzens of the United States proper. The farm-loan act has received from time to time severe criticism. I voted for it when it was enacted. Even in the United States, with all of the safeguards that are thrown around its loans, upon the floor of this House the loans have been criticized very greatly as being not authorized in the spirit of the law, and the charge has been made that lands in the West, the South, and the North have been practically sold to the Farm Loan Board at prices beyond their value. I do not believe this charge is universally well founded, but I have no doubt that in some cases it is well founded. This amendment seeks to extend this act to Porto Rico. It is said that the citizens of Porto Rico are citizens of the United States. That is true. The citizens of the Sandwich Islands are citizens of the United States also, but as I understand it the Sandwich Islands Territorial government has enacted a farm-loan act of their own, divorced from our Federal farm-loan act. I am told the Legislature of Porto Rico passed a farm-loan act, and that it was vetoed by the Governor. It may be that we have authority and probably have to pass a Federal farm-loan act for Porto Rico, and I have no objection to so doing, but when you pass this act that makes farm loans in Porto Rico a part of our responsibility in the United States, it means that if there are losses there, then every borrower under our act in the United States must help to pay those losses. Let every tub stand on its own bottom. I have a warm spot in my heart for Porto Rico. Her settlement is older than our settlement in the United States. I have been down there three times. I have seen some change for the better down there.

The lands of Porto Rico are held largely under grants dating back to the early Spanish times. The population has not changed greatly, though it has somewhat improved, but there is a great deal of chance for further improvement. I am ready to vote for a bill, if it be offered, such as would authorize a Federal farm-loan bank for Porto Rico, but I am not willing, with the distance between this country and Porto Rico, that we should become responsible everywhere in the United States under the farm-loan bank act we have here for losses that may be sustained in Porto Rico. I want to say to you candidly that they are not in as good condition as we are. They have better roads than we have and they have made some progress.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. Will this bill before us make our Government here, our people, responsible for any losses which may occur in Porto Rico?

Mr. CANNON. As I understand it, that is its object, and I await contradiction if that is not right. What have we done for Porto Rico? She has free entrance into the United States without one cent of tax for her coffee, her tobacco, her fruit, and her sugar. We levy duties on all the world upon most of the products of Porto Rico, which enter the United States free of duty when they enter the customhouse. That is a great privilege, and Porto Rico is a great tobacco-growing, a great sugar-growing, and a great tropical-fruit producing country. I think she is getting along fairly well considering her population, and I have no stones to throw at her population. The Indians have disappeared. The population down in Porto Rico is white, colored, mixed, and they are a kindly-disposed people. One gentleman said the other day that she helped us fight this war. Yes, she did; and I am as much responsible for their helping us fight in this war with their regiment as any other man in Congress, and I think, perhaps, in the United States. I was Speaker of this House when a proposition came from the Senate in the shape of an amendment to disband the Porto Rican Regiment. We managed to turn it down in the House. That regiment became a great regiment. The son of a former Member of Congress is entitled to great credit, Maj. Townsend, who has been down there for 25 years. The regiment went to Panama. It is a good regiment. It was disciplined, it was fed, it was brave, and all that. I take off my hat to that regiment. It is no better than our regiments, but it is quite as competent to fight as ours were, and it did great service in Panama during the construction of the canal and during the late war. I want to say to you, measuring my words, on the last visit down there we found the islands pretty hysterical. They treated us very well. They chalked our hats when we went down there. The leader of that journey was the present chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs, an able man, a patriotic man. We had all kinds of requests presented to us and advocated. There were banners which were inscribed demanding self-determination hung at different places as we rode around over the roads of the island. One faction said on its banner, "We want to be independent," and another faction said, "We want to remain with the United States." They are with the United States and we are responsible for them.

But let me tell you one thing. We are responsible for Cuba. She wrote it in her constitution that if she did not keep law and order that we would, and we have been back there once after we cleaned them up and we have said that she shall not contract debts without our permission——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I will yield the gentleman, how much time?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, just a minute or two.

Mr. WINGO. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, five minutes is ample.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I will tell you what is needed there. One thing they need, and we can help them work it out, is a regular line of steamers between Porto Rico and the United States that will bring their products to the United States. They have suffered on this account during the war as we suffered for the need of a sufficient merchant marine, but we have the wherewith to supply that want. Now, they are not as competent for self-government as we are. They have it. We can turn down their legislation if we desire so to do. We have got a governor down there. It may be that they ought to have a governor of their own, but I am not discussing that question now; but for their good and our good they should not be permitted to have our guardianship through the Springfield bank over them first, and, second, when loans are made, as we can not trust them to run their local land banks as we trust our people, to elect trustees and so on to do their business, that is all transferred up to the bank at Springfield. Well, now, if they ought to have that at all they ought to be capable of managing it there, and there ought to be other legislation enacted in Porto Rico adapted to their conditions and their intelligence. And that I will vote for, if I get an opportunity to do so, by way of amendment or on a motion to recommit, but I will not vote to make the farmers in Illinois, in Nevada, in Nebraska, in our States north and south, responsible for loans that are made in Porto Rico, for I think in that respect every tub ought to stand on its own bottom. You ought not to desire to put this responsibiliy by legislation upon other organizations throughout the length and breadth of this country, extend it to Porto Rico, and make them responsible without the agreement of our constituents after their attention has been called to it. It would be unjust for them and improper for us. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. I am with the gentleman, and I think he is right about it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield back what time may remain?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has no time to yield back.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed his time.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG]. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as a Representative from one of the best agricultural districts in this Union I am heartily in sympathy and in favor of protecting and perpetuating the farm loan act, and both as a Member of this House and as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee I want it distinctly understood that my efforts and what little influence I possess will be for the purpose of perfecting and increasing the usefulness of the farm loan act. [Applause.] I do not believe that this amendment will affect it or hurt it in any way.

During the Christmas adjournment of the Congress I visited Porto Rico, a wonderful country, a country that is wonderfully fertile and rich. It is a country mostly of mountain and dale, much of it very rough, but the mountains are cultivated almost to their peaks. I saw farms there—tobacco farms—high up on the sides of the mountains, at an angle perhaps of 40 or 50 degrees where a man would have to stand with one foot below the other in order to hoe the tobacco or other crops. In all that trip that we took throughout that island, about 130 miles, I did not see any field that was not properly cultivated and free from weeds. The large tracts of land are taken up and used by the Tobacco Trust, who are the big landowners, but the Porto Ricans themselves are a very industrious, hard-working people. The fields belonging to them are small but clean and well cultivated, but they lack improved tools with which to work and good houses. During a little banquet given our delegation there I was very much impressed by a statement made by one of the senators of that island to the effect that the people of the island had progressed under the 20 years of the jurisdiction of the United States more than they had in the 400 years they were under Spanish rule, and it seemed to me that, that being the case, they being an industrious people and that being a rich island, producing products that we need—coffee, sugar, and tropical fruits—that we should do everything we can to continue and increase the prosperity there, and increase such production and their trade with us. As we went over the island, I found that the common people—the poorer class—owned very small farms. I want to call your attention to the hearings had on this bill, where it is shown, on page 11 of the hearings, that of the 58,000 owners of farms on the island 43,000 owners have farms of less than 20 acres. That being the case, the question of the real prosperity of the island turns to the small owners. The large landowners are those who own the tobacco and large sugar cane and large fruit lands, and are the rich men of the island. The trouble with the island of Porto Rico is that under Spanish rule the rich governed, and this is still true to-day; as Speaker CANNON has said, a small per cent of the people control and govern. Six per cent of the people are rich and govern the island and 94 per cent are poor and are the workers. These are the men who live on these little farms—20,000 of them on farms under 5 acres. These are the men who need help. It is said that these men on these little farms, in order to get their seed, have to go to their merchants and mortgage their crops, and then as they get their groceries, meat, and clothing during the year their account is increased, and they are charged 12, 15, and even 20 per cent interest. As a result, when the harvest time appears their crops are taken from them, and they are still poor. This retards production and improvement.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. And in addition the merchandise they buy carries a high rate of profit, too?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENSON. And in addition to the 12 to 20 per cent rate of interest?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. My friend is right. They charge not only a profit on the goods, but high interest on the account. Now, to relieve this condition they come to us and ask us to permit them to have the benefit of the farm loan act. Gentlemen, Porto Rico is a part of our country, its people are under our flag. In the late war they furnished their quota of Liberty bonds and raised their share of troops. Their lands are rich. We need their products to help reduce the high cost of foods which we can not raise ourselves. Why should we not permit the Springfield Bank to assist their condition and relieve them from the usurer? We relieve the downtrodden and oppressed of other lands, can we refuse to care for our own, for this island of Porto Rico is a part of the United States?

The Springfield Bank has said that it has the money to loan down there, and it has investigated conditions and agreed that if it can be permitted to do so it will extend its operations to Porto Rico.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from New York has seven minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Arkansas 12.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield one more minute to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The conditions that I have described being true, when this amendment came before our committee we thought that this Government should carry out the purpose of the farm-loan act by extending it to those farmers who are struggling to better their condition in Porto Rico, but believing that only the small farmer needed our help we made this amendment, namely, we reduced the amount that could be loaned to $5,000. Now, gentlemen, in a country as rich as that, where they will make loans of not to exceed $5,000, does anyone believe that the great farm-loan system of America will be jeopardized or hindered by permitting the Springfield, Mass., farm-loan bank to make loans to those people by reducing the rates of interest to them, which relieve their burden, make them independent and enable them to become increased producers and bring their products to our shores? It seems to me that we ought to do this.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask your attention, too, to the fact that the money must be paid back in 20 instead of 40 years, so that 10 per cent reduction is made each year.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is also true.

Mr. RUCKER. What is the value of those 20-acre farms?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I can not tell the gentleman that. It all depends on their location and the state of cultivation, but good farm land is worth from $50 to $150 per acre.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, as some of the Members were not present the other day when I stated my objection to the bill, I will state that the objections are not incurable, and that I intend to offer a motion to recommit which I think will meet every one of them. Now, let us see what the proposition is. Let us see what the bill proposes. The bill proposes to authorize the Federal farm land bank at Springfield, Mass., to establish a branch of that bank in Porto Rico, to make loans not exceeding $5,000, and to run for not exceeding 20 years. Now, you ask, is there anything wrong with that? Certainly not. I am perfectly willing that we should have a branch bank in Porto Rico, notwithstanding the fact that we refused to give it to Hawaii, notwithstanding the fact that the Hawaiians and the Filipinos and others have banks of their own. Yet I am perfectly willing that the Springfield land bank, in spite of the fact that its business is not profitable and it has a deficit this year of $38,000, should go into Porto Rico, provided you will not make the Federal land banks of the United States other than the Springfield, Mass., bank, the farm loan associations of Kansas, Iowa, Illinois, and Arkansas responsible, and, they being responsible, make each farmer who has a loan in those States responsible to the amount of the subscribed capital stock that he is compelled to take in his local association in order to get his loan. I say I do not object to Porto Rico having a bank, but I do object to making the farmers of this country liable for the farm loans of the citizens of Porto Rico.

But gentlemen say, "You are not fair to Porto Rico." You may search the debates of last week and not find a thing spoken by me damaging to Porto Rico. The most damaging things said have been said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], who has just left the floor. They have detailed the economic conditions down there. But let me tell you gentlemen something. In spite of the criticism of the Farm Loan Board of this country, they have been so stringent and so strict that to-day in the United States some of the richest farms that a crow ever flew over can not get a loan from the land banks of the United States. I know a great basin of a great river in the Southwest whose lands are as rich as the valley of the Nile, that has been barred from loans under the farm loan system. And yet gentlemen say that that board that has some discretion and has barred some of the richest farms of the United States from the provisions of the act can go and make loans down in Porto Rico. And according to the gentleman who has just left the floor the Tobacco Trust owns the best lands in Porto Rico, and he tells you that the mountain-side 5-acre farms are the ones that want relief.

Gentlemen, think of that! It is a fact that those small 5-acre farms are the ones that they want to help. They may loan $5,000, a thousand dollars an acre, if general restriction does not apply, in Porto Rico, on lands that are not rich enough for the Tobacco Trust to gobble up, and yet you want to tie that business on the farm-loan system of this country.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. For that reason we limited the amount that might be loaned to $5,000. The Tobacco Trust, and others owning the large tracts, would not want to borrow $5,000.

Mr. WINGO. He is willing to loan a thousand dollars an acre on the hillsides of Porto Rico, and yet he can not get to-day over a hundred dollars an acre upon the lands of Kansas under the present operation of the present land bank.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The same rule that applies to Kansas applies to Porto Rico.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it not a fact that these loans are to be made under the general terms of the Federal farm loan act, which provides that not more than 50 per cent of the value of the land can be loaned on?

Mr. WINGO. I suggest that the gentleman read the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. He is the author of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know anything about this gentleman's speech.

Mr. WINGO. He is the author of the bill, really. I am calling attention to the conditions that you talk about, which you said prevailed. I said let them have their bank, but I am not willing to tie up the farm lands of the United States. That is my objection.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly, I will yield to my friend.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman tell me why it is that he says that something I have said authorized such a statement as that loans of $1,000 an acre could be made on lands in Porto Rico?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman did not understand me to make any such statement. He may have so understood me, but he misunderstood.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well. What statement is it that I made that the gentleman contends is the authority for his statement?

Mr. WINGO. What particular statement does the gentleman complain of? Did the gentleman hear the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]?

Mr. TOWNER. I am not complaining of anything.

Mr. WINGO. What is the gentleman's question, then?

Mr. TOWNER. This is what I understood: The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] asked if the same rule would not obtain in the loan on property in Porto Rico that obtained in the United States, and you understood the answer to that question was "I do not know." Something that "the gentleman from Iowa" said seems to have caused doubt in your mind. Now, what is that?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman was talking about restrictions thrown around it, and he is author of the bill, and his remarks answer the question of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. WINGO. But let us get away from that. Let us assume that it is a perfectly safe kind of business. Let us assume that they will put on a restriction of $50 an acre. Let us assume that the loans are all right, although there may be a loss in that new country. Let us brush everything aside. Why is it that these people who want this act passed are not willing to accept an amendment providing that the farmers of the United States who entered these local associations and subscribed to the stock and who are liable thereby to the extent of their capital stock, and their local associations which are liable for the debts of the bank, and each land bank is liable for the debts of all the land banks—why are they not willing to accept an amendment to exempt them from that liability and let the branch land bank of Porto Rico stand on its own resources?

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that in my State, for example, if there is a defalcation of the Federal land bank of $60,000, the land-bank people all over the United States are going to have to make good that defalcation? Does the loss of a loan in Texas or in Arkansas cause a loss to the loans of the farmers in Arkansas and Texas?

Mr. WINGO. I made a full statement the other day. I think the gentleman was not present at the time. If he had been here when I opened my remarks to-day, perhaps he would have understood. If the gentleman will look at pages 10 and 11 of the Federal farm loan act, he will find a statement of the liabilities contained there. They are these: Suppose any borrower wants a loan. Before he can borrow he must join a local association and subscribe to a certain percentage of the capital stock. In turn the local association has to join the organization of the Federal Land Bank Association, and has to subscribe to the stock of the Federal land bank to the same percentage; and the law provides that each farmer who borrows is liable for the debts of his local association to an amount equal to the capital stock of the local association which he owns, and which he is compelled to take in order to get a loan. Then in turn each association is liable to the amount of the capital stock it owns in the farm loan bank, or the debts of the farm loan bank; and under section 21 each and every farm loan bank in the United States is liable for all the debts and bonds and defalcations of all the other banks, so that you can see that the farmer is liable in the end. He is the man that would stand the loss in Porto Rico, because he is the man that owns the stock.

Mr. BEE. That condition that applies in the United States would be prevented, then, by the gentleman through a restrictive provision as to Porto Rico?

Mr. WINGO. Yes. The gentleman was not here when I first entered Congress and is not familiar with the fight I made for rural credits. I find to-day the same Democrats, as well as Republicans, who then sneered at rural credits and accepted the present law by virtue of a political necessity, supporting this bill. Men who are opposed to exemption from taxation of the farm-loan bonds of the United States are willing to exempt from taxation these Porto Rican loans and in addition make the farmers of this country responsible for these loans. The enemies of the present system have dragged it into the Supreme Court of the United States, where to-day the life of the farm-loan system hangs in the balance. To-day no single application can be acted upon, because they can not float their bonds, because they are waiting to see what the Supreme Court of the United States will do. The enemies of the system have forced this litigation. They want to break down this system, and they want to destroy it. I want to uphold it so as to maintain the economic strength of the United States. I say you ought to be willing to restrict this by amendment, so that the farmers of your State and my State will not be liable for a five-acre coffee plantation on a mountain side down in Porto Rico. Is there anything unreasonable about that?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call your attention now to the language we suggested. This is what I said:

> We guard these loans by saying that they must be approved by an American regional bank. The American regional bank can not make any of these loans without sending their appraisers to pass upon the character of the applicant, to make a personal examination with regard to the condition of the property and the amount of the security and the condition of the title. All of those things are guarded. So it would seem as if we were carefully guarding against any loss that might occur, even more carefully guarding against any possible loss that might occur than we do with regard to our own banks in the United States.

Is that what the gentleman referred to?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; that is what I referred to. I do not know about all the provisions in this bill, and I am not going to go into it in detail. I have only one line of opposition. I shall offer a motion to recommit, that will relieve from liability of the local associations of this country and the local borrowers, and let Porto Rico stand on its own footing. Those who are friends of the farm-loan system will naturally vote for such a provision, while the enemies of the farm-loan system, who are supporting the efforts of the private mortgage companies to kill it—and, if they can not kill it, load it down so as to weaken it—will vote against my motion. I shall force a roll call and let the record show where you stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to make a few observations on the pending bill. I wish to say, in the first place, that we should, as a Congress, address ourselves in a most earnest way to the burning question everywhere expressed in our Nation to-day of reducing, as far as possible, the high cost of living. This can not be done through legislation entirely, if at all, except by such legislation as will make for initiative and in aiding and improving our productive energies. One of the real essentials of our national life to-day is a larger production and a larger conservation of our resources; elimination of waste and discontinuance of extravagance; and especially to increase the production from the farm, which, Mr. Chairman, I think we are all agreed, is the very foundation stone upon which all productive activities and industries are built, and whose products help to reduce the high cost of living. Indeed, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that Congress should inaugurate at the very earliest possible moment a constructive policy along the lines of aiding increased production. Our slogan should be not decreased hours of labor and constantly increasing wages, but rather a spirit of doing anything and everything on the farm, in the factory, in the counting room, and in the business mart generally that will increase production in order that the demand for the necessities of life shall be provided and that the distribution of material, social, and spiritual happiness shall everywhere be enhanced. Indeed, one of the real constructive pieces of legislation that our American people demand from Congress to-day is legislation along the line provided for in this bill, and I wish to say that I am ready to support this bill because it is along the line of a constructive policy. I wish to say, further, that the two outstanding legislative enactments of the past to help increased production are the Federal reserve act, which has given to our commercial life the possibility of extension of credits which has enabled us to meet the tremendous strain of the past four or five years, and the enactment of the Federal farm-loan act, which we are attempting to amend to-day by this bill.

The Federal farm-loan act has enabled vast regions of farming lands in America to be utilized to their highest capacity and to reduce rates to a minimum. It has done away with the extreme rates charged by greedy loan sharks and by unscrupulous capitalistic combinations, and has stabilized the rates of interest on all farm loans throughout the entire Nation. It is, therefore, easy to see that anything that extends this act to Porto Rico as a part of our own country and a part of our own citizenship, in order to enable them to rise from their present condition of poverty and distress in their economic struggle and to enhance the productivity of the soil and to make it possible for the poor man with the small farms, from 5 to 50 or 100 acres, to obtain capital at reasonable rates, will put Porto Rico in a position to utilize in its highest degree its rich productive soil and to enlarge the necessities of life, not only for its own upbuilding but for export purposes to our own States.

Agriculture is the foundation of all our activities and must never be permitted to lag, and while it is true that the Federal farm loan act is in a sense a subsidy to the agricultural interests, it is absolutely defensible upon the basis that we must increase our rural populations in order that our agricultural production shall be enhanced so that it can support our ever-growing populations in our industrial centers.

The Federal farm loan bank act has brought blessings in the highest degree to the farmers of our own country by enabling them to get money at a reasonable rate and making the rates universal throughout the several States of the Nation. In the brief time allotted me I shall not be able to go into details, but I wish to call your attention to-day to the fact that this bill is simply to extend the present beneficent influence of the Federal land bank act to the peoples of Porto Rico, who are to-day struggling under a tremendous handicap in developing their small farms and industrial activities.

It has been stated here that Porto Rico is not a part of our people, and that we are legislating not for ourselves but for foreigners. This is absolutely untrue, as Porto Rico is as much a part of our Nation as any of our States. They are American citizens in every sense of the word, and our Nation should extend to these people every possibility within the limitations of safety for development and growth.

The island is rich in agricultural possibilities and its national wealth, we are told, is about $250,000,000; that its public debt is only about $11,000,000; that it has in actual cultivation about 500,000 acres, ranging from farms of from 5 acres to a thousand acres. We are further told that in this rich agricultural island, with its very loyal, patriotic, and teachable people anxious to improve, anxious to be instructed by the United States in the betterment of their conditions, we have wonderful agricultural possibilities. We are told that of 58,371 properties 46,779 are cultivated by actual owners and only about 1,200 by managers and only 10,442 by renters. This is a most wonderful situation, considered from an agricultural point of view, and we should encourage in every possible way these small landowners to cultivate to the highest degree of intensity their small possessions, which average about 38 acres apiece.

America should aid Porto Rico in order that the staple productions might flow freely and in large quantities to our own country. Consider the sugar famine at the present time. Porto Rico is eminently a sugar-producing country. Enhance the possibilities of sugar production among these small farmers by assisting them with small loans, and you will help to a large degree to reduce the high cost of sugar in our own country. The amount of money per capita is very limited in Porto Rico. The poor man has no possibilities at the present time of obtaining financial aid. What aid he can obtain comes largely from merchants, who are sapping the very vitality out of the agricultural population through excessive rates. The banks of Porto Rico at the present time are charging exorbitant rates for loans from the small citizens of the island, rates running from 12 to 24 per cent. Such rates are prohibitive in encouraging production and in making agricultural extensions possible.

It is our duty, in my humble opinion, to give to Porto Rico to-day the same privileges and the same opportunities in developing their small farms and agricultural resources that we are extending to our own people in the States. One of the speakers, Mr. Chairman, has stated on the floor to-day that Porto Rico should stand on her own bottom without leaning in any sense on the Federal Land Bank System of the United States. Such a statement, Mr. Chairman, is absolutely selfish. We do not make it apply to our own States. As well might you say that North Dakota should stand on her own bottom; that Minnesota should stand on her own bottom; that Wisconsin should stand on her own bottom; or that Illinois should stand on her own bottom. But the Federal land act does not propose that the several States shall stand isolated, but in combining their resources and in combining all their possibilities we make it possible to enhance agricultural production and to reduce rates.

All that Porto Rico is asking is that she shall be given the same privilege that the several States are receiving. To isolate her, to say that she should stand on her own bottom, is merely begging the question and leaves the island in the same helpless condition that she is in now. By permitting her to join in with our Federal Land Bank System and to come under the personal supervision of the Springfield Federal loan bank she will be aided, supervised, and guided, and under the surveillance and the machinery of our own land bank system which is working out so splendidly. The loans put out in Porto Rico will be absolutely safe and its bonds will find a ready market in our financial centers.

No such provision for loans as indicated by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is permitted in this bill. The bill strictly provides that the same conditions which obtain in our own Federal Land Bank System will apply here. The land of the applicants for loans will be appraised under our Federal Land Bank System, and after thorough scrutiny as to its valuation and possibilities of agricultural development the Springfield Federal land bank will loan not to exceed 50 per cent of its actual market valuation. The arguments put forth by those who oppose this bill to-day seem to me to be purile, without foundation, and without any real substantial reasons. Porto Rico is pleading with the United States to help her in her industrially depressed condition in order that she may get a start in her agricultural and industrial growth. The lack of funds, especially for the small farmer, is appalling. The high rates of interest are prohibitive, and we need in Porto Rico, as we have needed in America, the intervention of the Federal land bank act in order to stabilize the rates and to aid and encourage the small man to his fullest capacity.

Porto Rico is not able to start the operation of her own agricultural development. We therefore propose, in this bill, to extend to the poor Porto Rican farmer the machinery necessary to put her on a real progressive and sound basis. [Applause.] Congress must see to it that this little island, which has latent possibilities of wonderful agricultural development and the growth of a loyal American citizenship, shall be given the means and the aid necessary to speedily accomplish this desired result. This is the reason why I am in favor of this bill to-day and urge upon Congress its passage.

The small farmer in Porto Rico should be taken out of the hands of the greedy merchant and greedy loan shark, who are making it absolutely impossible for the real development of the island and its people. The people of Porto Rico to-day are pleading with the United States to give them the necessary aid in organizing the little island agriculturally, industrially, socially, educationally, and spiritually. These people, teachable, loyal, sympathetic, eager, and ready to learn, ask of us to-day not alms or charity, but such financial assistance based upon absolute security as will give our investors a field for good investment and to them an opportunity of real development, such a development as will make America proud of her aid to the island.

Under the present conditions, it is apparent from the information in the hearings on this bill coming from the best authorities of the island, including the Hon. Ramon Gandia Cordova, subcommissioner of agriculture and labor of the island of Porto Rico; Hon. C. Toro, member of the house of representatives of Porto Rico; and our esteemed colleague, the Hon. FELIX C. DAVILA, Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, who has plead so eloquently and so passionately with this Congress to-day for this needed aid, that it is impossible for these people to help themselves. At any rate, the progress would be too slow, and we the strong Nation that we are, having received from this little island her devotion and loyalty to our flag, our Union, and its ideals, should reach out our strong arm and touch her outstretched hands for help with the determination to lift her people to a higher plane of agricultural, social, and spiritual development and achievement.

Every safeguard that is provided for in our own country in the Federal land act in loaning to our own farmers is provided for in making the loans under this act on the island of Porto Rico. The land will be valued by our own appraisers under the direction of the Springfield Federal loan bank. The values will be fixed definitely and every regulation of the Federal land act will apply in the valuations and loans to the people of the island. There is, therefore, absolutely nothing in the argument that has been put forth here by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] of any responsibility being assumed by our own American farmers any more than they are assuming now in the United States.

As has been pointed out, the committee has been overcautious, in my judgment, in making the rates one-half per cent larger to these people than we do to the people of the United States proper. I trust that in time this will be reduced when we find the correct workings of this system on the island. This bill will assist the Porto Ricans first in stabilizing their interest rate and reducing the rate from the present prohibitive percentage to that of 6½ per cent. It will make possible an incentive to the young, active population of the island to intensify agricultural and industrial pursuits, and do away with much of the idleness which is now apparent because of the lack of work, due to the lack of funds to improve the agricultural and industrial conditions.

In closing I want to call your attention to the fact that Uncle Sam liberated the inhabitants of Porto Rico politically. He took the people of this island from under the yoke of bondage and domination under which, for centuries, she had been compelled to live. In her downtrodden condition she appealed to America, and America, ever true to her ideals of lifting and ennobling human conditions wherever they are found to be under the yoke of bondage, extended to the poor Porto Ricans the possibilities of a better civilization and a better life and placed upon her shoulders the mantle of liberty and progress, and to-day, after 20 years under our protection and guidance, she comes to us asking, "Will you help us to get a better and firmer start industrially, socially, economically, and spiritually, as you helped us years ago politically?" I say to you, gentlemen of the House, it is up to our American Congress to-day to recognize our solemn obligation and make it possible for the people of this little island to be American citizens in the fullest and truest sense of that word and to help her work out her agricultural, industrial, political, and religious destinies and to enjoy the happiness and the contentment from such possible development. [Applause.]

In the last great World War little Porto Rico registered her undying loyalty to our cause, our flag, and our Union. Her citizens freely offered on the altar of world freedom the supreme sacrifice of devotion to our flag and ideals. We must, in turn, help her to-day to carry hopeful hearts and cheerful brows and to believe more supremely in our democratic institutions. We must help her by this amendment to our Federal farm loan act to build better homes, better schools, and better churches, the fundamental pillars of all human happiness and economic progress. We must help her mold the life of the island as a part of our own Nation through the force of great moral purposes and through the rule of American ideals that can never be discrowned. Let us make possible for this loyal and promising people the real growth and achievement of civilization under the benign guidance of our own republican institutions. Let us help these people to become more and more the conscious instruments of public intelligence, common happiness, and of social, economic, and spiritual progress. Let us permit these people not only to raise our flag in patriotic devotion and loyalty but to carry aloft their banners of progress and achievements written all over with gratitude and hope. Let us be the real big brother to little Porto Rico. I am confident we will and shall pass this bill to-day by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute remaining.

Mr. PLATT. I will use that one minute simply to say that I have been in Porto Rico myself, and can confirm what has been said by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] and others as to the wonderful fertility of that island and the wonderful state of cultivation of it, and also the great number of small holdings. Out of 58,000 holdings of land in Porto Rico, 42,000 are of less than 20 acres each, and these small loans that we propose to make, not exceeding $5,000 each, will probably average away below $1,000. These loans will certainly be absolutely safe and will bring in a revenue. We provide for an extra one-half of 1 per cent interest, which will unquestionably bring a profit to the Farm Loan System of the United States, and for larger amortization payments than are the rule in the States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragrah 2 of section 4 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, be amended to read as follows:

"The Federal Farm Loan Board shall establish in each Federal land bank district a Federal land bank, with its principal office located in such city within the district as said board shall designate. Each Federal land bank shall include in its title the name of the city in which it is located. Subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, any Federal land bank may establish branches within the land bank district. Subject to the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board and under such conditions as it may prescribe, the provisions of this act are extended to the island of Porto Rico; and the Federal Land Bank of Springfield, Mass., is hereby authorized to establish a branch bank at such point as the Federal Farm Loan Board may designate on the island of Porto Rico. Loans made by such branch of the Federal Land Bank of Springfield, when so established, shall be subject to the restrictions and provisions of this act, except that such branch bank may loan direct to borrowers, and that the rate charged borrowers may be 1½ per cent in excess of the rate borne by the last preceding issue of farm-loan bonds of the Federal Land Bank of Springfield.

"Each borrower through such branch bank shall subscribe and pay for stock in the Federal Land Bank of Springfield in the sum of $5 for each $100 or fraction thereof borrowed; such stock shall be held by the Federal Land Bank of Springfield as collateral security for the loan of the borrower; shall participate in all dividends; and upon full payment of the loan shall be canceled at par and proceeds paid to borrower, or the borrower may apply the same to the final payments on his loan."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "established," insert "shall not exceed the sum of $5,000 to any one borrower and."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "Springfield," insert "Provided, however, That no loans shall be made in the island of Porto Rico to run for a longer term than 20 years."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, just as a matter of form I call attention to the fact that these two amendments are separate, and that action will have to be taken upon them separately, unless they are consolidated.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is correct. We understand that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the first committee amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was first brought to the Banking and Currency Committee I saw the very objections which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] urged here to-day, and that is there was a possible ultimate liability on all the Federal farm loan banks in the United States. Subsequently we amended the bill so as to reduce that to a mere possibility.

Now, I want to invite the attention of the committee for one minute to what we have. A man who desires to borrow money there has to have the land appraised by the official appraiser of the Springfield bank, and I understand it is a well-run bank. He can not borrow over 50 per cent of the appraised value. He has to pay into the stock fund of the Springfield bank 5 per cent of what he borrows, and that becomes security in the hands of the Springfield bank for the loan. Therefore you have only 47½ per cent of the value lent out. We limit that to $5,000; in any event, he can not borrow more than that. He has to pay it back in 20 installments instead of 40. If he makes the first payment he reduces it 5 per cent more, and that brings it down to 45 per cent of the loan value, and the result is that the possibility of any ultimate liability to any bank in this country is so extremely remote that no business man would hesitate to deal on that ground.

The gentleman says that the land there is mountainous and that a large part of the lands is in the hands of the Tobacco Trust. I will say to the gentleman that we put the same liability on the Illinois people, where land is worth $500 an acre, as we did for the loan made on Florida land, where in some sections you can buy almost a square mile for what an acre is worth in Illinois. We put the same liability on each. It is limited by the fact that there has got to be an honest administration of the affairs of the bank, and if that is not done we are liable all over this country for every other fellow that runs a bank right in the United States, and we might just as well be liable for it in Porto Rico. So far as there is any danger in it, I have come to the conclusion that there is absolutely none.

I want to see something done for those people, because if you will read the hearings you will see that they are in the same fix that my people in my State were 30 or 40 years ago. In the spring the farmer could not get cash and he had to go first to his merchant and mortgage his crop before it was planted. He had to get his supplies of the merchant, upon which he used to charge 50 per cent profit and then charge 10 or 20 per cent interest, but we were glad to get the stuff at that. But how could the people redeem themselves when they had to pay that kind of an interest and that kind of profit in order to run the business? It was never done in South Carolina. South Carolina never got on her feet until we got sufficient banks to finance the farmer directly instead of depending on the merchant. The Porto Ricans are in much the same fix, and I think if there is anybody in the world that ought to sympathize with and help them it is the people of the South, who came through a period of that kind and by superhuman efforts have redeemed the land and become a very wealthy people, because they got at last where they could put their hands on the cash and get out of the hands of the lien merchant who charged such exorbitant prices. [Applause.] I mean no reflection on the merchant, either, for under that system his losses were frequently heavy, and the man who paid had to pay heavy profits to make up losses on the man who failed.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I only want to add a word to this very interesting debate. We took upon ourselves the responsibility of the Porto Rican people when we annexed them to the United States, growing out of the War with Spain. The people of Porto Rico are entitled to the benefits of the Government of the United States as well as the responsibility they owe to it as citizens. It is our duty to give to them every possible benefit under our laws that will help them to prosper and get along. Those of us who have had the privilege of visiting this beautiful and fertile island know the conditions are such with reference to farm lands that some help must come to them from the United States in order to bring them so that they may have a degree of prosperity. They are now located upon very small tracts of land. They are unable to prosper individually and become the real owners of the land unless they can receive assistance at a nominal and fair rate of interest.

The rate of interest there is now so large that it is impossible for them to become the owners in fact of the land.

We ought to assume the responsibility we owe to these people when we took them in and give them the benefit of this law as well as other beneficial acts of the Congress. It is a duty we owe to the people, and I believe that what they ask for in this instance is but fair and proper. We have had a great deal to do with people of other nationalities growing out of our policy in the past few years in taking over people of other lands. We have the Philippines, we have Hawaii and Porto Rico. The Porto Ricans differ from us in nationality, in customs, and many other ways. They are a splendid, patriotic, fair-minded people. They are intelligent and anxious to continue with the United States, but they want and are entitled to fair treatment from the United States.

The distinguished gentleman from Illinois, former Speaker CANNON, referred to Cuba. Yes; if we would give to Porto Rico what Cuba has there might be no need for us to extend the Federal farm loan act to Porto Rico, but we have taken over Porto Rico. Cuba is free and independent. We in a measure run the affairs of Porto Rico. We appoint from the United States a gentleman and send him down there as their governor, a man who does not understand the language nor the customs of Porto Rico. We have sent other officials down there of the same kind. What we ought to do is to give to Porto Rico what we love in America—self-government. She should have it in the fullest possible measure. Home rule is what the people in the United States have begged for and fought for, and I do not believe we want for this country colonies such as England and other countries have.

We do not want Porto Rico to be a colony of the United States, to be run from Washington. We want Porto Rico to be a real part of the United States, to have its own local self-government, the same as the States of the Union have. The people of Porto Rico are patriotic. We want them to be genuine citizens of the United States and genuine Americans. There is some question under the law now as to whether they are citizens, under the decisions of the Supreme Court; but, Mr. Chairman, we must be fair and just with these people and help them to prosper. Anything less would stamp us as unworthy of our great forefathers.

The distinguished representative from Porto Rico, Hon. CORDOVA DAVILA, is one of the ablest men we have in this House. He is always active in the interest of the people of Porto Rico. I am glad to work with him in his intense desire to serve Porto Rico well. I congratulate Porto Rico in having him here to look after her interests.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I am against this bill. I admit that we owe some duties to the people of Porto Rico, but according to my position our first duty is to the people of the United States. After a long and hard struggle the friends of the farmers in the Congress succeeded in getting the farm loan act passed and approved by the President. In 1913 we started out on that fight, and we were hampered at every point. We did not get the bill through until 1916, in time for the presidential election. The enemies of the legislation fought it at every turn. To-day they are fighting it in the courts of the land, and it is pending in the Supreme Court of the United States right now. I have letters from farmers in my district, to my surprise, stating that loans can not be granted. The reason of it is that the interests that are antagonistic to this Government loan of money to the farmers of the country are responsible for that condition. While I believe the people of Porto Rico can get a bill that will not be a liability to us—and I will support that sort of a bill—I can not support this bill because with the present status of the farm loan situation hanging in the balance, the liabilities that might arise through this bill extending the operations of the act to Porto Rico, in addition to the limitations to the ability of our Government to float our own farmers' loans, it is too much of a hazard for us to take. With a proper amendment to take away that liability, I will support the bill to grant loans to Porto Rico, but under the circumstances as they exist to-day I do not believe it advisable for this Congress to extend this act beyond the bounds of the States of this Union to Porto Rico. We can not afford to hamper our own farmers. We have not yet got the system on a permanent basis. There are many kinds of amendments offered. Some people are endeavoring to get this system extended to joint farm loan banks, by which they can have the same privileges as the Government farm loan act grants.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman refers to loans for our own people. Does the gentleman consider Porto Rico a part of the United States or a foreign territory?

Mr. QUIN. Oh, it is not strictly speaking a part of the United States. I consider the United States these 48 States that we have in our country, and our first duty is to these people right here among us. We have been going too far away, ruining our credit, hampering our people, endeavoring to sweep around the doors of foreign nations. It is all right to carry that missionary spirit when we are able to do so, but with this great debt hanging over us we must be careful and protect our own institutions and the farmers of the United States proper. I shall continue to work and vote for every possible contingency that will help and guarantee the permanency of our Federal Farm Loan System, in which I am so earnestly interested for the benefit of the farmers.

We can not afford to take chances on loading it down with amendments, which its enemies always eagerly support.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Less than three weeks ago I had the pleasure, in company with nine other Members of this House, of visiting for a day in Porto Rico, an island which became American territory by force of circumstances 22 years ago. The Antilles lie like a necklace on the bosom of the blue Caribbean Sea, and Porto Rico is the most resplendent of all that string of jewels. To see this emerald isle of the West Indies is to be conquered by its charm, and no American will thereafter desire otherwise than that this part of our common country shall prosper like all the rest, enjoying every benefit conferred by congressional legislation on the people of any other section of the United States. [Applause.]

By the act of Congress approved March 2, 1917, all citizens of Porto Rico were declared to be citizens of the United States. I voted for that legislation with the distinct understanding that the people of Porto Rico were to be given every right, every privilege, every immunity enjoyed under the Constitution by other citizens of this Republic, save only that statehood was denied, that people being placed in practically the status of the people of the Territory of Arizona prior to her admission into the Union. There is no difference and should be no discrimination between American citizens, whether they reside in Porto Rico, Arkansas, Illinois, or Arizona. They are all citizens of the United States, and as such are equally entitled to consideration by Congress.

The remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], who have spoken in opposition to this bill, would indicate that in their opinion Porto Rico is a foreign territory; that there are aliens living there. Each of the gentlemen talked about "our" Federal Farm Loan System and "our own" rural credit laws and that "we" can not afford to run the risk of loaning money to these "foreigners." Evidently both of the distinguished gentlemen have failed to appreciate the fact that this bill proposes nothing more than a method of providing farm loans to American citizens, residing under the American flag, who offer American soil for security.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. Not now. When the Federal farm loan act was passed all of the people of the United States interested in agriculture grouped themselves together, combining their credit, in order to obtain low rates of interest. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] insists that the farmers of Porto Rico should furnish their own credit, and approvingly quotes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that "each tub should stand upon its own bottom." Why does not the gentleman also urge that the Arkansas tub stand on its own bottom and provide a State rural credit system for the farmers of that Commonwealth without aid or assistance from the Federal Government?

Mr. WINGO. I will be mighty glad if the gentleman will let me vote for such a measure. I oppose the farmers of Arkansas being liable for loans on the arid lands of Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. There was a time when Arkansas was a byword for backwardness in the United States, but fortunately that great State has completely lived down her early reputation.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, we are among the educated people.

Mr. HAYDEN. The farmers of all the other States are now glad to have the rich lands of Arkansas in the Federal Farm Loan System to assist in obtaining a low rate of interest. It was only by uniting the credit of all of the farmers of the United States that such beneficent results could be secured. The people of Porto Rico, being citizens of the United States, are likewise entitled to share the benefits of this excellent law.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman think, if an amendment should be adopted, as has been suggested, taking away all Government liability for the branch bank in Porto Rico, that bonds could be sold so that the farmers of that island could get any benefit at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. It would be utterly impossible, just as much so as if State land banks established in Mississippi or Arkansas should attempt to sell their bonds without the guaranty of the rest of the farmers of the United States. Such bonds could not be sold in the market to-day.

Mr. HASTINGS. And in such circumstances the rate of interest in every State would vary.

Mr. HAYDEN. Undoubtedly, the chief benefit of the farm loan act is to equalize conditions so that the farmers in Massachusetts and Arkansas, Oregon and Illinois, shall obtain loans at the same rate of interest. It is both vain and foolish to say that it would be possible for the small farmers of Porto Rico to finance a farm loan system by themselves. Anyone who knows anything about the present financial conditions is certain to say that it would be impossible to sell their bonds at a low rate of interest. As citizens of the United States, why should the American Congress deny them the right to become associated with our great Federal Farm Loan System? I can not understand how there can be two kinds of American citizens.

The people of Porto Rico are either citizens or they are not. If they are, let us treat them as such and welcome them as partners in the great system which has been created for the benefit of American farmers everywhere. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed on this subject for seven minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for seven minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, if the American farmer is the basis of American prosperity, then all patriotic Americans owe a debt of gratitude to the framers of this farm loan act; and to more than any other citizen not a Member of Congress they owe a debt of gratitude to a man whose name has not been called in this debate, Dr. Clarence J. Owens, director general of the Southern Commercial Congress, whose masterful genius organized the large company of patriotic experts that went to Europe and gathered the data and brought back the facts out of which this legislation was largely framed. And, incidentally, we might suggest to the Committee on Ways and Means in considering legislation for our soldiers that almost everything that is necessary for governmental loan help to our "soldiers of freedom" could be found in these farm loan banks rightly applied. But, Mr. Chairman, I rose especially to emphasize the truth that has already been expressed by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] concerning the all-American application of this legislation. My honored friend and colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] spoke of the distance between here and Porto Rico. Gentlemen of the committee, I would help you remember that there is no distance in the realm of faith; there is no distance in the realm of love; there is no distance in the realm of patriotism; there is no such thing as distance beneath the protecting folds of the American flag. [Applause.] Somehow, it does not sound just right for us to speak of "they" and "our." We accepted their loyalty during the war, we accepted their arms and their patriotic support of the flag that now protects them, and if that is true, then it is not, it seems to me, a good point in this debate to discuss the distance of Porto Rico from Washington or the former national alignment of the people in this new insular possession of America. Neither is it pertinent to discuss the productiveness or lack of productiveness of the mountain lands of Porto Rico. I was in Arkansas not long ago, a grand old State, and I saw the Ozark Mountains cultivated clear to the top and on the top with glorious "Arkansaw" apples. I think it is a fine tribute to the genius, the efforts, and the industry of the people of Porto Rico that they know so well how, and seek so assiduously, to make available for production every inch of their soil, whether in their teeming valleys or on their beautiful mountain sides. I would also remind the gentlemen of the committee of another thing. Somehow, it jars my ideals of an ideal American Republic that any one citizen beneath this flag should be treated in any way that will make him feel that he is not quite a part of this Republic. I never look at the genial face of our patriotic colleague, Señor FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA, if you please, without feeling like I want to take him by the hand and say, "Vive Porto Rico"! His intelligent loyalty to his people and our flag has been an inspiration to us all. There was something of pathos in his appeal the other day, when he told this House that beneath the guardian ægis of the American flag, in the encouragement the United States of America had given to his people, how they had been developed along educational lines, and how, fresh from the battle fields of common loyalty and common glory they come now and reach out their hands to us and say, "Give us a chance in financial comradeship beside every other citizen of the flag we love."

"The dream of empire," it has been said, "comes not with observation." In his great campaign in which he eloquently warned against imperialistic tendencies in America's attitude toward our insular possessions, William J. Bryan pointed out the danger that lurks beneath the policy of holding any section as a province, if you please; he declared it un-American to accept the loyalty of the citizens of any dependency and then not give them free course and free opportunity for the expression of their patriotism. And let me say this with great earnestness: If this great, wealthy Government is to make a mistake, as some declare this bill to be—and of course we want to do our full duty to the American farmer—then let us make our mistake in a great, honest, national effort to help these new grateful citizens, for any other idea does not fit into the spirit of this Government——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UPSHAW. I ask for one more minute.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more.

Mr. UPSHAW. I thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UPSHAW. If we are to accept their arms in war, if we accept their loyalty in peace, if we accept any of their patriotic support, then I remind you, gentlemen of this House, that it is the first thought, the first duty, of the American Government to give to these struggling people that financial encouragement that shall make no lines of cleavage between their soldiers who fought for our flag and our soldiers who fought for our flag. Faith, the loyal faith of any people, constitutes the basis of governmental security. Therefore I would wipe out the word "they" altogether and make it "our" when discussing the problems that confront the citizens of any section of our common country. Let me say with my last word that if this great rich Government makes any mistake at all in legislation of this kind, let us err on the side of generosity. Let us make our mistake in trying to reach out our hands of helpfulness and encouragement that will increase the faith, the love, and the happiness of these noble people. America needs Porto Rico; Porto Rico needs America. Let us, in the name of American fairness, American greatness, and American freedom, give them the handclasp of helpful fellowship as we seek to encourage their hearts, develop their resources, and make them a rich, glorious, and a responsive part of the American Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVILA. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have heard with great interest the remarks in favor of and against this bill. And I want to say that when I hear any matter regarding Porto Rico discussed on the floor of this House I am not afraid of the opposition, because it is not to be supposed that all Members of Congress will be of the same opinion, but I am afraid of the statements which might be made in the course of the debate by some gentlemen who do not sympathize with the people of Porto Rico. Although these gentlemen represent only their individual views and not the sentiment of Congress, still their remarks tend to create hostile sentiment on the island toward the United States, and it is unquestionable that this is not the best policy to make happy the insular people living under the American flag.

During my stay in Washington I have tried to bring our people closer to this country, doing my best to remove all kinds of prejudice which may exist between continental Americans and natives of Porto Rico, and I see with sorrow that some Members of Congress, who are American citizens by birth, are rather destroying the efforts of a Porto Rican who became an American citizen three years ago. This means that I am doing more for the United States than some gentlemen who were born on the continent. [Applause.]

In this connection I think it is important to bear in mind that the effects of the policy of the United States toward Porto Rico are not confined exclusively to the island. The West Indies, Central and South America, are watching with interest the development of the people of Porto Rico and the treatment received by these people under the American flag as a test of your attitude and intentions toward your neighbors belonging to the Latin race. Even the whole world is watching the policy of the United States in connection with Porto Rico and the Latin American countries, to determine how the experiment will succeed of establishing a perfect understanding between the two great families inhabiting the Western Hemisphere, the Anglo-Saxon and the Latin. If you are to succeed in destroying the misgivings and prejudices that have so long existed against you, and in their stead developing a sincere, permanent, and fraternal union, which the geographical position of your republican neighbors in Central and South America renders so desirable, then the foundations for the success of such a policy must be laid in Porto Rico.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] says that the first duty of this Congress is to the people of the United States. What does the gentleman from Mississippi mean by "the people of the United States"? Do not the people of Porto Rico belong to your own family, to your own nationality, and to your own flag? And may we not say with pride and satisfaction our own family, our own nationality, and our own flag? Is it a disgrace for you to be associated with the people of Porto Rico? Do you think that we are inferior to you? If so, on what grounds do you base your superiority? Allow me to say emphatically that we do not accept your superiority, that we do not believe in any superiority but virtue, that the people of Porto Rico are as elevated, capable, and refined as the people of the continental United States, and that if you are great it is because you have infused in your soul the spirit of a Christian Nation. [Applause.] But if you depart from this principle you will doff the tunic of Christ to don the tunic of Cæsar.

The gentleman from Mississippi thinks that there are two kinds of American citizens and refuses to extend to Porto Rico the justice that he wants for the people of his own State. Men ought to be consistent with principles. Justice is something as indivisible as the human soul, and if you dole it among the people its distribution in small quantities will destroy its integrity, its very existence, its purpose and effect, and, of course, you will easily fall in the opposite extreme, which is injustice.

Justice is a right and not a privilege, and if it is true that we are living under a democracy, it must reach every citizen of this powerful country, poor and wealthy, weak and strong.

You have extended to the natives of Porto Rico the American citizenship without reservations, I suppose, and it is your duty to open all national activities to the citizens of Porto Rico to the same extent that these activities are open to the continental American citizen. We have been loyal to you in the most crucial period of our history. We have been at your side in the hour of crisis, and the people who are good to share the responsibilities and hardships of the war must also be good to share the prerogatives and advantages of your institutions and of American citizenship in normal times. There was no discrimination in time of war and there must not be discrimination in time of peace.

Oh, gentlemen, you are not aware of the spirit of the people of Porto Rico in the great war; you seem to ignore that many of our men volunteered in the Army before the approval by Congress of the compulsory-service law; you are not familiar with our country, and I attribute the position of the gentleman from Mississippi to his lack of knowledge of our people and not to any other motive.

This patriotic attitude of the people of Porto Rico prompted the commander of the Porto Rican forces, Gen. Townshend, to say that had not the draft applied to Porto Rico he was sure he could fill the quota of the island by simply calling for volunteers.

The best proof that can be shown of the patriotic sentiments of Porto Rico are set forth in the following letter from Gen. Crowder to Maj. Wilson, the adjutant general of the island:

MY DEAR MAJ. WILSON: I have just received from Lieut. Col. Kramer a personal letter filled with a glowing description of the achievements of the selective draft in Porto Rico. His account of the accomplishments of the island has not added to my admiration of the work that has been done there, as I already knew from less direct information of the splendid efforts that had been exerted. But it prompts me at this particular time to express to you, and through you to Gov. Yeager, Capt. Van Deusen, and the other gentleman who so ably directed the administration of the selective-service law, an appreciation of the work which is now drawing to a close.

I noted with pleasure in Col. Kramer's letter that the percentage of delinquents and deserters on the island is probably lower than in any other administrative subdivision. This is indeed a tribute not only to the loyalty and patriotism of your registrants, but also to the splendid spirit which you have infused into the administration of the selective draft. This remarkable spirit of cooperation is further emphasized by the fact that no member of the 76 local boards has charged the Government for his services.

As you see, we had no slackers in our country. Our local registration boards refused to receive any compensation for their work, and with this wonderful record we appeal to the American Congress, asking only justice for the people of Porto Rico. It is proper to say at this time that our citizens will admit equality but not inferiority; that we are willing to be your brothers and fellow citizens, but never your slaves; and that if, in spite of our devotion to this country, you arrive at the conclusion that we can not live under your flag without discrimination, then the proper thing to do is to grant entire freedom to the people of Porto Rico, who will willingly relieve you of the missionary work referred to by the gentleman from Mississippi.

But I do not care very much about statements which only represent individual views when I know that the great majority of the people of the United States are in favor of our island. We have a great confidence in this Nation; we are full of hopes when we look to our future, and we are sure that entire justice will be done to the people of Porto Rico.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] made some remarks to which I do not reply in full for lack of time, but he seemed to be greatly impressed by several banners that he saw during his visit to Porto Rico carrying inscriptions of self-determination, independence, self-government, and so forth, and I ask, with surprise, is that a reflection upon the people of Porto Rico? Was it a reflection upon the people of the United States to fight for their liberty?

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVILA. I will.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman from Porto Rico feel that inasmuch as he himself, representing the people of Porto Rico, is loyal to this Government, that we in Congress ought to cast for him the vote for his people that he can not cast himself?

Mr. DAVILA. Oh! Certainly. I am glad of the interruption of the gentleman, but I must protest that we should be allowed to do that for ourselves.

The gentleman from Illinois reminds us of what he saw in Porto Rico, but he seems to forget that these people striving for independence and self-government were ready for duty during the emergency of the Great War, and that their loyalty to this country can never be questioned by anybody. It is true that we are divided in our views regarding our final status, but we are not to be blamed for that, because we are not responsible for your failure to decide the fate of our country. We do not know what you are going to do with the people of Porto Rico, and it is natural that our people be divided in regard to our final issues. But I dare assure you that once this important matter be definitely decided by Congress, with the consent of the insular people, there will be only one sentiment and one aspiration in the whole island. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVILA. May I have two minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Porto Rico asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVILA. But I want to repeat that in spite of the remarks of some gentlemen who, I am sure, do not represent the sentiment of the Nation, the island of Porto Rico has full confidence in your sense of justice and in your respect and affection toward our people.

Mr. Chairman, I was going to oppose this amendment, but I am afraid to do it on account of the opposition to this bill, and because I fear that my friend, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], may say that I am arguing against the bill.

I was going to refer to the conditions of our small farmers. I think the purpose of the amendment is to help the small farmer, and I agree entirely with that. But what is to be understood by the "small farmer" in Porto Rico? We have farmers with 5, 10, 20, 100, and even 200 acres of land who have no money to cultivate their properties and are compelled to go from the mountains to the sugar factories to work for a low salary. If the loans are limited to $5,000, I am afraid that these farmers will not be able to borrow the money they want to cultivate all the available land and therefore they will not derive the same benefits that would otherwise be obtained under the law as it is in force on the mainland.

If you are going to extend to the people of Porto Rico the benefits of the farm-loan act, extend it to them in its integrity; give to the people of Porto Rico all the possibilities that you give to citizens of the United States and let the farmers of Porto Rico borrow on the same basis as farmers are permitted to borrow in continental United States. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRAGO having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9065) to amend sections 3, 8, 10, 12, 20, and 21 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3391. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Okla.," approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat. L., p. 433);

S. 2278. An act for the relief of John Healy;

S. 2600. An act for the relief of John Lyons;

S. 3477. An act to increase without expenditure of Federal funds the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes;

S. 3941. An act for the relief of the owners of the dredge Maryland;

S. 2792. An act to enlarge the boundaries of the Oregon National Forest;

S. 3225. An act for the relief of the bona fide settlers who intermarry after having complied with the homestead law for one year;

S. 3896. An act for the retirement of Frank Schoble, jr., and Raymond D. Day, first lieutenants in the United States Army;

S. 447. An act to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1917;

S. 3908. An act to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919;

S. 3102. An act for the relief of Katherine Macdonald;

S. 2728. An act for the relief of settlers and entrymen on Baca Float No. 3 in the State of Arizona;

S. 1280. An act for the relief of J. G. Seupelt;

S. 3895. An act authorizing the granting of certain irrigation easements in the Yellowstone National Park;

S. 3994. An act validating certain applications for and entries on public lands, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 179. Joint resolution authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11175. An act for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me.;

H. R. 8645. An act for the relief of Lawrence Bendich and Anthony Vezich;

H. R. 685. An act for the relief of Frank S. Ingalls;

H. R. 687. An act for the relief of Frank Pinkley; and

H. R. 6077. An act for the relief of the King Coal Co., of San Francisco, Calif.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 8314. An act to provide for the training of officers of the Army in aeronautic engineering and the issue of equipment and materials therefor.

The message from the Senate also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3813) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Lake Champlain, between the towns of Shoreham, Vt., and Ticonderoga, N. Y.

FARM LOAN ACT.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, can we make some arrangements for debate? Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] suggest who desires to speak?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know of anyone else now who desires to speak after the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to have three or four minutes before you close debate.

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to have four or five minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent that all debate close in 15 minutes, during which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] may be recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Make it 20 minutes. We have had one speech on my side, with seven against me.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MURPHY. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. WINGO. I want to appeal to the gentleman from Ohio. Does he realize what he is doing?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Very well. I demand the regular order. The debate is exhausted. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] should proceed. If the gentleman from Ohio wants to take the time from the gentleman from Iowa, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. I make the point of no quorum. No; I will withdraw it, because I have agreed that the gentleman from Iowa should have time. I withdraw the point of no quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I am still of the opinion that the objections that have been suggested to this bill are without real and substantial merit.

It has been said again and again by those who have spoken against this bill that we ought to take care of the people of the United States before we begin to take care of the people of Porto Rico. Why, gentlemen, that same objection was made when we had the farm-loan act before us. The farm-loan act is in itself a cooperative institution. It was of little benefit to parts of the United States, and is not now of very much benefit to parts of the United States. The reason why the Springfield bank, to which the Porto Rican act is attached, is behind is because they have not had applications enough for loans. But there has not been one single dollar lost, no matter where the loans were placed in the United States, or one single dollar called from cooperative banks throughout the United States in the operation of this act, and I presume there will not be.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says there have not been enough applications in Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that there is a large area in Massachusetts that is not eligible? And is not that true of other States?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. There are lands that are just as good and more productive even than the lands in Porto Rico, and yet they are excluded; and yet you provide that we shall go down and establish a branch bank in Porto Rico.

Mr. TOWNER. I say that an act of this kind can never be made to——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman mean to concede that the territory of the Springfield bank is confined to Massachusetts? It covers all New England.

Mr. TOWNER. The fact is that there has not been and there will not be one single dollar of loss. This is just as carefully guarded as it is possible to guard anything. There can not be a single dollar loaned in Porto Rico without an appraisement made by the representatives of the Springfield bank, which is primarily liable. Are they going to injure themselves? I presume that gentlemen will not suggest that the bank of Springfield is unduly speculative. It is managed by men who are among the most conservative in the United States, and the liability is so small and so remote that it is not worth while considering for an instant. It is not an incumbrance to the farm-loan system or a burden to the United States. It does not call a single dollar from the Treasury. It will be a benefit to the farm-loan system, and it will be a benefit to the United States, and it will be of immense benefit to the people of Porto Rico.

The gentleman suggests that $1,000 an acre might be loaned upon a little five-acre farm upon a hillside. Of course, gentlemen, that is absolutely impossible under any circumstances. They will be just as careful, and even more so, in making loans in Porto Rico than anywhere else.

And now I want to say just one word regarding the proposition that will be presented to the House on the motion to recommit, that it be relegated entirely to Porto Rico for their management, and not connected with the United States system.

Gentlemen, I want to say that if you do that you do not benefit Porto Rico one particle. It will leave matters there in the control of the same moneyed power that now makes this legislation necessary; the same system of banks, the same cooperation between the banks, by which the banks have increased in number in 10 years' time from 2 to 13, making profits of from 20 to 40 per cent, charging these poor men on these farms from 12 per cent to 18 per cent interest. That is what we are trying to help them get out from, just as we helped sections of the United States get out from under burdens they were resting under in the old system. It is to help these people, and we can not do it except by cooperation. You put it in the power of the banking institutions of Porto Rico, as you would if you placed this alone in Porto Rico, and it would be of no benefit to them at all. It will not hurt us, should we pass this bill, and it will help them immensely.

Why should we not do it? There is no reason on earth. It costs us not one cent. We are not burdened in any way. It is perfectly safe, and I hope we shall be fair enough to give that to the people of Porto Rico to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order was demanded.

Mr. WINGO. I withdraw that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I feel that any Member of this House who has ever visited Porto Rico and enjoyed, as I have, the acquaintance of many of the splendid, well-educated, and high-class people of that island and been charmed by the kind and delightful hospitality of those good people would be somewhat derelict in his sense of ordinary propriety and good fellowship if he did not at this time say a kindly word in behalf of this bill and for the citizens of Porto Rico, our own citizens of the United States, who inhabit that very beautiful island.

I had the pleasure some seven years ago of visiting the island in company with five other Congressmen, including the present presiding chairman [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas], and our wives. I also visited the island on the 20th and 21st of last month, with nine other Congressmen and our wives, and we were not only most cordially welcomed and delightfully entertained but I was especially interested in and most agreeably surprised at the marvelous improvement and change in the island, both in the cities and country, during the past seven years. I do not believe there is an equal territory anywhere on the face of the globe that has made as much tremendous improvement in every direction during recent years as that island.

I will not attempt to give exact figures, but will say that, approximately speaking, at the time Porto Rico came into the possession of the United States 21 years ago the total value of the island's three greatest products, sugar, tobacco, and coffee, was only $17,000,000; while this last year the sugar crop of that island was worth over $60,000,000, the tobacco more than $10,000,000, and the coffee more than $6,000,000. Over half of the island is in intensive cultivation, and over half of the population is engaged in agriculture. They export $80,000,000 and import $62,500,000, and 90 per cent of all their commerce is with the United States.

The towns have changed from primitive tropical country villages to modern, up-to-date cities; and the greatest change of all, in my judgment, is in the people themselves. Education has advanced marvelously; I do not believe any other country or people can show as great percentage of increase in education and general intelligence as the Porto Ricans during the past 21 years. We have a right to be, we ought to be, and are proud to call them and treat them as citizens of the United States.

While the island is only 35 miles wide and about 100 miles long, less in area than the county in which I live in Colorado, yet Porto Rico has a population of 1,258,970 people. Since the organic act of March 2, 1917, Porto Ricans are citizens of the United States. They are a splendid class of citizens. The Porto Ricans are high-minded, proud, patriotic, home-loving, industrious, and honest people. They are, and have a right to be, proud of their island, proud of their ancestors, and proud of their history during the past 400 years. They are very different from the inhabitants of the other islands of the West Indies and Central America.

They are more industrious, more intelligent, and a better class of civilization than the other people who have lived nearly 400 years in that climate. They have one trait which is somewhat different from us Anglo-Saxons. Their just pride and character, their patriotism and loyalty to their race and home land, and their loyalty to the United States, and the cordial friendship and good will which they have always frankly and honestly exhibited toward our citizens, and especially our Members of Congress, make them rather sensitive to any criticism or disparagement of their equal rights as American citizens. It hurts them to have a Member of the American Congress say things that they justly feel are unwarranted or not justified by the facts as they see them.

I have assumed the liberty more than once of saying to some very bright, well-educated, and high-class Porto Ricans, including the distinguished gentlemen who is the Porto Rico Delegate on the floor of this House, the Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA, that the Porto Ricans sometimes, I fear, take too seriously or give too much attention to isolated remarks of some individual Member of the House of Representatives. I have tried to explain to them that one Member of this House only represents one-four hundred and thirty-fifth of the membership or the sentiment of this House, and I have urged them not to think or ever feel that the possible hasty and not well-considered or thoughtful remark or hasty speech of any one man represents the sentiment of 110,000,000 continental American citizens, or in any respect reflects the concerted judgment of the membership of this House or the Senate.

And the remarks of our good friend, Señor DAVILA, in reference to the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi induces me to again make this friendly reference to this subject, and I hope the people of Porto Rico, for whom I know that practically every Member of this House and the Senate has the kindest possible feeling, will not take too seriously statements of which they do not approve.

In this country there are something like 110,000,000 people, and those people are active and alert, and they consequently have something like 110,000,000 different minds; and in the United States Senate there are 96 Members, and necessarily 96 different minds and opinions, the same as there are 435 different opinions in this House; and there is very seldom any measure comes before either the House or Senate upon which there is unanimity, and nearly always there is more or less active and often violent opposition to the measure, or some parts of it, that is being considered. It does not mean an unkindness, but means an honest difference of opinion; and I trust the gentleman from Porto Rico and the Porto Rican people will take the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi, as well as any others that may be adverse to their aspirations, not in a spirit of hostility nor even unkindness but a spirit of candid difference of opinion.

I am very heartily, indeed, in favor of the passage of this bill to extend the benefits of the Federal farm loan law to the island of Porto Rico. I feel that it might well have been passed under exactly the same conditions which are applicable to the farmers of the United States. But, nevertheless, it is a great step in the right direction and we can readily amend it some other time, if it is demonstrated to be successful and satisfactory, and increase the amount from $5,000 to $10,000 which anyone may be able to borrow.

I may call the attention of the Porto Rican people to the fact that I represent in part a great irrigation country. We irrigate every foot of land we have water for or can irrigate; and outside of the valley of the Nile I do not believe there are any richer lands on the face of the earth than many parts of my congressional district. Yet we have had a desperate time ever since the farm loan law was enacted to secure loans upon irrigated lands. It seems as though the Federal Farm Loan Board does not know what irrigation is, and it has been a long and tedious task to educate and convince them that it was safe and proper and wise and fair to allow some of the Federal farm loan money to go to the farmers of Colorado. So that I know what it is to meet obstacles in this matter, and for that reason I have more sympathy, possibly, than I would otherwise with the Delegate from and the citizens of Porto Rico.

But before I close I want to say another word about Porto Rico and the Porto Ricans. Columbus discovered and landed on the island on his second voyage. Juan Ponce de Leon called it "The gate of riches," and builded himself a palace and dreamed of his fountains of eternal youth. It is no wonder that they are a brave and courageous people. That little band of people have heroically fought for and maintained their liberties against the whole world for nearly 400 years.

On the 11th day of April, 1899, just 21 years ago next Sunday, by the ratification of the treaty of Paris between the United States and Spain, Porto Rico became American territory. A wonderful transformation—in fact, a marvelous metamorphosis—has taken place upon that little island paradise during that 21 years. Twenty-one years ago there was not a public-school building on the island. To-day there are nearly 600, and schools are being conducted in 1,742 different school buildings. Before that treaty there were 21,000 children in school. During the past year there were 176,689 attending school.

Illiteracy has been reduced from over 80 per cent of the population to less than 60 per cent. Oxcarts have been changed to 5,000 licensed automobiles that go at a terrific speed over 1,400 miles of splendid macadamized highways. I hope to see every Member of Congress visit this island, as he ought to do, and get acquainted with those people and ride over those splendid roads. I hope some day to see Colorado become the summer playground and Porto Rico the winter playground of all America, and that every after-dinner coffee that every American drinks and every after-dinner cigar that every American smokes will be from the world's most beautiful island. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVILA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Porto Rico.

Mr. DAVILA. I want to say to the gentleman that the reason why I referred to the remarks made by some gentleman in this House was because I know the impression that those remarks will make in Porto Rico. I agree entirely with the gentleman from Colorado that such remarks do not represent the sentiments of the people of the United States; but there is a distinction between the remarks which gentlemen may make regarding Idaho or Iowa, or any other State of the Union, and remarks which are made about Porto Rico, because the people of Porto Rico are discriminated against in some ways which I do not want to mention, but which are in the minds of all Members of Congress. The people of Porto Rico are at a disadvantage as compared with the people of the States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; there are naturally some differences and some disadvantages; but after all I hope our friends in Porto Rico will not feel unduly sensitive about remarks or speeches or any actions by Congress or by individual Congressmen that are not at all intended to offend. I want in closing to mention an interesting incident in our recent trip. I served in this House with the Hon. Luis Munoz Rivera, the distinguished predecessor of the present able gentleman from Porto Rico. I knew him well, and when we visited that island a few days ago we were all exceedingly glad and gratified to learn of the marvelous admiration, affection, and good will which the people of Porto Rico have for his memory and the reverence which they show his grave. Many of our party visited his grave, and I know all the old Members of the House who knew Mr. Rivera will be pleased to know the unanimous and wonderful esteem in which he was held. No one could ever hope for a more tender burial or affectionate guardianship of his grave. [Applause.]

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members present, a quorum.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think in the discussion of legislation we are often led to use extravagant language, but I do not believe there has been a greater piece of constructive legislation enacted by this or any other Congress than the original Federal farm loan act. [Applause.] I was glad to be a Member of Congress when it was passed. I was also a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency which gave it consideration, and I took part in the discussion of the bill and amendments when the bill was before the House for consideration. That act has not yet had a very good chance. It was passed July 17, 1916, about four years ago. You all know that the war came on. We have had some difficulty in selling the bonds issued under that act, and for that reason it has not had as good a chance as it otherwise would have had in this country.

I am heartily in favor of extending the provisions of this bill to Porto Rico. I think it is a wonderful island. It is a fertile island. It has great natural resources. The people are progressive. They have advanced very rapidly within the last few years, and I want to indorse what has been said by other Members of Congress with reference to the advancement of the people of that island.

It has been objected, Mr. Chairman, that an amendment ought to be added to this bill, either in committee or upon a motion to recommit, to provide that the people of the other sections of the United States, other than those in the Springfield district, shall not be behind the loans made to Porto Rico as they are behind the bonds secured by loans made to other citizens of the United States.

I think the provision that the assets of all banks should be behind the bonds of each of the banks was one of the very best provisions of the original act. It was the one thing that I stood for in the Banking and Currency Committee. It was the one thing that I insisted upon here on the floor of the House. In other words, I wanted the assets of every land bank in the United States to be behind all the bonds issued by the farm-loan banks throughout the United States, so that the interest would be uniform. We people down in Oklahoma appreciated that, being a new State, interest rates were high, whereas up in Massachusetts you could borrow money at 4 or 5 per cent. We had to pay more than twice that down in Oklahoma. The same is true throughout the Southern and Western States. Now, if only the loans in Oklahoma or of any other State alone were to stand behind its bonds, of course the interest rate would be very much higher, and the interest rates in practically all the States would differ and would not be uniform, as now. Therefore I am opposed to that kind of an amendment.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Did the gentleman mean that the Oklahoma bonds would be higher or that the rate of interest would be higher?

Mr. HASTINGS. I meant that the rate of interest on the bonds would be higher if they stood by themselves and not secured by the assets of all the banks.

Now, objection has been made that Porto Rico is quite a distance from the United States. Well, did you ever stop to consider the fact that Porto Rico is much nearer to New York than California or Oregon or Arizona or New Mexico? It seems to me that is not a legitimate argument. I want to invite your attention to one thing, and that is that these loans are made direct to borrowers. The weak point in the Federal farm-loan act is that loans are not made directly to borrowers. Section 15 provides that under certain circumstances, which can never arise, loans may be made directly to borrowers.

Loans now are required to be made through local loan associations, but it takes a long time to form them. A good many farmers are not familiar with how they should be formed. As a result a great many farmers are not getting the benefit that they should receive from the farm-loan act. Whenever Congress amends the farm-loan act so as to eliminate the local loan associations and procure agents to be appointed at convenient places throughout the country so that loans may be initiated and made through them to the farmers of the country, then the farmers will appreciate to the fullest extent the advantages of this loan act. I have introduced such an amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate now close and a vote taken on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 10, after the word "established," insert the words "shall not exceed the sum of $5,000 to any one borrower and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "Springfield," strike out the period, insert a semicolon and the following: "Provided, however, That no loans shall be made in the island of Porto Rico to run for a longer term than 20 years."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. WALSH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8038) to amend section 4 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, extending its provisions to Porto Rico, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WINGO moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to report the same back forthwith, with the following amendment at end of line 3, page 3:

"Provided, That no member of a local farm-loan association, nor his association, organized within continental United States, nor any Federal land bank other than the Federal land bank of Springfield, Mass., shall be liable under section 21 or any other provisions of the Federal farm-loan act, on any loans made in Porto Rico, or bonds issued on said loans."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion to recommit.

The question was being taken when Mr. MORGAN made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 241, not voting 117, as follows:

H. J. Res. 222. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

PERMITTING PRIVATE BANKERS TO BE DIRECTORS IN TWO BANKING ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 13138) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended May 15, 1916, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.
The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended by the act of May 15, 1916, be further amended by inserting in the proviso at the end of the second clause of said section after the word "prohibit" the words "any private banker or," so that the proviso as amended shall read:

"And provided further, That nothing in this act shall prohibit any private banker or any officer, director, or employee of any member bank or class A director of a Federal reserve bank, who shall first procure the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, which board is hereby authorized, at its discretion, to grant, withhold, or revoke such consent, from being an officer, director, or employee of not more than two other banks, banking associations, or trust companies, whether organized under the laws of the United States or any State, if such other bank, banking association, or trust company is not in substantial competition with such banker or member bank.

"The consent of the Federal Reserve Board may be procured before the person applying therefor has been elected as a class A director of a Federal reserve bank or as a director of any member bank."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, this bill shows very plainly on its face, as it is written, exactly what it is, and the report fully explains its purpose. It is a bill to amend what is known as the Kern amendment to the Clayton antitrust act, and it merely adds four words. The Kern amendment permitted a director of a national bank to be a director of two other national banks or a director of a trust company to be a director of two national banks, with the permission of the Federal Reserve Board. As originally written, the Clayton Act prevented any person from being a director in more than one bank. That proved to be a serious handicap in some places where there were not enough men of experience to furnish directors for the banks and frequently left those most interested and best qualified without representation. Hence the Kern amendment was passed, but for some reason it omitted private bankers. The reason for this amendment is to help finance foreign trade. Gentlemen will remember that a few months ago we passed what is known as the Edge Act, giving Federal incorporation to institutions organized for financing foreign trade. There were at that time, and there are still, some 9 or 10 institutions organized under State laws financing foreign trade. They are in almost every respect similar to what we expect the Edge corporations are to be when there are any organized. Those corporations could all reorganize under the national law—the Edge Act—if they would, but in nearly all of them are some private bankers as directors, and private bankers are the men who have hitherto been more interested in foreign trade than any other American bankers, and they have had more experience in that line than others. Naturally, these corporations that are already building up a large business do not want to reorganize under the national law and lose their best directors, the men who have had the most experience, and in order to allow them to be directors in not to exceed two of these corporations, with the permission of the Federal Reserve Board, we have brought in this little bill. It does not seem to me that it needs much argument. It was reported practically unanimously, and I know of only one Member who wishes any time in opposition to it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is to permit private bankers to do the same thing that directors of national banks are permitted to do?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. It does not open up the act and permit any further extension of what it is now?

Mr. PLATT. No; it does not go any further, and I think that probably in amending the act before, this was overlooked. I do not believe they intended to prevent private bankers from being directors in not to exceed two national banks, though in 1916 the importance of foreign trade was not as fully recognized as it is now.

Mr. McKEOWN. The gentleman's committee is not in favor of extending this prohibition to permit interlocking directors. It is just to give to the private bankers the same privilege that the national banker has.

Mr. PLATT. That is it, exactly.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is, to be a director in two banks or two corporations organized under the laws of the United States?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; not to exceed two.

Mr. STEVENSON. With the permission of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The provision in the original Clayton antitrust act prohibited a private banker from being a director in any corporation organized under the United States.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; and, of course, the Edge Act was not in existence at that time.

Mr. McKEOWN. Has any bill been introduced before the gentleman's committee looking toward a curtailment of ownership or permitting one set of bankers to own all of the banks in any one particular place, even though they are national banks, and are not on the board of directors?

Mr. PLATT. There has not been any bill of that kind introduced, so far as I can remember; but, of course, the Clayton antitrust act would prevent one man from being a director of more than two. As a matter of fact, however, I am told there are sections in the United States where one man controls a number of banks. I have heard it put as high as 50 or 60. It is a kind of branch banking without the responsibilities of real branch banking. There is no national law against that. This bill has nothing to do with that situation.

I might say that my information is there has been quite a good deal of inquiry since the Edge corporation act was passed from persons apparently intending to form corporations under its provisions for financing foreign trade, but no actual corporations have yet been formed under it. I am informed that there are one or two applications pending. The Federal Reserve Board has its regulations out, and this one restriction of the Clayton antitrust act that we are seeking now to remedy seems to be the chief holdup of the whole thing.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 280 Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to oppose this bill, and I would like to be recognized in opposition. Am not I entitled to recognition?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman from New York is entitled first and he has one hour, and the gentleman from New York has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. MORGAN. Another parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. After the gentleman from New York has exhausted his hour, then will I or some one else be recognized for an hour in opposition to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not mean that the gentleman from New York is to have his hour first, but the gentleman from New York has been recognized and has yielded to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I find myself in slight opposition to the pending bill before the House, and the reasons I expect to give in a very few minutes. This bill tends further to emasculate what is known as the Clayton antitrust act. Already this act has been considerably dilapidated and operated upon, until there is really not very much left to the Clayton antitrust act. A number of years ago we heard all over this wide country what an awful thing it was to maintain an interlocking directorate. It was almost sufficient grounds to send a man to the penitentiary, and yet this amendment now, in addition to the Kern amendment, which amended the original act by permitting a man to be a director upon two banks, opens the door to the Federal Reserve System and permits the private banker to enter. So far as I can see from reading the Federal reserve act the whole act was designed to keep out the private banker. It will be found on page 4 of the Clayton Act that the private banker was eliminated in the following language:

No bank, banking association, or trust company, organized or operating under the laws of the United States, in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 200,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census of the United States, shall have as a director or other officer or employee any private banker or any director or other officer or employee of any other bank, banking association, or trust company located in the same place: Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares: Provided further, That a director or other officer or employee of such bank, banking association, or trust company may be a director or other officer or employee of not more than one other bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States or any State where the entire capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall forbid a director of class A of a Federal reserve bank, as defined in the Federal reserve act, from being an officer or director or both an officer and director in one member bank.

The Kern amendment permitted a man to be a member of two boards of directors. The chairman of this committee has stated to the House that now all of a sudden it has been discovered, in order to preserve our foreign trade and in order to keep up and make profitable these corporations known as the Edge corporations, which expect to extend European speculation all over the United States, to build factories in Europe for no other purpose than to employ cheap labor abroad to compete with American manufacturers in the home market of this country and abroad, that it is desirable to let in the private banker. It has been suddenly discovered, after the House has spent days and the Senate days in investigating the matter and passed the Edge law, that it is now necessary to let in the private banker. Why? Because they say he knows more about international business than anybody else. He knows more about international pawn-brokering speculation——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I think the gentleman is making a good speech and he ought to have a quorum present to hear it.

Mr. KING. Do not put it on that ground, please. I do not want to get mobbed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that motion is clearly dilatory, as the roll was called not more than five minutes ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the point of no quorum can be called dilatory unless clearly a quorum is present. The Chair does not think that condition prevails now. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 271 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. MORGAN. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Illinois. I will be very glad to hear his speech.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. KING. I will.

Mr. RAKER. I notice in the report this statement, and I would like the gentleman to explain it:

> In these days when we are making efforts to finance foreign trade, and particularly export trade, through national banks and through the Edge Act corporations, the fact that private bankers are positively prohibited from serving as directors in these institutions is proving a serious handicap.

Where is this serious handicap coming in?

Mr. KING. It is a serious handicap, they say, to the private banker, and therefore he ought to be let in. There is no reason for keeping him out and keeping him from making a few million dollars more than he has already. I did not sign the report the gentleman is reading from, but that was the point I was on when the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] made the point of no quorum.

Mr. RAKER. I did not accuse the gentleman of signing the report, but I knew that he was familiar with that phase of the case, and I wanted the gentleman to explain that particular sentence.

Mr. KING. Did I give the gentleman the necessary explanation?

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman gave me a very lucid answer to the question propounded.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do the private bankers referred to in this bill refer to the little country bankers we have throughout the Middle West?

Mr. KING. No; it means the large banker, the international speculator, and so forth, of the eastern metropolis.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand that men who deal in hundreds of millions and in billions of dollars do so as private bankers and are not incorporated?

Mr. KING. I understand that about 75 per cent of the business in New York, especially the international business, is done by private bankers.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. KING. I can not refuse to yield to my distinguished friend.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is there any particular objection to having these private bankers do the business as against the regular chartered bankers?

Mr. KING. Any particular objection? I do not know that there is any particular objection. I was opposed to the whole proposition of these corporations, because I believe they are designed for the purpose, and for no other purpose, of flooding this country with foreign securities and building up foreign factories in foreign countries to compete with American labor by cheap foreign labor. Already in Czechoslovakia they have such a factory and already in Italy they have one. There will be no occasion for any gentleman making a protective tariff speech any more if this kind of legislation goes on.

Mr. KNUTSON. Do I understand from the gentleman's remarks that American capital is going abroad and putting up factories and starting in competition with American concerns?

Mr. KING. That is exactly what they are doing. We are sitting here day after day and letting them do it, and it is impossible to get the attention of the House on that question.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me on that?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. PLATT. Is not this partially a question of marketing products, like wheat and cotton, and things of that sort?

Mr. KING. Yes; and getting those people over there to owe us more money than they now owe us, when they already owe us so much that they will never be able to pay. It is simply piling up more indebtedness in our favor, which they will never pay.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does this bill require them to sell products on credit when they do not want to?

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will be seated a moment, I will try to explain why I am opposed to this particular bill. I am opposed to this bill simply because it opens the door to private bankers to go in and sit on these directorates; not only the large concerns, but every concern in the United States, and not because they are private bankers. You will find here in this amendment it is provided so that the law shall read as follows:

> That nothing in this act shall prohibit any private banker or any officer, director, or employee of any member bank or class A director of a Federal reserve bank, who shall first procure the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, which board is hereby authorized, at its discretion, to grant, withhold, or revoke such consent, from being an officer, director, or employee of not more than two other banks, banking associations, or trust companies, whether organized under the laws of the United States or any State, if such other bank, banking association, or trust company is not in substantial competition with such banker or member bank.

Now, the point I want to make is this, and I get to it now without any further delay: The Federal reserve act, on page 128, has the following section:

> The members of said board—

That is, the Federal Reserve Board—

the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretaries, and the Comptroller of the Currency, shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank."

When Congress passed that provision it was a reasonable proposition, and it was designed for the purpose of keeping the members of the Federal reserve banks from accepting very lucrative positions from these outside bankers after their service under the Government, and therefore they were excluded for two years from becoming members of such directorates or from being thus employed. Now, what do we have? I read a news item, as follows:

Albert Strauss—

Who is Albert Strauss? He is a New York banker, an international banker. This says:

Albert Strauss, the vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board, has resigned, to enter private business.

This bill is intended for nothing in the world except to relieve Albert Strauss, so that he can go upon the directorates of these banks, these large Edge enterprises, and sit upon their directorates in the city of New York. I have no objection or prejudice at all against Mr. Albert Strauss, but it is bad practice, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, to pass an act of that kind, preventing men from getting employment in these banks for two years who have been on the Federal Reserve Board, and then turning right around and passing an enabling bill like this allowing those same men to sit there as private bankers. I think the House ought to have notice of this fact, and should act accordingly. Those who are here now know it and those who will read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD tomorrow morning will know it, but we ought to vote against it. If you think that Albert Strauss or the Strauss family are in need, vote for this bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves that the House do now adjourn. That is a privileged motion, which the Chair thinks the gentleman is entitled to make. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. MORGAN. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 56.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I call for a roll call on that motion to adjourn. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is too late.

Mr. MORGAN. I arose immediately and addressed the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman addressed the Speaker and demanded a division. That has already been had. Whereupon the Chair recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], and he moved the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. The Calendar Wednesday rule provides that debate shall be limited to two hours and shall be equally divided between those for and against the bill under consideration. Now, is it in order to move the previous question with the division of the time unequal?

The SPEAKER. That is a question that the Chair would be glad to hear about.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. Did the Speaker rule that the motion for the yeas and nays was too late?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did.

Mr. MORGAN. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MORGAN. The Speaker will remember that some time ago I called it to the attention of the Speaker that I was opposed to this bill and wanted to be recognized in opposition to it. I address the Speaker now and ask to be recognized in opposition to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize somebody, depending on who is entitled to recognition, if the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is not in order. If the House should favor the previous question, of course then no one would be entitled to recognition. The Chair will be glad to hear a discussion on that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is well taken. This Calendar Wednesday rule gave the House a great deal of trouble first and last. We thought it was a great and meritorious reform when it was first adopted, but Members would come in deliberately and filibuster all day on Wednesday, so that the Calendar Wednesday was made of practically no effect. Then we changed it and limited the debate to two hours and provided that each side should have one hour.

Now, if nobody wants to take the other side, then the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] would be in order, it seems to me; but if anybody wants to take the hour for opposing this thing, I do not believe that the gentleman from New York or anybody else has the right to move the previous question and cut out the full debate on the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Missouri, I think, is correct, with this qualification: That is, that if a gentleman in favor of any measure consumes one hour under the Calendar Wednesday rule, the gentleman who secures recognition in opposition is entitled to an hour. But if the gentleman in favor of the proposition did not use an hour, the gentleman opposed to it is not entitled to use an hour. It says "not exceeding two hours, to be equally divided."

Now, the gentleman from New York controlled the time in favor of the measure, and if he had used more than the time which has been consumed in opposition to it, gentlemen who are opposed to it are entitled to use time until the time is equal on either side.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts contend that if any one side to a debate on a bill under the Calendar Wednesday rule desires not to exercise his privilege in the use of that time, the rule of the House can be set aside and prevent anybody else from exercising his privilege?

Mr. WALSH. No; I did not say that. If nobody seeks the floor in favor of any measure, the gentleman is entitled to recognition to oppose it; but if he secures recognition and opposes the measure, any gentleman who is in favor of it has a right to use a like amount of time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In case the man favoring the bill took no time, and somebody was recognized in opposition, would he be entitled to an hour?

Mr. DOWELL. Unquestionably.

Mr. WALSH. I think he would be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then, under what interpretation of the rule does the gentleman from Massachusetts say that if the proponents of the bill use only 20 minutes, then the opponents of the bill can use only 20 minutes?

Mr. WALSH. I say at the expiration of 20 minutes, when the time has been equally divided, then I think the gentleman from New York might be entitled to move the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If he could get the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. You can not do indirectly that which you can not do directly.

Mr. WALSH. Thank you.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts is right, the proponent of a measure could use only one minute of time, and thereby limit the opposition to only one minute of time, when, on the contrary, the opposition would be entitled to their hour.

Mr. WALSH. That does not follow, of course.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield, this rule is not like any other rule about the previous question. Of course, a great many Members have the delusion that you can move the previous question, no difference what it is about; and that the gentleman from New York could cut out the speeches in opposition to this motion if the Chair would recognize him for the purpose; but what I am contending is that the Chair has no right to recognize him for the purpose of moving the previous question until the opposition to this bill have used their hour if they want to use it. But if the opposition, before their hour is up, indicate that they are through, why, then, the gentleman from New York ought to be permitted to make his motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he remembers any time when this has been decided? The Chair is not conscious of any decision, and he thought perhaps the gentleman from Missouri might remember some decision.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] was telling me about the way I decided it, and he can tell the Speaker.

Mr. WINGO. I was in error as to it being the gentleman from Missouri. I am informed that we were in Committee of the Whole, and that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made the decision in the committee; but whether we were in Committee of the Whole or in the House the rule is the same on Calendar Wednesday. That decision was this, that even if there was no opposition to the bill, if no member of the opposition desired to claim an hour, then some other Member, if he wanted to, even though he favored the bill, could claim the hour. In other words, the rules of the House on Calendar Wednesday fix the limit on the general debate at two hours. That takes away from the House or the committee the right to shut off debate in less than two hours. If you should rule otherwise, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] might proceed for two minutes and then move the previous question, and shut out not only the opponents but those who desired to express themselves in favor of the bill. So the logic of the rule would be the same whether you were in the committee or in the House; and the House having by its general rule said that the debate shall be not exceeding two hours, that expression is well understood to mean that if debate dies out within that time and nobody cares to go on, then debate ends; but the previous question is not in order on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. PLATT rose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to be heard on that.

Mr. KREIDER. I should like to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will be recognized first.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to state the facts of this case. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING] said that he was opposed to the bill and asked for 10 minutes, and 10 minutes' time was given him in opposition to the bill, and he used that time. I had used about the same number of minutes, or a little less, in favor of the bill. Consequently, I think, the time having been at least evenly divided, with rather more to the opposition than to those in favor of the bill, it ought to be in order under the rule to move the previous question. Nobody else had asked for time or expressed opposition.

Mr. DOWELL. But the time that was occupied by the gentleman from Illinois was the time of the gentleman from New York, and he had the floor, having been recognized by the Chair.

Mr. PLATT. He asked for time in opposition to the bill. He could have taken it for an hour.

Mr. DOWELL. It does not make any difference. He was occupying the time of the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to have that question of fact settled. As a matter of fact, did the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois, or was the gentleman from Illinois recognized in his own time?

Mr. PLATT. As a matter of fact, I yielded the time, but it was distinctly understood that it was to be in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from New York has no control of the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. PLATT. It was a matter of convenience.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the rule distinctly sets forth the time allotted for debate on Calendar Wednesday, and provides that one-half of that time shall be allotted to those favoring the bill and one-half to those opposed to it, unless there is an agreement between both sides before the two hours of debate have been consumed, it seems to me that the Chair would not have the right to recognize a Member to move the previous question. The time can not be set aside by the refusal of anybody on either side of this question to avail himself of the privileges of the rule. The mere fact that one man is entitled to the floor to advocate the passage of the bill and another man is entitled to the floor to oppose the bill, and that neither one of those men cares to use his time, is no reason why the Members on the floor should not be permitted to consume the time. It seems to me that the rule can not be set aside by the refusal of a Member of the House in charge of the bill or otherwise to exercise his privileges of debate under the rule. But if there is nobody in the House who cares to exercise that privilege, then, as a matter of course, he has the right to move for a consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule. I do not believe the previous question is in order now.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, this appears to me to be a plain proposition. Permit me to read a part of the rule:

> All debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill and the time be equally divided between those for and against the bill.

Now, the gentleman from New York was recognized, rightfully, by the Chair for one hour. The gentleman from Oklahoma asked for the floor and was told by the Chair that the gentleman from New York had been recognized for an hour. He was entitled to occupy the floor for the hour or yield to any other Member of the House. This he has done. If the Chair now recognizes the gentleman from New York to move the previous question he absolutely defeats the whole purpose of the rule and makes it invalid by allowing the majority to proceed for one hour or any part of it and deprive the minority from exercising its right under the rule. It seems to me the proposition is a plain one, that each side, under the rule, is entitled to the hour, and the Chair on Calendar Wednesday can recognize those for and against the bill for the time provided in the rule, and that time only, the time, of course, to be equally divided between those for and against the bill. So I say, if the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized by the Chair for one hour, he can not be limited in the way the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] seeks to do.

If it were otherwise, instead of observing the rule the gentleman from New York could absolutely fix the time or deprive the opposition from discussing the bill at all by moving the previous question and thus defeat the whole purpose of the rule, which provides that each side shall have an equal length of time.

The rule from which I have quoted a part has three provisions: First, to limit committees to two Calendar Wednesdays; second, to limit general debate on any bill to two hours; and, third, to divide the time equally between those for and against the bill.

The fact that the committee is limited to two Calendar Wednesdays makes it necessary to limit general debate. And because of these limitations the rule has given to both parties an equal opportunity to be heard because of the limit of time.

It seems to me it is clear the point of order should be sustained, and the opposition to the bill should be given the right to be heard, as provided in the plain language of this rule.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I think the rule is entirely clear. The rule provides for one hour for those in favor and one hour for those opposed. The first thing that is done is to recognize the man who has charge of the bill for one hour. I think it is the duty of the Speaker to recognize any person who desires recognition to control the time in opposition. If that were not the case, there would be no orderly procedure. The Speaker would be compelled to ask whether the Member proposing to speak was for or against the bill, and keep account of the time. But this division of time is for those in favor and those opposed to the bill. Any Member who is recognized by the Speaker has control of one hour in opposition to the bill; he has the disposal of that time and he can yield it to others.

The gentleman from New York was recognized for one hour in favor of the bill. He has yielded time both for and against the bill. If the gentleman from Oklahoma desires recognition, being opposed to the bill, he should be recognized and time given to him.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREIDER. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman from New York was recognized for one hour.

Mr. KREIDER. Yes; and he can yield that time to anybody he chooses, either for or against the bill.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about the merits or demerits of the bill before the House, and what I have to say will have no bearing on that. This is the first time that I can recall that this question has arisen. The Calendar Wednesday rule is simply one of the rules of the House, and must be construed in connection with all the other rules of the House, and they should be harmonized if possible. As the Speaker knows, this rule was adopted for the purpose of making it possible to give consideration to bills that were nonprivileged in character on one day in the week, bills that should be considered, both in the House and in Committee of the Whole.

Now, when the rule was first drafted there was no limitation whatever as to the amount of general debate that could be had on a bill on Calendar Wednesday in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. As the Speaker knows, frequently one bill would be called up on the calendar on Calendar Wednesday and be fought through the whole session of Congress, debated extensively each Calendar Wednesday, and that practice absolutely destroyed the effectiveness of the Calendar

Wednesday rule; it became a dead letter so far as passing non-privileged bills.

In the last Congress, when that evil became apparent, the rule was amended by saying that there should not be exceeding—the rule does not say there shall be two hours—the rule says there shall not be exceeding two hours of general debate. Now, what does that mean? It means debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There is no general debate in the House. In the Committee of the Whole House or in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there is no motion for the previous question; there is no way to bring the general debate to a close; it can be carried on indefinitely; and therefore the rule was adopted which says that in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when general debate is being had it shall not exceed two hours.

It has always been true before the Calendar Wednesday rule was amended that whenever a bill was brought up in the House on Calendar Wednesday the gentleman who was recognized could take five minutes and then demand the previous question. If the House voted with him, that was the end of the matter, and the House itself proceeded to vote on the merits or demerits of the proposition.

In my judgment this limitation to the rule is to close general debate in Committee of the Whole, and that in no way repeals or abrogates the rules of the House that apply to the consideration of bills in the House itself, and the matter is always left to a majority of the House. When the previous question is demanded, then, if a majority of the House desires to consider the matter further, they can vote down the demand for the previous question. If the previous question is voted down, the control will pass to the opposition and some one against the measure will be recognized for one hour.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman construe the remainder of the rule which provides that all debate shall be confined to the subject matter and shall be equally divided between those for and against the bill to also refer to debate in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CRISP. I do, because in the House, always, debate must be germane to the subject matter under consideration. The only place I know of under the rules of the House where a man debates something that is not before the House to be acted on is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under general debate.

Mr. WALSH. Then the gentleman thinks that the Calendar Wednesday rule has no application to bills on the House Calendar?

Mr. CRISP. I do; because the Calendar Wednesday rule provides that bills, when a committee has a call, can be called up either on the House Calendar or on the Union Calendar, and if called up on the House Calendar the general rules of the House apply, and if the previous question is not ordered I would think that there would be debate under the general rules of the House. In my opinion, the person having the floor could demand the previous question at any time, and if the demand was sustained by the House all debate would be ended. If the House wants to do an unfair thing, as some gentlemen say it would do under such circumstances in closing debate before the two hours are up, it is up to the House to decide whether it will do so or not. The majority can do anything it desires to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. If this were not under the Calendar Wednesday rule, but the bill had been taken up under a special rule providing for not exceeding two hours, but without providing for the automatic adoption of the previous question, would it then be in order for a Member in charge of a bill to offer a motion for the previous question at any time prior to the expiration of the two hours of debate?

Mr. CRISP. If the rule just said that there shall not be exceeding two hours of debate, yes; I would think so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the rule applying to Calendar Wednesday any more sacred in that regard than any special rule that may be brought in?

Mr. CRISP. I do not think so. That is all I care to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, just a word. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] struck the keynote of this whole controversy when he said that the two-hour provision in the Calendar Wednesday rule has no application whatsoever to any bill except one being considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, because there is no such thing as general debate except in connection with debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How did the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] ever get his hour?

Mr. TILSON. He got it under the general rules of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But the general rules of the House confine the matter to whatever time is fixed.

Mr. TILSON. The Calendar Wednesday rule does not attempt to limit debate in the House at all, but only general debate, and there is no such thing as general debate, except in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Under that construction, then, a bill on the House Calendar might be brought in indefinitely, if the House so desires.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; but it could not run beyond two Calendar Wednesdays.

Mr. RAKER. Is not this very rule intended so that unless two-thirds of the Members of the House repeal it you can not on any bill extend general debate for more than two hours?

Mr. TILSON. That is correct, but only as to general debate. The trouble was that on Calendar Wednesday the general debate ran on indefinitely and that there was no way to close it in Committee of the Whole. In order to close general debate in two hours so that the Committee of the Whole could get down to the actual consideration of the bill, this rule was adopted. After general debate is exhausted and the bill is being read for amendment under the five-minute rule on Calendar Wednesdays, debate can go on for not to exceed two days under the other provisions of the Calendar Wednesday rule.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman recognizes that in both cases where it was in Committee of the Whole on a Union Calendar bill, as well as on a House bill, the Member had been using more than two hours, and if the Committee on Rules wanted to confine it simply to bills on the Union Calendar and in Committee of the Whole, then why did they not say in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. TILSON. They did practically say that by saying that general debate shall continue for not exceeding two hours.

In considering a bill in the House there is a way provided to close debate, by adopting the previous question.

If a majority of the House wish to close debate they always have the means at hand by voting the previous question. In the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there is no such provision as the previous question, hence the two-hour rule. When considering a bill in the House there is no necessity and no reason for the two-hour rule; therefore I do not believe that it was intended to apply in such cases.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman has just stated what I was going to ask him, if he believed this provision applied to limiting debate to two hours? The gentleman is stating that it does not limit debate on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think that debate on House Calendar bills is limited at all by this rule.

Mr. DOWELL. On Calendar Wednesday?

Mr. TILSON. On Calendar Wednesday. It can be limited at any time by voting the previous question.

Mr. DOWELL. Has it not been the universal ruling of the Chair that this rule on Calendar Wednesday limits the debate on every bill before the House to two hours?

Mr. TILSON. I do not remember that it has been so construed in case of a bill being considered in the House. I know that it applies in cases where a Union Calendar bill is being considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. RAKER. When the Committee on Rules brought in this amendment, was it not reported and discussed in the House to the end that the debate must be upon the bill before the House and only two hours would be given to any bill, and that is the reason the committee brought in this amendment and that is the reason the House adopted it, carrying both Union Calendar bills in the Committee of the Whole and also bills on the House Calendar? The House is bound by that, unless there is a two-thirds vote, and that was done so as to protect the House and to expedite business.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, there is no need for this rule so far as bills considered in the House are concerned, because there is no general debate. All debate must be on the subject matter before the House and debate can be closed at any time by adopting the previous question. It is necessary and useful only in connection with the consideration of Union Calendar bills. The use of the words "general debate" would seem to limit it to such bills. I believe that it applies to none other.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the amendment to the rule explains fully the purpose for which it was offered in the House and adopted by the House, which provided that not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure on Calendar Wednesday. Now, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Connecticut, general debate is had only in Committee of the Whole. As is known to the Speaker and every Member of the House, for years here on Calendar Wednesday when the House was in Committee of the Whole House the length of general debate was rarely, if ever, agreed upon, and therefore it continued as long as Members could get the floor, and the entire day was wasted in general debate. I remember occasions when the committee would rise and go into the House to close general debate. Finally it was decided that the House by a rule should limit general debate on Calendar Wednesday, which applied, of course, to bills in the Committee of the Whole House. The House is always prepared to close debate in the House by voting the previous question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman was here and was a member of the Committee on Rules when this rule was adopted?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And the rule was intended to prevent filibustering?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is it exactly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that it should apply to the House as well as to the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The previous question can always be had in the House to prevent filibustering.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Suppose the House was in a contrary frame of mind and voted down the previous question all the time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then the two hours would be the limit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if it is a two-hour limit at one time what is the reason it is not a two-hour limit all the time; and if it is not that way, how does it happen that a gentleman like the gentleman from New York can come in and cut off gentlemen in debate in opposition to a bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is with the House to do it; the gentleman from New York can not do it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I have been insisting on all the time is that the Speaker ought not to recognize the gentleman from New York or anybody else under any such circumstances.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think the rule of Calendar Wednesday prohibits the Speaker from recognizing a Member of the House to make the motion; that is, to set aside or to recess over Calendar Wednesday. The recess over Calendar Wednesday is prohibited, and nobody can be recognized for that motion, except on the last days of the session.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman read from the rule which limits debate to two hours on any measure. I put emphasis on "any measure." The conclusion the gentleman reaches is that it limits it to measures on the Union Calendar, but not on the House Calendar, and this says "any measure."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But general debate is not had on any measure except in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAMSEYER. That distinction is not drawn in the rule. It limits it to any measure and gives the House two hours of debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The definition of general debate settles the question, because general debate only applies to measures on the Union Calendar in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then you can have four or five days of debate on a bill on the House Calendar, provided the previous question is not ordered?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the House did not vote the previous question.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted a single word further in reference to the point of order, the rule for Calendar Wednesday makes in order certain bills either upon the House Calendar or upon the Union Calendar, and those bills are protected by the wording of the rule which says that no other business shall be in order. Now, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who is undoubtedly as well posted on parliamentary law as any Member of this House, contends that the language of the proviso of the Calendar Wednesday rule should be read as applying simply to Union Calendar bills. I regret I can not agree with that interpretation, because that language is as follows:

Provided, That not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called up on Calendar Wednesday, and all debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill, the time to be equally divided between those for and against the bill.

Now, it says all debate shall be confined to the bill, and it shall be equally divided between those in favor and those opposed, and that——

Mr. CRISP. I wanted to ask my friend if he did not think all debate was connected with general debate, and that the rule means all general debate?

Mr. WALSH. No; I can not agree with that interpretation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask, Does not all debate under limited debate have to be confined to the bill anyway?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it does, and it says it is further limited.

The SPEAKER. It is only necessary as applying to general debate?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, if it is only applying to general debate, it certainly would not say "all debate," and they would not further qualify it by saying it shall be divided equally between those for or against a measure. Now, if you permit in the House—and the bill has the protection of this rule in the House, just the same as it does in the Committee of the Whole—if you permit in the House debate to be had in favor of a measure in the face of this provision that it shall be equally divided, you permit a Member in charge of a bill to move the previous question, shut out debate against it, and by a majority vote you suspend the Calendar Wednesday rule, which, under the rules, can not be suspended except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. You said that the terms of debate are not applied only to general debate. Now, if they are not, then all debate is confined to two hours, and that includes the five-minute debate also. You would have no five-minute debate unless the term of debate is confined to the general debate. Frequently debate runs here for two days under the five-minute rule, and if you confine debate to two hours you can not have that five-minute rule.

Mr. WALSH. It does not say that all debate is confined to two hours. It says that all debate must be confined to the subject of the bill and must be equally divided.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, but is it not all tied up there with the two-hour proposition?

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If interpreted literally, does not the gentleman's contention mean this, that all debate, including general and five-minute debate, must be equally divided? If the gentleman is going to insist upon a literal interpretation of the words "all debate," then it would mean that the Speaker must sit with stop-watch in hand so as to be sure that all debate, general debate and five-minute-rule debate, is exactly divided between those opposing and those in favor of the bill, because that is what the rule says. It seems to me that such a contention is not tenable.

Mr. WALSH. Of course that contention can not be made, but I contend that when this rule was made those words meant something, and when this rule was originally adopted it was to give bills on the calendar which were in order on Calendar Wednesday some protection; and when it was said that Members in favor of the bill should have no advantage, so far as time was concerned, over those who were against it, the words were put in there to provide for that.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] gets up here in the House, and simply because the bill is not on the Union Calendar has 10 minutes of his time, and he uses his time in favor of it, and at the end of that 10 minutes, by the motion of the previous question, can shut off all debate against that measure, simply because it is not on the Union Calendar, and by a motion for the previous question, carried by a majority vote, can suspend this rule as to Calendar Wednesday. I believe that it is of the utmost importance that bills that are given the privilege on Calendar Wednesday should be accorded the fullest protection of the Calendar Wednesday rule.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will my friend yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I am sure the gentleman will admit that if a privileged bill is called up under the general rules of the House the Member in charge of it, after five minutes' speech, if he wants to, can demand the previous question. The gentleman admits that. That cuts off anybody else from considering or having anything to say on the privileged bill if the majority of the House ordered the previous question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Does my friend think that the Calendar Wednesday rule was intended to give a nonprivileged bill a more favored status for consideration than other bills pending before the House?

Mr. WALSH. I do, because the rules specifically provide for that by excepting bills that are privileged under the rule and providing this special rule for bills that are not privileged.

Mr. CRISP. I think the object and purpose of the Calendar Wednesday rule was to give the House a chance to consider once a week bills that were nonprivileged and could not be gotten up but for the Calendar Wednesday rule.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, the gentleman knows very well that the rule provides that one single bill can occupy two Wednesdays, and by a two-thirds vote can be in order more than two Wednesdays, which, of course, would not be right in the case of a privileged bill brought up subject to the motion for the previous question at any time. This, as the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] pointed out, was a special rule provided for special circumstances. While I am not familiar with the early operation of this rule, because I did not happen to be a Member of this body at that time, the Speaker, I am sure, is familiar with how it was first operated and how it was abused; and now later they have put this proviso on there, and I think there is some weight in the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] that you must not lose sight of the fact that it says "not more than two hours of general debate shall be permitted on any measure called up on Calendar Wednesday" without referring specifically to either calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. It is evident that the Speaker will have to take some time to consider this question.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withdraw it a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was going to suggest that this was a novel question, and the debate shows that it is a question upon which there are two sides. The Chair will be very glad to take it into consideration and give his ruling later, and it is so late now that no harm will be done..

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PLATT. If this should go over, what opportunity will there be for the Speaker to determine on the rule before next Wednesday?

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that on next Wednesday, pending the decision of the Chair, the Committee on Banking and Currency may have the call, for not exceeding 30 minutes, until the final disposition of this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Or until final disposition of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, suppose that the 30 minutes is taken up in arguing further this point of order?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if you take only 30 minutes, and if the Chair should happen to hold that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is entitled to an hour, you could not finish.

Mr. MADDEN. In order to bring the matter to a conclusion, I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WINGO. Let me suggest that unanimous consent be asked that the Speaker be permitted to hand down his decision at any time. That would be the better way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion of the Speaker was correct. I was just about to make that suggestion myself. I remember taking a matter under advisement once for a week, from one Calendar Wednesday to another, because it was so mixed up and tough, and at just about this time in the evening, that I asked the House to adjourn, and it did so, and I think that was entirely correct.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until Thursday, April 8, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13274) to convey to the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. a portion of the military reservation of Fort Logan H. Roots, in the State of Arkansas, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 803), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13432) to regulate dealing in leaf tobacco, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 807), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULL of Iowa, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 180) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to agricultural fertilizer distributors or users a supply of nitrate of soda, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 808), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. EDMONDS, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 908) for the relief of Leo Balsam, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 804), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7050) for the relief of the First State Bank of Kerrville, Kerr County, State of Texas, and to refund to that bank moneys which were deducted from its securities following the loss of war-savings stamps or certificates mailed by the said Kerrville bank to the Federal reserve bank at Dallas, Tex., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 805), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5189) for the relief of Leonidas Sawyer, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 806), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 13477) increasing the pay of printers employed in the Government Printing Office, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. GRIGSBY: A bill (H. R. 13478) making an appropriation of the sum of $100,000 for the construction of a dike, dam, or other protection to keep the waters of the Skagway River from running into, over, and upon the town of Skagway, Alaska; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WRIGHT: A bill (H. R. 13479) to repeal an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. EDMONDS: A bill (H. R. 13480) to repeal subsection B of section 503 of the revenue act of 1918; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. TINCHER: A bill (H. R. 13481) to provide relief to persons who owned wheat of the crop of 1917 before the announcement of the Food Administration price-fixing policy with respect thereto, and who sold such wheat after August 11, 1917; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 13482) to provide for permanent improvements of parts of the Taneytown public road within the limits of the battle field of Gettysburg; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WRIGHT: A bill (H. R. 13484) to repeal an act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. FESS: Resolution (H. Res. 512) for the immediate consideration of House bill 12266; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MASON: Resolution (H. Res. 513) to investigate the situation in the Republic of San Domingo and to withdraw American troops; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: Memorial of the Senate of the State of New York, favoring the transfer of all barges and other canal equipment used on the New York canals to the State of New York; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 13485) for the relief of George W. Cook; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13486) for the relief of Nathaniel Staub; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. EMERSON: A bill (H. R. 13487) for the relief of R. E. Carpenter; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARRELD: A bill (H. R. 13488) granting a pension to Andrew J. Legg; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13489) granting a pension to Capt. R. T. Jacobs; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13490) for the relief of Charles Hatch, alias Charles H. Lord; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LANHAM: A bill (H. R. 13491) for the relief of C. L. Hampton; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LARSEN: A bill (H. R. 13492) granting an increase of pension to Crowell Lisenby; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: A bill (H. R. 13493) granting an increase of pension to Isabella W. Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MILLIGAN: A bill (H. R. 13494) granting an increase of pension to Edward Lewey; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13495) granting a pension to Matilda K. Baldwin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RIORDAN: A bill (H. R. 13496) for the relief of the widow and next of kin of James J. Curran; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SANFORD: A bill (H. R. 13497) for the adjudication and determination of the claims arising under joint resolution of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. L., 670), authorizing the Postmaster General to continue to use in the Postal Service Marcus P. Norton's combined post-marking and stamp-canceling handstamp patents and directing him to "determine upon a fair, just, and equitable compensation for the use of said inventions" or arising otherwise; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. SELLS: A bill (H. R. 13498) granting an increase of pension to William A. Turner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WILSON of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 13499) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to J. D. Calhoun, of Lincoln Parish, La., certain lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12471) for the relief of Andrew Spence; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. 13127) granting an increase of pension to Lorenzo D. Gill; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 13467) granting a pension to Sumner Bumgarner; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

2838. By Mr. CARSS: Petition of citizens of Minnesota, urging the passage of House bill 1112; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2839. By Mr. DYER: Petition of the Missouri National Guard, urging certain legislation for the National Guard units, etc.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

2840. By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the La Salle (Ill.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring increase in compensation to the postal employees, etc.; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

2841. Also, petition of the H. J. Heinz Co. and the Mills Novelty Co., of Chicago, and the Rockford Mitten & Hosiery Co., of Rockford, Ill., opposing House bills 12379 and 12646; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

2842. By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Henry K. Fitts, of Boston, Mass., favoring adoption of 1-cent rate on drop letters; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

2843. Also, petition of Whittemore Bros. Corporation, favoring exemption of tax on freight charges covering export shipments; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2844. Also, petition of Thomson-Crooker Shoe Co., the Thorndike Hotel, and F. A. Foster Co., of Boston, Mass., protesting against House bills 12379 and 12646, providing taxes on bank exchanges; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

2845. Also, petition of Shreve, Crump & Low Co., of Boston, Mass., protesting against the proposed specific tax on advertising; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2851. By Mr. ROSE: Petition of Pomona Grange No. 24, of Bedford County, Pa., urging the Congress of the United States to make such necessary appropriation as may be needed for the proper investigation and research as will insure the protection of the lives and health of our citizens from the ravages of the dread disease commonly known as the "flu"; to the Committee on Appropriations.

2852. By Mr. ROWAN: Petition of the Silk Association of America, of New York City, favoring an adjustment of the revenue laws of the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2853. Also, petition of the American Legion of the State of New York, with a report of the special committee on adjusted compensation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2854. Also, petition of Harris Suspender Co., of New York, opposing the passage of House bill 12976; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2855. Also, petition of Purina Mills, of St. Louis, Mo., opposing the Steagall-McFadden bills; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

2856. Also, petition of H. J. Heinz, of New York City, opposing the passage of House bills 12379 and 12646; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

2857. By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Petition of the Fred Green Post, No. 49, American Legion, of Limon, Colo., urging adjusted compensation for the ex-service men and women; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 8, 1920.

Rev. Fitzgerald S. Parker, D. D., of Nashville, Tenn., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the source of our strength. We pray that Thou wilt strengthen us. Thou art the source of grace. We pray that Thou wilt make our hearts gracious. Thou art the author of our being. We pray that we may be issued into the continued being through the life manifest in Jesus Christ. Let Thy blessing be upon us this day as we proceed with our day's toil, remembering that Thy son, Jesus Christ, was pronounced the perfect one in whom Thou wert well pleased, because He wrought well. Let Thy blessing be upon our country in its widely extended interests and its manifold opportunities and large responsibilities, upon the countries of the world, upon the kingdom of Jesus Christ as it enters into and pervades all these institutions. And this, our petition, we make in His name. Amen.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1920.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. JAMES E. WATSON, a Senator from the State of Indiana, to perform the duties of the Chair during my absence.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. WATSON thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer for the day.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard
Capper	Glass	McLean	Simmons
Colt	Harris	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Comer	Harrison	New	Smoot
Culberson	Henderson	Nugent	Spencer
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kendrick	Phipps	Thomas
Elkins	Kirby	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
Gay	McCormick	Ransdell	Watson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have responded to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Clerk will call the list of absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. GRONNA, Mr. CALDER, Mr. KENYON, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. BORAH entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] are detained on official business.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] is necessarily absent, and that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are absent in attendance at a committee meeting.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is unavoidably detained from the Senate, and that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8038) to amend section 4 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, extending its provisions to Porto Rico, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer:

H. R. 202. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent in fee simple to the county of Huron, in the State of Michigan, for a certain described tract of land for public-park purposes;

H. R. 1275. An act for the relief of W. L. Rose;

H. R. 1791. An act for the relief of O. W. Lindsley;

H. R. 3211. An act for the relief of Emma J. Spear;

H. R. 5213. An act for the relief of occupants and claimants of unsurveyed public land in township 8 north of range 2 west of Salt Lake meridian, Utah;

H. R. 6136. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands to school district No. 21, of Fremont County, Wyo.;

H. R. 6291. An act for the relief of E. Willard;

H. R. 6413. An act granting the sum of $549.12 to Clara Kane, dependent parent, by reason of the death of William A. Yenser, late civil employee, killed as a result of an accident at the Philadelphia Navy Yard;

H. R. 6772. An act authorizing and directing the transfer approximately of 10 acres of land to rural high-school district No. 1, Lapwai, Idaho;

H. R. 6773. An act for the relief of Albert C. Burgess;

H. R. 10207. An act providing for service of process in causes removed from a State or other court to a United States court;

H. R. 12711. An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act; and

H. J. Res. 222. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts favoring the repeal of restrictions on the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right of free assemblage. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1920.

Resolutions favoring the repeal of restrictions on the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right of free assemblage.

Resolved, That in view of the ratification of the peace treaty by a majority of the allied countries and the virtual ending of the Great War, so happily consummated, the General Court of Massachusetts declares its belief that the time has now come for the repeal and removal of all restrictions imposed for the duration of the war on the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the right of the people peaceably to assemble.

Resolved, That the secretary of the Commonwealth be instructed to transmit copies of the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States, to the members of his Cabinet, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Massachusetts.

In senate adopted March 3, 1920.

In house of representatives adopted in concurrence March 8, 1920.

A true copy. Attest:

ALBERT P. LANGLEY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Label Manufacturers' National Association, of Cleveland, Ohio, and a petition of the Folding Box Manufacturers' National Association, of Cleveland, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing that the excess-profits tax be abandoned and a flat tax on sales be substituted therefor, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. MCCUMBER, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12260) to amend section 600 of the act approved September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 509) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 510) thereon.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 189) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution just reported by him, which will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That for such reasonable time as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not extending beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for all payments of insurance installments heretofore or hereafter made under the provisions of Article IV of the war-risk insurance act in advance of the verification of the deduction on the pay rolls, or of the payment otherwise, of all premiums.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will simply say in explanation of the joint resolution that in substance it provides for the extension for an additional year of the provisions of public joint resolution 52, Sixty-fifth Congress. The War Risk Insurance Bureau is unable to get its accounts audited in time so as to comply with the requirements of the Auditor for the Treasury Department, and this joint resolution proposes to confer the authority on the Auditor for the Treasury Department to credit the disbursing clerk of the War Risk Insurance Bureau with the amounts of payments of insurance installments without being accompanied by a certificate from the proper officer of the Army or Navy Department to the effect that deductions from pay for premiums on such insurance had been paid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4197) to provide for loans to enable veterans of the war with Germany to attend educational institutions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 4198) for the relief of certain estates; and

A bill (S. 4199) for the relief of certain estates; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4200) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Winchester, Mass., one German cannon or field-piece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 4201) granting a pension to Affie M. Crockett (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 4202) granting a pension to John H. Vogt (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4203) for the relief of the Cornwell Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $300,000 toward the development of a submarine, destroyer, and aviation base at or near Ediz Hook, Port Angeles, Wash., intended to be proposed by him to the Naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted sundry amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GORE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. I present a proposed amendment to House bill 8078, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS to the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," viz, insert as an additional section:

"That there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in respect of the excess over the sum of $1,000 which any person, firm, association, or corporation shall give, advance, pay, expend, subscribe, or contribute in the aggregate during any taxable year for the purpose, directly or indirectly, of influencing the nomination or defeat of any candidate or candidates for nomination, or the election or defeat of any candidate or candidates for office, or the success or defeat of any proposition, to be voted upon at any primary election or general or special election at which candidates for Members of the House of Representatives or for United States Senator or presidential electors are to be nominated or elected, a tax equal to 100 per cent of such excess; such expenditures or contributions to include all sums in any form contributed, subscribed, advanced, expended, paid or given to or for or against such candidate, candidates, or proposition, or to or for party or other political committees or campaign funds, but not to include lawful expenditures made by such candidates or regular political committees or out of such campaign funds of moneys lawfully contributed to them.

"Every person, firm, and corporation required by law to make an income-tax return shall state therein specifically each item and the date thereof of all gifts, advances, expenditures, subscriptions, payments, and contributions made, and to whom, for the purpose of influencing the result of such primary and general elections and of all taxes due thereon under the provisions of this section. And the treasurer or chairman of all State or congressional committees and of all political committees as defined in the act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' and of all associations or committees organized to promote or prevent or engaged in promoting or preventing the nomination or election of any candidate for Member of the House of Representatives or of the Senate of the Congress of the United States or for presidential elector or electors, shall within 30 days after the election to be held therefor file with the collector for the district where the headquarters or other office where such committee or association is located, a return stating specifically all sums of money received, from whom received, and the date thereof."

GOVERNMENT OPERATION OF RAILROADS.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have here a brief article, clipped from a recent issue of the Washington Post, showing, on the authority of Hon. Walker D. Hines, the Director General of Railroads, the cost to the Government of Government operation of railroads during the short period of that operation. I ask that the article may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the rule to which we have agreed, I shall have to object.

Mr. MYERS. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the article is only about 6 inches in length.

Mr. SMOOT. But if we permit one such article to be printed in the RECORD we shall have to allow them all to be so printed.

Mr. MYERS. Then I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the printing of the article in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Montana may read it if he so desires.

Mr. MYERS. I do not think it would be in order for me to do so now.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there will be any objection to the Senator reading the article.

Mr. MYERS. Then, Mr. President, I will read the article, if there be no objection. It is as follows:

Congress was asked formally yesterday to appropriate $420,727,341 to wind up the affairs of the Railroad Administration.

In requesting the fund, Walker D. Hines, Railroad Administrator, placed the loss resulting from the Government's experience in Federal control at $900,478,756. In addition the Government has $966,803,363 owing it by the roads, the money having been advanced for operating expenses and betterments. Ultimately this fund will be repaid.

Mr. Hines explained that no allowance had been made in his request to cover any claims the roads might have against the Government for maintenance of the lines because the net amount for this purpose could not yet be estimated.

Before the carriers were returned to private operation last March 1, Congress appropriated $1,450,000,000 for the expenses of the Railroad Administration, and the new request to liquidate its affairs would bring the total appropriations to $1,870,727,341, incurred by the Government, including $677,513,152 for the operation of the so-called class 1 roads. Operation of smaller lines, sleeping and refrigerator cars, and steamship lines caused loss of $43,011,129 and inland waterways $2,449,739. The American Railway Express was operated at a loss of $38,111,742, while miscellaneous losses were listed as aggregating $125,438,014.

In addition the expenses of the central and regional organizations of the Railroad Administration were placed at $13,954,980, and $3,445,222 will be required for its expenses from last March until next January.

Under the transportation act $270,079,575 of the $966,803,363 due the Government by the roads will be funded for a period of 10 years. This was advances for improvements. An additional $367,806,968, advanced for equipment purchases, will be payable in 15 annual installments. In addition the Government holds $144,422,526 of one-year notes of the carriers, $44,433,664 of long-term notes, $35,221,199 of stocks, bonds, or receivers' certificates, and $90,258,305 as "miscellaneous investments." The inland waterways owe the Government $14,581,126.

Mr. Hines's letter also showed that the Railroad Administration expended a total of $765,821,450 for improvements on the roads, but of this amount he listed $495,741,875 as the "probable deductions" to be made under the railroad bill for debts owed to the lines by the Government in the form of rent.

In comment, I will simply say that during the period of Government operation of the railroads, extending over a little more than two years of time, the cost to the Government was very close to $2,000,000,000, of which about one billion is owing by the railroads and will probably be returned to the Government at some time, if the railroads are ever able to earn it. That will leave the net loss to the Government very close to $1,000,000,000.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 8038. An act to amend section 4 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, extending its provisions to Porto Rico, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.). Morning business is closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3792, the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3792) to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, on February 5 I submitted and had printed an amendment to the pending bill. I now offer that amendment, and move it as a substitute for the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. As a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MCKELLAR, it is proposed to strike out section 51 and all other sections and clauses of the bill providing for compulsory military or naval training.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, this bill furnishes a complete and comprehensive plan for the organization of the Military Establishment and the creation of a cohesive, effective army, and is the result of work well done by the able chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, who, with the members of the subcommittee, labored long and faithfully in its production. It provides for a Regular Army of 280,000 enlisted men with 18,000 officers, and in addition the National Guard and a reserve force of all men who are brought into the service through the compulsory training.

The bill has, I know, the approval of the War Department, as has been stated, and of Gen. Pershing, the great commander of our Army overseas, who, in urging the adoption of the compulsory training system, stated that in addition to the preparation of our young men for service in defense of the country in time of war, that such training would develop physical vigor and manliness and that "the preparation for service to the country increases their patriotism, broadens their views through association with men of all classes, and is thoroughly democratic."

I understand also that the American Legion favors the policy of compulsory military training.

Such approval represents only the military point of view, however. It is the business of the War Department, of course, to insist upon a permanent Military Establishment large enough to preserve order throughout the Nation and our island possessions and to protect against any threatened danger or sudden attack from the outside.

Gen. Pershing is a soldier by profession, and the American Legion, which also indorses it, represents that viewpoint necessarily, since it is composed only of officers and men of our great Army recently demobilized.

The bill should not be enacted merely because it will produce a grand army nor without proper consideration of productive industrial and economic conditions and the other needs of our country and people. It must be remembered that we had a grand army of more than 4,000,000 men in the service; that we have just demobilized this army that had successfully vindicated the Nation's rights upon the battle fields of the world—demobilized it because it was no longer needed. Other things than a great army are needed to promote the public welfare.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the adoption of the policy of universal compulsory military training in times of peace. In the Military Affairs Committee I moved to strike out of this Army reorganization bill section 51 and all other sections and clauses providing for compulsory military or naval training, and have proposed a like amendment here. It reads:

Strike out section 51 and all other sections and clauses of the bill providing for compulsory military or naval training.

Section 51 reads as follows:

SEC. 51. Military training: All male citizens of the United States (excluding residents of Alaska and the insular possessions) and all male persons who reside therein and who have declared their intention to become citizens, other than persons excepted by this act, shall, upon attaining the age of 18 years or within three years thereafter, be subject to military or naval training and shall be inducted into the Army or Navy of the United States for this purpose alone, and shall be subject to training therein for a period of four months and for such further time as may be reasonably necessary for enrollment, mobilization, and demobilization: Provided, That under regulations to be prescribed by the President the training of any such person may, with his consent, be continued for an additional period not exceeding two months. After training they are placed in the reserve for five years, and as reservists subject to mobilization and additional training for two annual periods of not exceeding two weeks each.

That makes four months' training; whatever time is necessary in addition to register, mobilize, transport, and demobilize them, and four weeks additional, which necessarily would bring the amount of time up to nearly six months.

CONSCRIPTION LAW REENACTED.

Section 57, also proposed to be stricken out, reads:

In order to carry out the provisions of this act relative to the registration, examination, classification, exception, exemption, and induction into the service of persons liable for the military training provided for in this act, so much of the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," as may be necessary and applicable thereto are hereby extended and made applicable for this purpose.

I voted against the enactment of the draft law in the first instance and favored the old volunteer system, knowing that the history of the volunteer was the history of America's military glory and achievement, and I shall certainly not vote to conscript our young men for military training in times of peace. It is true, however, that the draft operated effectively and produced a great Army which proved no less valiant than our Armies of other days and carried our standard to victory on the battle fields of the world.

The war has been fought and won. The war was lost to the Allies till the United States entered it, and our entry determined its outcome—changed defeat into victory. America's rights have been vindicated and our great Army has been demobilized. The peace treaty it is true has not yet been ratified by us, but it has been ratified and is effective so far as our enemies, associates, and allies are concerned. Universal compulsory military training is now proposed as a permanent policy of our Military Establishment. Never before in the Nation's history has such a policy been seriously considered. Our wars have all resulted in victory without the suggestion even of the adoption thereafter of any such policy of preparedness.

Such a policy is undemocratic, un-American, vastly expensive, wholly unnecessary, and can not but result in fastening militarism, which this great war was fought to destroy, upon our own beloved land.

It violates the basic truth of the Declaration of Independence, the Nation's charter of liberty, "All Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Wherein has any consent of the governed, those to be affected by this bill, been given? It only requires, yea, compels, our young men 18 years of age, men who are not allowed to cast a vote or have a voice in the Government, to leave home and farm and school and occupation and business and spend four to six months in training in military camps, subject to the harsh military law and regulations and liable to court-martial for disobedience or infraction thereof. It is even worse than that. The Congress now being urged to impose this un-American, this Prussian military policy upon the country was elected during the war and before this matter was ever proposed, discussed with or considered by the people. They have had no opportunity or chance whatever to determine what should be done about it.

Why the haste about the adoption of this policy, that is so new, that is un-American, that is undemocratic, when, as I understand from the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, it is not proposed now to put it into effect for two years yet to come? Why not at least let the people who do vote, and who have a right to a voice here, pass upon the merits or demerits of it? The consent of the governed is but a sham, a hollow mockery, so far as this proposal is concerned.

NOT NECESSARY.

No necessity exists for the adoption of such a policy. Notwithstanding we are still technically in a state of war, the peace treaty not having been ratified, our enemies have been crushed, stripped of their military and naval power, their Governments overthrown, and their territory dismembered. They are powerless to harm us. With all the rest of the world we are at peace.

The nations of the Old World, beyond the oceans which are still our best defense, are exhausted from waging the last war and impotent to menace the peace or safety of our country with an attack for years to come. There is no power or combination of powers on this side of the world strong enough to give us any concern even if we were not friendly with them all. Our Army as now organized is twice as large as it was before we engaged in this war.

There is the National Guard also, and in addition we have easily available for service, or that can be immediately made so, nearly 4,000,000 trained soldiers recently demobilized, one-half veterans from service overseas, where on the battle fields of France the American Army set the Stars and Stripes highest among the standards of the nations, and demonstrated in the face of the battling hosts of the world the incomparable qualities of the American soldier and the invincible prowess of the American Nation.

It is objected, however, that these men, who have served our country so well, should not be expected to render further service. Why not? They are thoroughly trained and fit, and it strikes me it would be far better, if more is to be expended on a program of preparedness, to have them take the possible slight chance of service in any future emergency within the period of their activity and be paid the amount proposed to be used for compulsory training as additional compensation for the service already performed. This course would, at least, prevent the taking of 750,000 men for six months in the year out of industry and production and do but simple justice to our ex-service men.

Mr. President, the ex-service men—the American Legion—have not hesitated, since their return to this country, to give advice on all great public questions, or at least to suggest their opinion about what ought to be done; and it will not be amiss if I, who am a soldier's son—my father fought four years in the Confederate Army—should interpolate here something that I had not intended to say.

I think it should be well understood that the Government may be trusted to do what is right, so far as the payment of additional compensation for the service already so well rendered is concerned. I know, and it is generally agreed, that the Government has already been liberal, has been generous, in making provision for taking care of and maintaining the crippled and the wounded of the last war, and for paying insurance to the beneficiaries of those who died or were killed in battle. I think they might well trust the Government to take care of this additional claim, and that these soldiers of ours who have returned should readjust themselves to existing conditions. It will not do that these men who are young, who are but yet in the morning of life, shall regard their careers as ended and that there is nothing else for them to do hereafter. They have had the great adventure, but it is yet for them the morning of life, and a man can not lay out his life in the morning. There must come a noontide, the burden and heat of the day, and there will come the evening and the dark. They must rely upon themselves in civil life, as they were taught to rely upon themselves in the Army yonder. They must go on with the duties of citizenship and make their places in civil life and careers in the world as best they can and as all others must do. Too much reliance and dependence should not be put upon the Government, and no time should be wasted by them in getting back into civil life or waiting for a bonus that may, in fact, never be provided.

RACE QUESTION.

There is an additional difficulty connected with this matter. The race question will be affected. The adoption of this policy will accentuate the race problem already increasingly difficult in the South because of the return of ex-soldiers of the Negro race.

The Negro on the whole is well disposed, industrious, peaceable, and law-abiding, and makes a good farm laborer and farmer, but when he is given military training it changes his disposition and he becomes idle and arrogant, a troublesome element in the rural districts. The bad effect would not be so noticeable in cities that have adequate police protection, but certainly there is no need for making the industrial and farming conditions of the South at this time more difficult than they are.

VASTLY EXPENSIVE.

The expense is prohibitive, entirely too great for any possible benefit that can be derived from such training. The country is now staggering under the burden of the enormous debt, thirty billions of dollars, incurred in the prosecution of the war and the greatly increased expenses because of it imposed on the Government. The annual expense of administering the Government will reach the amount of four to five and a half billion dollars without this additional burden. Our experience in the war demonstrated that of the 1,000,000 men coming of age yearly about 750,000 are physically fit and would be eligible for training under the provisions of this bill, and if it be estimated that 20 per cent of those eligible would be exempt for one reason or another it would leave 600,000 to be trained annually. The bill provides that they shall be trained for a period of four months and as reservists for another four weeks, and it would require probably a month to mobilize, transport, and release them, taking in all a period of about six months for each man. The average cost per man of the present Military Establishment is about $2,000 a year, and assuming it would cost no more to mobilize, equip, and train a new recruit for the same time than is expended on a regular soldier, which is not really the case, half the amount, or $1,000, may be taken as the cost of training.

This will hardly include the necessary overhead expense and the maintenance of the training camps. The cost of training 600,000 men at $1,000 each for six months amounts to $600,000,000. This estimate may be reduced by deducting the amount of $25 per month for each man, since he receives that amount less while in training than a regular soldier's pay. Deducting the $90 for each man for the term, $54,000,000, we still have $546,000,000, which added to the cost of the Regular Establishment, $503,000,000, will make more than $1,000,000,000 for the Military Establishment.

Mr. President, it will be remembered that the country almost had spasms a short while ago when the expense of administering the entire Government amounted to $1,000,000,000 a year. In addition the value of the time consumed in the training at a soldier's rate of pay of the men eligible, 750,000, would be $135,000,000, an amount equal to what the chairman of the committee says will cover the cost per year of the compulsory training.

The time lost by the 750,000 men in six months in camp at a soldier's rate of pay is worth $135,000,000, as much as the chairman of the committee thinks it will cost to put the entire compulsory system into operation.

I know that the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate claims that the cost of the Regular Establishment will be only $503,000,000 for the year 1921, and that when the training system is in working order it will cost only $135,000,000 per year for the four months' training and $124,000,000 for the National Guard, and in all a total cost of $654,000,000 per year.

It is contemplated, however, in his last estimate that by the end of six years the expense for the Regular Army, because of the reduction of 5 per cent a year for five years, will be only $399,000,000, the permanent personnel of the Army being reduced by then to 210,000 enlisted men and 16,200 officers.

Mr. MONDELL, majority leader in the House, discussing the matter, said:

> I have been very much surprised to hear, from sources that ought to be well informed, the very extraordinary statement that a system of compulsory universal military training can be put in operation by the United States for $125,000,000. The man or the organization that makes such a statement as that is either lamentably ignorant or willfully misstates the fact, and the computation of the cost of such a system is so simple that there is no excuse for a misstatement of the facts. The fact is that a system of universal compulsory military training could not be inaugurated in America and operated for the first year for less than $1,000,000,000 and could not be carried on thereafter for less than $700,000,000 per annum, and these figures are conservative and based upon facts so well known that the least-informed citizen may readily grasp them.

And further:

> Army officers have testified that it would cost at least $300,000,000 to put the camps of the country in condition for a system of universal military training and that it would cost at least $60,000,000 per annum to keep these camps in condition. The items, therefore, of a system of universal compulsory military training, with 25 per cent of the able-bodied men excused, would be for the first year as follows:

Enlargement, improvement, and extension of camps	$300,000,000
Assembling, transportation, equipment, and training of 600,000 men	600,000,000
Maintenance camps, one year	60,000,000
Incidental costs, training, equipment, and matériel	40,000,000
Total	1,000,000,000

> This sum might be reduced after the first year by the $300,000,000 used for enlargement of camps, though the probability is that other unanticipated costs would take it up.

A Member of the House from my State returning from a long absence after this provision had been defeated in the House and the bill passed made a speech stating his opposition to the principle because of the great cost, among other reasons.

Senator MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, in his speech on February 9, stated the total cost for the Army with the universal military training in effect would be more than $1,250,000,000 a year, and submitted estimates and figures in confirmation of it. He said, also, that his estimates had been made after conferring with Army officers who had gone over them carefully and who were familiar with the facts and conditions, and some of whom had testified in the hearings before the committee.

It is easily apparent that the expenses of the Army with the compulsory training system added will reach more than $1,000,000,000 a year. You all remember that the country almost had spasms when the expenses of the entire Government amounted to $1,000,000,000 a few years since. The appropriation for the Military Establishment in 1916 was $101,975,195 and in 1917 $267,396,530, and now with the war over the Regular Establishment, without compulsory military training, requires $593,000,000 a year, as estimated by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and as provided for in this bill. It seems to me if there ever was a time when there might be substantial retrenchment and some little reduction, so far as military expense and protection are concerned, now is the time it should be instituted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand from the figures just given that it is the judgment of the Senator from Arkansas that the universal military training alone will cost in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000?

Mr. KIRBY. No; not my judgment, but the judgment of these two men whom I have named. They say that, with the appropriations for the Regular Army, it will cost us necessarily more than a billion dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. How much more than a billion dollars?

Mr. KIRBY. It depends on some other matters which I am unable to determine. I think it will cost over $600,000,000 to mobilize these men and send them to camp and maintain them and supply them while they are there and return them home.

Mr. POMERENE. Per year?

Mr. KIRBY. Per year. That makes no estimate whatever for and does not take into account the overhead expense for camps, officers, and maintenance of the training camps.

Mr. POMERENE. Then I take it that another matter which we ought to take into consideration is what the Senator from Arkansas referred to just a moment ago, that it takes these young men for this period of time out of the industrial life of the country.

Mr. KIRBY. It takes them for six months out of the industrial life. I will reach that point in a moment.

It should be borne in mind also that the bonds of the Victory and Liberty loans purchased by many people with great sacrifice are selling below par, some issues as much as $10 on the hundred. Certainly under the circumstances this great additional amount of unnecessary expense should not be incurred to support a great Army for which the country has no need.

ECONOMIC LOSS.

This does not begin to reflect the true condition. Let the economic loss be also considered. From the four years' war the world is woefully short of manufactured articles, commodities, and agricultural products, and the greatest shortage is of labor that must produce them all. The cost of living is almost prohibitive, and the profiteers are wallowing in a harvest of gold. Seven and one-half million men died of wounds and were killed in battle in the Great War. Millions more died of disease, and yet other millions are disabled from wounds received. We lost in battle and by disease 112,000 and another 100,000 physically disabled. The national conference on immigration held yesterday in New York stated that the industries of our country need 4,000,000 workers; "that at a time when a shortage of labor, principally primary labor, is curtailing production in practically all basic industries, there is a marked tendency overseas to the discouragement of immigration of able-bodied men, with also a tendency in this country to put up the bars against immigration." It states there is a shortage of 4,000,000 immigrant workmen due to the stopping of immigration during the war, not to mention those who have left this country since the armistice, 275,000 or more, with the probability that another 125,000 will go. That is the condition throughout the world, and in this country so far as man power is concerned and the reduction of it. There is a marked shortage of labor in production and industry in this country, in office, in store, in mill and mine and factory, and especially on the farm.

The farms of the country can not be fully cultivated because of such a shortage of labor, and many of them are lying idle on that account. No more than 5 or 10 per cent of the boys who went from the farms to the war have gone back to the farms. It would be nothing short of criminal to take 750,000 men out of industry and production and off the farms under such conditions.

DANGER OF MILITARISM.

Mr. President, I come to what seems to me the greatest objection to this proposed amendment—the danger of militarism.

The adoption of this policy can not but result in fastening militarism, the greatest curse of the world, upon our own country. Its frightful cost is shown in the wreck and ruin of this last war, in the millions of dead, the woe and anguish of the starved and suffering people in its wake, in Kingdoms and Empires overthrown, dismembered, and destroyed.

Men and nations are slow to learn from the experience of the past, and from their own experience even it seems they will not learn wisdom.

Our own experience even seems to be disregarded. It is true that by the terms of the treaty we have prohibited the use in Germany of a system of compulsory military service. It is true that by the terms of the treaty we have limited the German Regular Army to 100,000 men and 4,000 officers and their schools to as small a number as can supply these officers.

In our own schools, under the arrangements made and under the schemes in prospect now, we can train 20,000 officers annually, and it is proposed that that shall be done.

Militarism flourished and developed to its highest point in Germany under the compulsory service system and the kultur incident thereto, impressing the minds of citizens and soldiers alike that the German soldier was superior to the fighting man of any other nation and the German Army invincible. The German Kaiser, the incarnation of the militaristic spirit, when the time was fully come, started upon a world conquest with his mighty military machine, and the other nations, all in combination and self-defense, after four years of terrible fighting, overcame and destroyed it, but at what a frightful cost in life and treasure. The German Government was overthrown, and the German Kaiser, now in exile, broods in silence over the vast and terrible destruction wrought.

Russia, formerly the greatest Empire of earth, presents the most tragic figure—her Government overthrown, millions of her people killed, the Empire dismembered, and anarchy, revolution, and civil war rampant throughout her former confines.

France, too! Unhappy France! The rivers of France ran red with the best blood of her sons and the brave men of other nations; but she, too, seems not to have learned from experience but to remember, rather, the glory of military achievement in the splendid days of the old Empire, when the greatest military chieftain of all time led her mighty armies in an attempt to subjugate the world. She has forgotten the disastrous result that reduced her to a fourth or fifth rate power and the inglorious end of that great military chieftain of whom more pages of solemn history have been written than of any other man—"on a barren island, in an unfrequented sea, in the mouth of an extinct volcano, as a beggar—so died Napoleon."

It is evident that France has acquired more territory in this war by conquest than she has the ability to develop or the power to defend. What is the condition of the world to-day? Has an inventory been taken of our own condition since this war has been fought and won?

We know that we lost 112,000 men in battle and about 200,000 men who have been wounded, and most of whom are disabled. We know that there is a debt of $30,000,000,000 upon the backs of the people of the United States.

What is the condition across the water? We said we fought this war that the freedom of the seas might be established, and that was the chief reason, and the real reason, we had for going into the war, because our rights on the seas had been invaded, our commerce had been obstructed and destroyed, and the lives of our people destroyed. We were denied the right to the freedom of the seas, to which we unquestionably were entitled under international law. What has been the result? In the conference for the settlement of this war and making peace it was found that we could not have the freedom of the seas guaranteed, and that point had to be abandoned.

It was insisted that the war was fought to destroy militarism, and we have now in free America the spectacle of fastening this system of militarism upon these United States in a time of peace, when there is no power who can challenge our peace and safety, or which can hinder or make us afraid.

What further have we? We have not been able to agree upon a treaty of peace and the League of Nations, which would guarantee the peace of the world in the future, for which we also said the war was fought. We have not agreed to that. What is the condition on the other side of the water? France has invaded Germany with her armies, contrary to the spirit of the treaty of peace and against the provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations.

What have we further? The Poles are 150 miles in Russia fighting, when they should be home, under the provisions of the treaty of peace and the covenant of the league.

What have we further? The Italians are encroaching upon the Jugo-Slavs, and the Serbians are taking and grabbing the territory of Austria-Hungary. Beyond that, we have Greece taking the territory of Turkey, and Turkey murdering the Armenians.

That is the condition in the world to-day. It may be said that if we are to go across the water and take an Army sufficiently large to round up all these people and put them back on their reservations, then we would have great need of this particular system of military training. It may be so. But so far as I am concerned, I do not believe that will ever be done, and at least that reason is not urged for it here now.

The Scriptures say that as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he. It is said that if you send men to a military training camp there will be some benefit on account of the training. They say it increases a man's physical vigor and tends to give him self-reliance; it shows him how to take care of himself under ordinary living conditions; it broadens his views. The great commander of our Army overseas said that it is thoroughly democratic. I do not believe that in this country of ours, which is nearer to a pure democracy than any other which has been developed in the civilization of the world, it is necessary to send a man to a military training camp and make him go whether he wants to or not in order to teach him democracy.

What is a soldier taught at the training camp? He is sent there and taught to obey orders and to learn how to fight. That is the sole purpose for the organization of a training camp, and when you send 750,000 men this year to the training camps and teach them the military régime and discipline and teach them how to fight, and 750,000 men next year, and the next year, and the next year, in 10 years you will have an Army of 7,500,000 men; in 20 years, which would not be beyond the period of activity of those who would start now, you would have an Army of 15,000,000 trained men; and you would have all the men and women of the generation thinking about the military glory and power of these United States.

We would have militarism fastened upon this country as firmly as it has ever been riveted upon any of the nations across the world in the past. It seems to me that it is bound to result, and this is the worst and most dangerous feature of it all.

Now, Mr. President, I have urged these things against the military training feature, and I think the objections are all well taken. I think the country would do well now to give heed to the trend of thought. I know it is the custom, I know it is natural, yes, that all men love power. Men from times remote have worshiped power. The great God of the universe who made us all revealed Himself to us as all-powerful, otherwise man would not have worshiped Him. The army is the very highest expression of a nation's power. The people like to think, and our people have been taught to know, that we are a superior people and ours the greatest and richest Nation on the earth, and, as the Army demonstrated in the last war, the most powerful, and a great many want this typified by a great Army, the greatest that has ever been mobilized in the history of the world. But that brings militarism in the end, and militarism brings final disaster and calamity to any nation where it is cultured and gains a foothold.

Mr. President, in the centennial edition of the Arkansas Gazette there was published the following brief article, which I desire to include at this time as a part of my remarks:

"Senator KIRBY, on November 16, 1916, resigned as judge of the Supreme Court of Arkansas to begin service in the United States Senate, since which time our Nation has fought and won the greatest war of all time. He has been a member of the Military Affairs Committee, the most active committee of the Senate, throughout the duration of the war.

"The Senator, thinking the war could be averted without the loss of dignity or honor to our country, opposed some measures regarded unnecessary, ineffectual, and but preliminary declarations of war. He also favored the old volunteer system and voted against the draft, but when our new policy for raising the Army was determined he actively and effectively supported all war legislation and stood by the War Department continuously in the prosecution of the war; was the only Democrat on the committee familiar with the conditions from the hearings in the investigation of the War Department who favored the Overman bill, giving the President plenary power to reorganize and coordinate the agencies of the War and other departments.

"He spoke twice in support of the measure, while the Democratic chairman, and the ranking member, and the only other Democratic member besides himself who had regularly attended the hearings, opposed it and favored another bill, which would virtually have taken the conduct of the war out of the President's hands.

"He favors withdrawing our troops from Russia at once, and all the remainder of the Army from overseas, except such troops as must be kept there temporarily under the terms of the peace treaty, and regards favorably our soldiers' claim for additional compensation or other substantial relief.

"He hopes to have our soldier dead returned for burial here, that of them it may be said:

"Your own proud land's heroic soil
Shall be your fitter grave;
She claims from war his richest spoil,
The ashes of her brave."

"He actively and effectively supported the appropriation of $16,000,000 for vocational training and rehabilitation for our disabled soldiers and sailors, and also a like bill providing for such training and rehabilitation of men disabled in industry.

"He actively and effectively supported the Mississippi River flood-control project authorizing an expenditure of $45,000,000 for preventing its disastrous overflows, and also the laws authorizing the expenditure of about $300,000,000 for improvement of the public roads.

"He is a member of the Commerce Committee, having jurisdiction of legislation for improvement of rivers and harbors and shipbuilding, as well as of the Committee on the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, and took especial interest in having the barge line on the Mississippi River from Memphis to New Orleans established. Much effort was required to get this done after the law was passed authorizing it.

"He is also a member of the Committee on Patents, of which he was chairman during Democratic control, and of the Committees on Interoceanic Canals and Civil Service and Retrenchment.

"He believes the gambling in cotton futures should be absolutely prohibited, and actively assisted in procuring the adoption of the Smith amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill requiring the delivery of some one of the 10 grades of cotton purchased on contracts made on 'change, instead of permitting the delivery of any one of 21 inferior grades as under the old law, which has had effect with the conditions since developing to increase the price of cotton about $40 a bale.

"He actively supported both the proposed equal suffrage and prohibition amendments to the United States Constitution and the laws necessary to make the latter amendment effective.

"The Senator states:

"'The transportation problem is of supreme importance, and when the railroads are released to private ownership, as now appears will be the case—the Government operated the class 1 roads for the first eight months of this year at a net loss of nearly $275,000,000, a loss of more than $1,000,000 a day—sufficient control should be retained by the Government to guarantee the public reasonable freight and passenger rates and also the payment of reasonable wages to employees engaged in their operation.

"'An American merchant marine should also be established and maintained, and the Government should continue to build ships and to operate all constructed in carrying our coastwise and foreign commerce. No more Government-built ships adapted to such use should be sold or disposed of.

"'A matter of no less vital concern is the utilization of our inland waterways for the transportation of our products and commodities, and the barge line established on the Mississippi River by the Government, now in its experimental stage, must be fostered and the system maintained and extended if the State, the Mississippi Valley, and the South are to progress in accordance with their industry, productive energy, and capacity. Much of the commerce of this great region should not only be diverted to the South Atlantic and Gulf ports, but carried upon our inland waterways.

"'The benefits of the Federal farm-loan act should be extended and the rate of interest reduced as soon as it can be done.

"'Liberal appropriations should be continued for the support of all the activities of the Department of Agriculture.

"'Immigration should be carefully restricted for the next few years.

"'There should also be established a national budget system that will provide an economical and effective method of dealing with the revenues and expenditures of the Government, without which there must continue to be much duplication of effort and appropriations and great waste of public funds.

"'The high cost of living must be reduced. All restrictive war legislation should be repealed, and individual initiative and private enterprise encouraged to their best achievement.'"

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] be read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] offers the following:

Strike out section 51 and all other sections and clauses of the bill providing for compulsory military or naval training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This amendment is drawn in a most unusual way. It provides that section 51 shall be stricken out, together with all other sections and clauses of the bill providing for compulsory military or naval training. I am not at all satisfied with the amendment. It is not specific. It does not specify what clauses do provide for military or naval training. It would really, if adopted by the Senate, amount to an instruction to the Secretary or the clerks at the desk to redraft the bill in their own judgment, according to their interpretation of what the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas means.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment is plain. It strikes out section 51. It proposes to strike out the section that reenacts the old law and all the other clauses and sections which provide for military or naval training. If we take out section 51 we will strike it all out, anyhow, and the Secretary will strike out necessarily all other clauses that relate to the training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is just it—"all other clauses that relate to the training." There are hundreds of clauses in the bill that relate to training, directly or indirectly.

Mr. KIRBY. To compulsory military training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Some of them relate to one kind of military training and some relate to another kind.

Mr. KIRBY. My amendment proposes to strike out only those sections and clauses relating to or providing for compulsory military or naval training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How can the Senate pass upon that question without knowing where those clauses are in the bill?

Mr. KIRBY. It can pass upon it by saying that section 51 shall be stricken out, and then the others go with it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What others?

Mr. KIRBY. All that relate to it necessarily would be left out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To whom is that to be left to determine?

Mr. KIRBY. It would be left to the judgment of the Senate, and when that is determined, of course, it would be omitted by the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It can not be left to the judgment of the Senate. The Senate, under this amendment, is really delegating that judgment to the Secretary or to the clerks at the desk.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not so regard it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know whether an amendment of this sort, under the rule of the Senate, is subject to a point of order. I have never seen anything like it. I suppose if a thing of this sort could be done and the Senate chose to consider it it would be just as competent to offer an amendment to strike out the word "and" in the bill wherever it occurs or wherever it might in the judgment of the Secretary of the Senate occur.

Mr. KIRBY. I will ask that the vote be taken first on striking out section 51 as provided in the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that the Senator from Arkansas offers that as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KIRBY. I offer the whole amendment as a substitute.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand the Senator now changes his amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. No; I do not. I only ask that the vote be taken first with reference to section 51. If section 51 can not be stricken out, the whole amendment is necessarily lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to understand the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Arkansas has offered an amendment as a substitute. The Chair desires to ascertain whether the Senator from Arkansas desires to withdraw that amendment and move as a substitute to strike out section 51?

Mr. KIRBY. I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the Senator from Arkansas desires to divide his proposed substitute and have the vote first taken on striking out section 51.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; to strike out section 51.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, the Senator virtually asks for a division of his proposed amendment, and then if the first part of the amendment is carried, of course, the Senator must of necessity, in order to make it complete, follow it with other amendments.

Mr. KIRBY. I will specify the others then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to speak upon the bill before the Senate, not to explain it in detail, because that has already been done very ably by the distinguished chairman of the committee, who has made such a complete study of the problem of the reorganization of the Army and under whose leadership we have all worked. I intend to speak only of our future policy of national defense. I think I can safely state that the Military Affairs Committee has made a consistent study of the problem of reorganization, and for seven months they have exhaustively investigated the subject.

We have just passed through a great war and have made enormous sacrifices and borne heavy burdens of taxation, but our sacrifices are not extraordinary when compared with the sacrifices in men and money made by our allies.

However, the war has established one important principle—that we are equal to an emergency and capable of overcoming almost insurmountable handicaps. That we paid for it is true, but we did so with a knowledge and patriotism of which only the American people are capable.

The following lessons have been learned:

1. That wars are inevitable; that the greatest protection against war is a proper organization of national defense; and that the history of America shows that after all great wars we have had a reactionary period in which we have been negligent of the important policy of military preparedness. It has shown us that if we are to learn the lessons of the war and do our duty to the American people there must be a complete change of policy and a firm determination to avoid a condition such as existed prior to our entrance into the war.

2. It has shown that the American people are loyal and patriotic to their Government; that there is a strong national spirit, which was evidenced in the patriotism and sacrifices and the wonderful energy with which the people at home supported the armies in the field.

3. It has shown that, notwithstanding the lassitude and inaction that come from a long era of peace, the American citizen soldier can not be surpassed for bravery, courage, and morale. It has shown that the foreign races that have come to our shores have absorbed the spirit of American traditions and can be relied upon for loyalty and allegiance to the country.

4. It has shown that the measures of preparedness which we have to a limited extent carried out by establishing a Regular Army have given us Regular Army officers able to organize and carry out a campaign on an enormous scale, with a battle field 3,000 miles away, and that we not only cashed the dividends for the Plattsburg system and the vocational and educational plans in the colleges and elsewhere, but that the West Point Academy also paid great dividends for the money expended in the past.

5. The war also showed that, properly organized and coordinated, the efficiency of our vast industries and their ability to function have been clearly demonstrated.

Yet with all this in view we were late in accomplishing what should have been accomplished earlier, and it has cost us probably a score of thousand men and billions of dollars in additional taxation to accomplish what would have been accomplished more easily with proper preparation.

We are not a military nation and the American people hate war, and they hate to prepare for war. Nevertheless our military history is a glorious one. On the other hand, our statesmanship, in its relation to war, is a very black chapter in our history. We read it in the great sufferings of Washington's army at Valley Forge. We read it in the Spanish-American War, with the breakdown of the entire Army system, its casualties from disease and improper nourishment. We read it in the President's position in 1914, in a complete refusal to prepare for the inevitable, although all Europe was in conflagration. We also read it in Congress' meager appropriations and absolute refusal to make the necessary preparations and take time by the forelock prior to our declaration of war. What a fool's paradise we have lived in!

Had we had a simple system of universal training five years prior to the war, or had we had a standing Army of two or three hundred thousand men, hardly sufficient to police the border or the insular possessions, or had we anticipated Secretary Garrison's prophetic vision and created the continental army which he recommended in December, 1916, and had we protested against the violation of the neutrality, then I believe Germany would never have crossed the border at Liege, and I believed the loss of 10,000,000 lives and the crippling of 20,000,000 more would have been avoided.

I have said that our sacrifice was not great. We mourn the loss of 70,000 American youths, and it is with great pity that we observe the 200,000 wounded Americans in our midst. But compare this with the English, French, Italian, or Russian losses. We realize what would have happened to us had not England's great fleet protected our civilization and held back the conquering hordes of Germany while we built our factories and raised our armies and rushed to her aid.

Had we even prepared 500,000 men in 1916 that crucial period in 1917, when Germany was almost exhausted, would have ended the war and saved millions of lives. Who is responsible? I say that Congress is! As it happened we declared war entirely unarmed. We gave in to public opinion instead of leading it. We refused to see the inevitable. We submitted under a reactionary policy to numerous insults from Mexico. Where is the man to-day who is not ashamed of our Mexican policy? We submitted to the violation of our rights and allowed Germany to sink our ships. We allowed her to flout us and finally to sink the Lusitania while bound on a peaceful mission, and destroy the lives of over 200 American citizens. And yet the President and Congress took no action to protect them. With our national honor at stake, with civilization almost overcome, we pursued this weak foreign policy and refused to prepare, until the American people took the matter in their own hands, adopted the theory of Roosevelt, Wood, Garrison, and Gardner, and demanded proper preparedness for the protection of our rights and liberties. From Maine to California was heard the tramp of marching American freemen demanding that this country prepare for its own protection and defense. But yet Congress lagged. It had little realization of the war and the danger to America. And the result is told in the immense national debt under which we are staggering, and the lives of over 70,000 of our youth who are lying in the sacred soil of France.

This is the story of our statesmanship, or our lack of it. The war is over. Civilization has been saved, fortunately, but we arrived almost too late.

The question is, Have we learned the lesson? Our great citizen Army is disbanded and the soldiers have returned to their homes. They have done their duty and yet there are some here who have intimated that they should be called upon again should civilization be endangered instead of Congress doing its duty and providing for the coming generations to bear the burden which these soldiers have so gloriously borne during this conflict.

The question which confronted the Military Affairs Committee and which now confronts this Congress is, How shall we properly organize for national defense? What is our duty to this great people, to this 110,000,000 people under our protection?

We have no right to bring this great question into politics or politics into this great question. It is not a question of politics. It is a question of duty. What are our military needs during peace times, and how far should we go to make our Military Establishment ready for war in case of emergency?

To write a bill in the midst of the confusion of the demobilization of an Army of 4,000,000 men, one-half of whom fought on a battle field across 3,000 miles of sea, is a difficult task. The legislative mind becomes confused and fatigued at the great problems with which it is confronted; we lose our sense of proportion and are indifferent to the future needs of the country. The mind moves along the lines of least resistance. It is easy to slip back into the old groove.

The reaction of the war is conducive to forgetfulness of the lessons it should teach us. We find the same reactionary spirit shown that was shown prior to the war, the same speeches are made and by some of the same men who opposed proper preparation before this war overtook us.

I do not want to present this subject to the Senate in a jingo manner. I am very far from a militarist; I want to see peace during my remaining days and for my children after me. That is why I believe that we should look beyond the present campaign and the present sentiment of the country. In enacting this legislation we should have a vision of the future. We are a great country, and it is our supreme duty to use all of the wisdom and judgment we possess to write the military law of the land so that it will protect the welfare and safety of 110,000,000 people. We should not have a military autocracy, and we should not impose for our national defense excessive burdens of taxation on our people.

Yet, we must remember that we have been negligent of our duty in the past, owing to our lack of preparedness. We have many miles along the Mexican border to protect, and owing to the unsettled and unfriendly condition of that country we must consider the safety of those of our citizens who reside in the States along that border. We have insular possessions to police. We have law and order to uphold, and not only that, but the defense of the Nation and our rights on sea and land. So it becomes necessary that we should annually expend a sufficient sum to maintain an establishment that will uphold these principles.

I have heard the sentiment expressed on this floor that we have 4,000,000 men on the reserve list who are veterans that we can rely on in the event of another war. That is true, should a war come within five or six years. These men have had enough of war. They have returned to their homes and their families. We had an unmarried Army. Thousands of these boys are now married and are breadwinners for their families, and wish to lead a life of domestic happiness.

Conditions are not composed, and there are still wars and rumors of wars. We have become somewhat estranged from the nations which were our allies and friends; deep-seated prejudices prevail on the part of other nations who have come out of this struggle stronger and greater than ever before. Mexico does not respect us, and sooner or later we must show her that she can not wantonly murder our citizens and disregard our property rights within her borders. It is just as essential as that we provide for the financial needs of the country that we should maintain a system of national defense, and only by having a proper organization can we assure the people of the country whom we represent that we are properly providing for the protection of their rights and liberties. We must also show the world that we can not be imposed upon.

Many of us have hoped that this would be the last great war. But the best assurance we can have of making it the last great war is to keep our military household in order, so that other nations will not insult or attack us. This question is not a political one. It is a question of public policy. It is a duty which is imposed upon us as representatives of the people. The questions that we must determine are: What future preparation shall we make, and how large shall our Army establishment be under the conditions that exist in the world at the present time?

I do not intend to go into the details of this bill. For seven months the Military Affairs Committee has diligently addressed itself to the solution of these problems under the leadership of the distinguished chairman [Mr. WADSWORTH], a student of military law of long experience, who has given his constant attention to the preparation of this bill. In its preparation he has been generously assisted by the former chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who served in that capacity during the war and who has contributed from his storehouse of experience. Other members of the committee have assisted, with but one thought in view—that is, the good of the country and the establishment of a measure that will not only meet the need of the present hour but will provide for an organization under which, should the emergency of war again arise, the crisis will be met with the minimum of sacrifice, a minimum of expense, of profiteering, and of red tape, the curse of which so handicapped us during this war.

We have tried to capitalize the experience of the war. What we have learned in this conflict, we have tried to utilize in a practical way. Reforms in organization have been accomplished which would never have been possible had we not been faced with this cataclysm and had we not successfully surmounted it. The generals of the Regular Army, the minor officials, as well as the men in all branches of the service who have served both here and abroad, have given the benefit of their advice and opinion in the testimony which we have taken. The National Guard officers and organizations, having the interests of this great branch of our defense system at heart, have willingly collaborated in advising us as to how the National Guard should be coupled up with our Federal system. The citizen soldiers who volunteered and those who were in the selective service have given us their viewpoint. The American Legion, that organization of men formed out of the service in this war, have also presented to us resolutions adopted at a regularly organized convention, in which were debated the questions of future organization of the Army. The medical, scientific, financial, and procurement branches of the Army have all been consulted. The industrial interests have contributed their thought and suggestions to the measure.

The composite result of this thoughtful conclave is now presented in the bill before the Senate. The Secretary of War has stated that it is a statesmanlike bill. While the Chief of Staff believes in the organization as presented in the staff bill as introduced, he has admitted that this bill will work. I feel I can safely state that all have combined to do something constructive to meet the needs of the country. This has been the object we have labored to attain in this measure.

I now come to one of the great reforms of the bill, embodied in provisions which probably will create more debate than any other portion of the measure. I refer to the provision for a uniform and universal system of military training. I shall not attempt to detail this provision. Briefly, it provides that all males at the age of 18 shall be required to take a period of training for four months and to be mobilized twice thereafter for five years, for a period of two weeks each, with the organization in which they were formerly trained.

This practically provides for the compulsory military training of 600,000 boys at the age of 18 at a cost approximately, as I understand, of $168,000,000. The committee has recognized that a more democratic and simpler method of preparation must be provided; that the country will not support a great military system and a large standing Army. Our Regular Establishment must be limited to the immediate needs of the country, and that establishment must do justice to the great mass of citizen soldiers represented in the National Guard and in the citizen army, who must be coordinated and have a voice and influence in the governing body of the Army, known as the General Staff.

This, in my opinion, has been done by bringing together all of these elements under the General Staff system, making it as democratic as it can be made and avoiding even the semblance of a military autocracy.

In the recognition of the fact that outside of our Regular Establishment we should make further preparation for any emergency which may arise, the bill provides for a system of universal military training. I am aware that there is bitter opposition to this policy. There are some as bitterly opposed to it as they were to the selective draft, which proved such an unmeasured success, which enabled us finally to assist in accomplishing the defeat of the German Army, and without which civilization must have been overwhelmed in its struggle for self-preservation.

I am aware also of the war weariness of the American people and the approaching election, which greatly imperil the chance of adopting a policy of this character. But I believe it to be one of the most necessary policies which this country can and should adopt at this time. I believe that it is a policy which will solve the greatest of the problems we have inherited from the war and give us an establishment which for strength and efficiency means a great step forward in proper national defense.

As one of the members of the subcommittee which drafted the bill, I wish to say that, notwithstanding the claim of the opponents of this provision, it is not compulsory service in a strict sense. A man can not be taken away from training and placed in the Regular Army in peace times. If this is done, they must serve in the citizen branches. But should Congress declare war, I admit that they can be retained for service. So would other boys between the ages of 19 and 21 be retained by the imposition of the selective-service act, but the universal-service man who had been drafted at the age of 18 would have had the advantage of these boys, because they would have to go to camp for four months in the midst of a war to take that period of training.

I do not propose to present at any great length my own individual views regarding the merits of military training.

But I do propose, as briefly as possible, to present certain views from totally different angles and viewpoints, uttered by military men, statesmen, and others, regarding the merits of the system and its imperative necessity, as the only certain method of insuring our national entity and existence.

I shall present certain views before our entrance into the late Great War and certain others growing out of the experiences of that war. They will show the advantage of the system in its relation to the physical well-being of our young men, in its relation to their enlarged mental equipment, and in its relation to our national defense and protection.

I now assemble these witnesses.

From the physical point of view I quote from an article in the New York Medical Journal by Dr. Charles O. Linder, of Spokane, Wash., December 14, 1918:

> The statement has been made that an average of 81 per cent of the men in the draft have been found to be physically defective. The record for the five years before the war shows that the rejected applications for enlistments averaged 81 per cent plus, which was higher than those in the draft. Most of these defects could and probably would have been corrected in early infancy had they been discovered.
>
> It is universally conceded that physical education and training, especially as a preventive against the high percentage of defectives, should begin in early school days. Attention should be given to habits, hygiene, teeth, ears, eyes, nose, throat, feet, etc. Modern school boards are doing much to correct many defects pertaining to the throats and eyes of school children, but in earlier days such matters were considered absolutely no business of the school authorities.
>
> The digest of the Provost Marshal General's report early this year—

That was in December, 1918—

> gives the rejection rate, for physical reasons, as 29.11 per cent of all those examined in all local boards. In addition to this it must be remembered that an average of 5.8 per cent will be further rejected before the troops are inducted into active service. These figures are compiled as a result of the examination of men of the most favorable age group, from 21 to 31 years.
>
> The Provost Marshal General's report is as follows:

Total number called		3,082,996
Men examined by local boards		2,510,706
Number of men rejected by local boards for physical reasons		730,756
Percentage rejected of those examined	29.11
Add 5.8 per cent as further rejection (estimated at cantonments)	5.8
Total per cent		34.91

> The intense interest in the findings of the draft examinations can be utilized to arouse the people to their need of physical development. There can be no doubt, with the figures facing us, of the need of child hygiene, of the tremendous importance of universal physical training, and of standardized periodical physical examination. Entirely apart from the actual reclamation of registrants, an immense stimulus can be given to the popular movement for physical reform and for higher ideals of health and hygiene.
> Under proper military training where discipline is supreme, proper habits of cleanliness are formed. Training in accuracy and in precision of thought and action, regular hours and regular meals, regular 9 o'clock retiring and early rising, learning to obey and to devote spare time to self-improvement in various ways, will have its effect upon the men thus trained and enable them to carry on their vocations more efficiently when this war is over.
> By proper modern military training the soldier boy, instead of being a weakling, becomes a strong and healthy man. Every day drilling develops the muscles, builds up and strengthens the body. He learns to do his duties during each and every day. The instruction in health habits will have a lasting effect and make him as nearly as possible immune to sickness.
>
> The results of military training, discipline, and instruction in health habits are clearly shown in a report from one of the training camps in the Middle West which did not have one death among its 50,000 men for one week—in August of this year—a very different and gratifying record from that which terrified the American people during the Spanish-American War 20 years ago, when the death rate at concentration camps was 25 out of every 1,000 soldiers. Even at the time of America's entrance into the present conflict the death rate at the concentration camps was rather on the increase, but marked improvement in health conditions have taken place within the last few months. The Nation has found a scientific, dependable way to gather its young manhood in concentration camps, cure their minor ailments, build up their physical strength and constitutional vigor, discipline and train them for better service in civilian pursuits, and in various other ways make them efficent, patriotic, and intelligent citizens. We have done this fine work under the whip and spur of a terrific war, but the benefits thus conferred upon the country's youth are no less valuable in time of peace than in stress of war. The lessons which have been taught to boys to avoid preventable diseases and their being brought to a state of physical well-being as a result of military training, will result in lasting benefit to the community, whether the boys are in or out of the Army.
> When the public has been convinced of what modern military training can accomplish with our youth, the question of universal physical training will have taken a long step forward.
>
> I believe that it is the almost universal testimony of men who have excelled in any branch of life in this country, that one of the most difficult lessons which the young American boy must learn before he can properly progress in any line of activity is discipline. Accidents on the railroad, in the factory, in the operating rooms, failure in positions of trust, whatever they may be, are in great part due to lack of schooling in simple obedience and in the spirit of true discipline. A thorough basing in this rudimental virtue is what we ask of ourselves and what many of us gain only by costly and sad experience. Discipline never truly subordinates the mind that has opinions of its own, nor does it humiliate or debase the body; but proper subordination and obedience inculcate pride and honor and prepare for authority and command. Promptness and dispatch are other military qualities of inestimable value to young men. Do we not daily see the need of such training at the bedside, in the clinic, on the street, everywhere?
>
> In summing up what has thus far been presented on this subject, it would seem that national service or universal physical training is the only agency by which the measures mentioned could be effectively carried out; there is no other schooling, to the knowledge of the writer, which will develop the physique and at the same time teach young men order and method, and obedience to authority. It is true that in a number of schools and colleges a certain semblance of military training is already provided; but as yet, except in a few excellent private military schools, this part of the course is superficial and inadequate; and not much has thus far been achieved in regard to discipline and obedience to authority.
> The advantages to the country from universal physical training would be: First, that it would be saved from panic in time of war and from the enormous waste of money that unpreparedness for war entails; second, that the present waste from death and from invaliding caused by low physical standard would cease; third, that with improved health and with higher moral tone the efficiency of the American boy would be increased. He would be imbued with habits of order and self-restraint and would be of inestimable value to the community and Nation.
> Whether the physical training of our youth is conducted in special branches of our universities and colleges or in special military schools, the same should be under strict supervision of the Federal Government in order to produce uniform and proper training and so that a proper discipline and course of instruction may be enforced.

Then I quote from the testimony of Prof. John Erskine, of Columbia University, found on page 1671 of the hearings before the Senate Military Affairs Committee on the reorganization of the Army. Prof. Erskine said:

> The mobilization of the American Army demonstrated that an astounding number of native-born citizens are illiterate, and that of our foreign-born citizens a still larger number can not read or write the English language, and in some cases can not understand. The mobilization demonstrated also that an appalling number of our young men are not in proper physical condition. It is unlikely that any economic or social pressure will tend to remedy these evils. The illiterate citizen can make a living of a sort more or less satisfactory to himself, and the foreign born can associate with others of his origin, and both classes can avoid that social criticism which would urge them toward complete citizenship. In fact, economic and social pressure tends actually to segregate in our country the illiterate element and the various groups of foreign born, and unless some strenuous effort is made to weld all these groups into one there is no likelihood of change in these unfortunate conditions.

The program of education in the American Expeditionary Forces has demonstrated, on the other hand, that even brief courses of study, followed intensively under military discipline, are adequate to correct illiteracy and to teach our language. The whole experience of our Army demonstrates further that if brought together in a common purpose the various elements of our population can be speedily made into one nation. We should now find a means to provide these benefits for our country in times of peace.

Before we went into the war Col. Theodore Roosevelt, in a letter read at the National Security Congress, Washington, January 20, 1916, said:

A democracy should do its own fighting. I believe in universal service on the Swiss and Australian models, adapted to our own needs; that is, to military training in the schools after the age of 16, and, too, for a six months' service with the colors in the field for every man some time between the ages of 18 and 21.

With a small Regular Army of a quarter of a million men—a force which relatively to the Nation bears the same proportion that the police force of New York City bears to the population of New York City—we would be given the time to develop from our citizens, if they had universal military training, an efficient Army adequate to our needs.

Military service should no more be optional in a democracy than should the payment of taxes. One should be accepted as an obligation just as much as the other. * * *

Military training should be required as a matter of right and not as a matter of favor of all our citizens. In a free democracy the nation has a right to the services of its citizens both in war and in peace.

Henry L. Stimson, formerly Secretary of War, addressing the National Security Congress, Washington, January 22, 1916, said:

Four years ago, when it became my official duty to study this question, I hardly dared dream that the time would ever come within my lifetime when the American people would seriously consider the institution in this country of any system of universal military training. The searching test of the European war has, however, put its finger squarely upon this weak spot of our American democracy.

In our national development thus far we have focused our attention upon the rights, the privileges, and the benefits which we have expected to get from free government, and we have paid scant attention to the duties or the obligations or the sacrifices which were correlative to them.

But now for the first time we are beginning to realize how far we have fallen behind other nations in this respect. For the first time there has been made clear to us the superior strength and patriotism which have been developed in nations which hitherto we have been inclined to regard with little admiration or even respect. For the first time we have had revealed to us in blinding light the fact that men of other nations for years have been willing to give toward the building up of the efficiency of their nation a measure of time and personal effort which we have have been unwilling to give.

We are beginning to realize the true meaning of the proposition that manhood suffrage postulates manhood services, and that the man who has a right to participate in the making of his own government is bound by the highest obligation of honor to share in the burden of defending it. And so to-day we find an increasing number of our people who believe, as I believe, that this problem of national defense will never be permanently solved until it is distributed among the whole people by some system of universal liability to military training.

I now read from a statement made in a letter of Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, read before the National Security Congress, Washington, January 20, 1916. Mr. Gompers said:

In addition to those who enter the Regular Army and Navy as a profession there must be reserves that can be called into the service of the country quickly to meet an emergency. It is necessary, therefore, that there should be opportunities afforded to the masses of the citizens for military training. However, all military training must be safeguarded to protect democratic ideals and civic institutions.

Not only must there be equal opportunity for all citizens to enter military training organizations and camps, but that opportunity must be attended by such provisions as to make it an equal opportunity for both the poor and the rich. A fair compensation for military training camps must be paid as a substitute for wages lost. In these citizens' organizations for military training there must be no recognition of distinctions, professions, or for any advantage or position that may be held by any citizen or group of citizens.

Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, on December 18, 1916, said, on page 620 of the hearings before the Committee on Military Affairs of the United States Senate on the reorganization of the Army:

We should prepare and hold in reserve the necessary equipment and supplies for a force of approximately 4,000,000 men. That is essentially the recommendation I made at one of the last hearings I had here before the war, as I remember it.

This is an extract from a statement made by Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, and I wish to point out to the Senate how prophetic the statement of Gen. Wood was:

In conclusion, I wish to emphasize the necessity of prompt preparation of an adequate force of trained men with the necessary arms, equipment, and supplies for 4,000,000 men. In my opinion, there is nothing of more vital importance than that we should take measures to this end and take them immediately. We are absolutely unprepared in artillery guns and ammunition for war and will continue to be so for many years under present rate of progress.

In speaking of officers the following occurred:

Senator FLETCHER. Does that include officers, General?

Gen. WOOD. Yes; but not the reserve officers. It includes the officers of the Regular Army. It does not seem to me that a larger force is necessary now that we have pending the possibility of a universal training system. We have in our population some four and one-half millions of men who have received fairly good training, some of them very excellent training, and approximately 200,000 officers from which we can commence the building up of such reserve organizations as we may require, pending putting into operation the system which Senator CHAMBERLAIN has recommended.

Gen. Wood made this further statement, as found on page 630:

I do not think the first line of the reserve need include the men of more than the last four years. Probably not over half of our youth will be found fit for line military service, so that we should not train more than 600,000 men a year for purely military service. This should give us between 2,500,000 and 3,000,000 men in the first-line group, and none of them would be more than three years away from his intensive training period of six months.

Officers and noncommissioned officers in the meantime would have received additional courses of instruction. If we attain this condition of efficiency, we shall be as secure as any nation can be in peace and we shall be a positive influence for peace.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You would not fear the militarizing of the country or the thought of the country in undertaking to train young men as you have suggested?

Gen. WOOD. Mr. Senator, if you have any fear of that ask the boys who have been over to Europe if they want to go back again or if they like war—you will find that they are against war unless it is unavoidable.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I have no fears, but you know that that fear has been pretty generally expressed.

Gen. WOOD. That has been completely answered by the attitude of the men who have been coming home.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. And want to get back into civil life?

Gen. WOOD. Absolutely. They are exactly like a football team after a hard season; that is, when the last big game has been won and they have thrown off their togs, they do not want anybody to talk football to them until next year.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You have not seen any disposition on the part of these returning men to create a row somewhere else in order to fight?

Gen. WOOD. They have come back better men physically, better citizens, more law-abiding, and in every way better and more valuable men.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. With a broader vision.

Gen. WOOD. Yes; with a much broader vision, with a wider knowledge of the world, and with a better understanding of what our country stands for. I have not seen a man who is not glad that he is back home. The attitude of these men has been a wonderful revelation to the public, and your statement to the effect that military training does not tend to militarism or to a love for war stands unchallenged in every community of America. This attitude of the men will be of the greatest possible value in the establishing of a training policy, because the men and women of America see their men coming back in every way better men than they went, hating war, but willing to do their duty even through war in case of need.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If necessary.

Gen. WOOD. If necessary, just as we are willing to make any sacrifice for the country which may be necessary. It has been a splendid thing in that way, and it has killed absolutely the foolish twaddle of the pacifist and the faker to the effect that any kind of military training would tend to build up a military spirit and class.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You participated somewhat in the hearings for universal military training about three years ago, and you remember the argument of the people then was that it would Prussianize America?

Gen. WOOD. It has democratized America as nothing that we have ever attempted has done.

The first statement I read made by Gen. Wood before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate months before we entered the war was strikingly prophetic in its character. The figures fixed by Gen. Wood in December, 1916, were almost the exact maximum limit of our Army when the armistice was signed two years later.

After we had passed through our strenuous war experiences, before the Joint Military Affairs Committee other witnesses were called, and I shall read from the testimony of the man who led our Expeditionary Forces on the other side, and who accomplished such marvels in the short time with the men who went over there, many of whom had been in factories, workshops, and stores, men who had had only a limited training. Gen. Pershing took that army, and you all know the record, and I think that the testimony of Gen. Pershing illuminates, better than any of the other testimony, the needs of the country for future defense. I think it is the best and the clearest statement that has been made. At least we must credit him with being a military authority. Gen. Pershing said:

The obligation of deciding upon a definite policy of national defense and of working out the details of a system is a matter of national interest. We have just emerged from the greatest war in history, whose successful conclusion was due to the tremendous effort of our people. Their very clear attitude and pronounced determination to provide men and money to the extent of their resources have placed our country in a new light before the world. Our position and influence in world affairs are no longer measured by our wealth and population, nor yet by our free and liberal form of government, but by our purpose to maintain the high principles of justice and humanity upon which our institutions are founded. This influence bears a direct relation to the solidity of our Government and our readiness adequately to defend our rights.

Our success in the war was not due to our forethought in preparedness, but to exceptional circumstances which made it possible to prepare after we had declared war. It is my belief that if America had been adequately prepared, our rights would never have been violated; our institutions would never have been threatened.

* * * * * * *

In addition to the preparation of our young manhood for service in defense of their country in time of war, military training would bring them many other important benefits which our Government should hasten to provide. Such training would develop the physical vigor and manliness of our youth and sharpen their mentality. It would teach self-discipline and respect for constituted authority. Experience shows conclusively that it encourages initiative and gives young men confidence in themselves. Through the preparation for service to the country it increases their patriotism. It broadens their views through association with men of all classes and is thoroughly democratic. It prepares young men for the duties of citizenship. Such training is especially needed among our alien population, a large percentage of whom are illiterate. If these men were taught our language and were made familiar with the spirit of our institutions, we should have less lawlessness and fewer I. W. W's.

I now want to read certain resolutions presented to the committee by the American Legion. These resolutions were adopted at a convention which was held last year. A committee of seven were appointed by the executive committee to consult and advise with the military and naval committees of both Houses of Congress as to working out the details of the organization and training of the future Army and Navy of the United States, using as its basis the resolutions accepted and adopted by this convention. I read:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT THE MINNEAPOLIS CONVENTION OF THE AMERICAN LEGION ON THE FUTURE MILITARY POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES.

1. That a large standing Army is uneconomic and un-American; national safety with freedom from militarism is best assured by a national citizen army and navy based on the democratic and American principles of the equality of obligation and opportunity for all.

2. We favor a policy of universal military training, and that the administration of such policy shall be removed from the complete control of any exclusively military organization or caste.

3. We are strongly opposed to compulsory military service in time of peace.

4. We have had a bitter experience in the cost of unpreparedness for national defense and the lack of proper training on the part of officers and men, and we realize the necessity of an immediate revision of our military and naval system and a thorough house cleaning of the inefficient officers and methods of our entire Military Establishment.

We favor a national military and naval system based on universal military obligation, to include a relatively small Regular Army and Navy and a citizen army and navy capable of rapid expansion sufficient to meet any national emergency, on a plan which will provide competitive and progressive training for all officers, both of the Regular Army and Navy and of the citizen forces.

We believe that such military system should be subject to civil authority. Any legislation tending toward an enlarged and stronger military and naval caste we unqualifiedly condemn.

5. The national citizen army, which should and must be the chief reliance of this country in time of war, should be officered by men from its own ranks and administered by a general staff on which citizen-soldier officers and Regular Army officers shall serve in equal number.

We recommend that military training in high schools and colleges be encouraged.

6. We favor the continuance of training camps for the training and education of officers to serve in case of national requirement.

The Commercial Club of Chicago assembled a group of officers, who debated the question of the lessons of the war as to universal military training. I shall not read all of them, although I would recommend that some of the Senators on this floor procure a copy and read the statements of the officers who spoke at that meeting. I read from the statement of Col. Henry J. Reilly, colonel of the One hundred and forty-ninth Field Artillery, as follows:

I do think the thing we need to teach in this country is the fact that a citizen of the United States of America enjoys a great many things which he has no right to per se; he enjoys a great many things for which other people have laid down and risked their lives in past generations. Every young man in this country should be taught if he will not risk his life for those things, then he has no right to enjoy them.

From time to time I run across pacifist arguments. I have for a number of years. I am willing to give every pacifist the credit of honest intention, of really being humane, and of really wanting something better on this earth—and that is more credit than he or she has ever given to any opponent.

There is only one question I would like to ask them. They are generally not practical. Leave aside everything that is practical, come down to nothing but the humanitarian point of view, and ask the pacifist man or woman, "Are you willing to give your son, or your husband, or your relatives, or the young men of this country, whom you profess so much interest in when it comes to taking a drink—are you willing to give them a fair chance when it comes to going on a battle field, or are you not? Are you going to give these men a chance to go out properly armed, properly equipped, under officers who have had the opportunity of learning how to lead them?"

* * * * * * *

What I would like to do would be to take every man and woman in this country, particularly the pacifists—I would like to walk them from Chandron Farm to Sommerance in the Argonne as it was the first week of November and let them see the American dead of the Thirty-fifth Division, the First Division, and the Forty-second Division littered over that ground.

* * * * * * *

I do not believe in turning over the things that are past. There is no use saying you might have done this or that or something else, or that that man was to blame or that this man was to blame. The only things of the past I am interested in are the lessons we can take from it to help us in the future. I do not believe any reasonable human being could say for one moment, particularly if he has read any paper—I don't care whether it is the Tribune or some other one—that the day of universal peace has dawned on this earth. It has not. We will fight again or we will give up the things we believe in.

Now, just ask the pacifist, and, above all, the woman pacifist, who, full of the finest emotion, is carried away by it and therefore can not be reasoned with, just ask her to go and stand on the battle fields of Chandron Farm and Sommerance, where I saw more dead as did Tom Hammond there and as did many hundreds of others, just have her stand there and see how many dead Americans lying there could have been saved, how much greater a military victory we could have had had we had prior to the war universal military service and thereby given every American before he went on the battle field the training which would have given him the chance he was entitled to in the face of a real foe.

I read from a statement of Col. Abel Davis, of the One hundred and thirty-second Infantry, as follows:

I believe in military training. I believe that it should be universal in the sense that in times of peace to the extent that the least possible interference may be had with our ordinary peaceful pursuits every young man who fails to equip himself for military service, either in the Regular Army, National Guard, or educational institutions, should be subject to call for military service and preperation. I am not for universal training in the sense that every young man at a certain age, let us say 19 or 20, should be taken away from his educational or industrial work and compelled to be a member of an army for a year or longer. It is an expensive method and quite unnecessary.

I propose that our Federal Government, preferably through action of Congress, determine yearly the number of young men required for training, the number to depend on the strength of the Army, the National Guard, enrollments in educational institutions, and upon international relations as they may tend toward war. When the number is ascertained each congressional district will receive its quota and the young men selected by lot. A system of registration will be necessary as part of the plan.

In my judgment six months of training is all that will be required. It has taken more time heretofore to give a soldier the fundamental training. It was due in a great measure to the enormous waste of time in starting the training machinery going. There was no plan, no system of training, no organized staff of instructors.

With the staff organized, with the plan well prepared in advance, and by improving and utilizing the training centers and camps now in control of the Government, enough work could be crowded into six months to give a young man the fundamental training required. His military education would be continued by the system of reserve of which I shall speak later.

* * * * * * *

The war is over. We hoped this war would end war; we hope so still; but are we thoroughly convinced? And do any of us think that America can afford to find herself again in the position she occupied when war was declared in 1917?

We like to believe that on a matter of national principle or national honor we will fight. Is it not true that in the provisions of the League of Nations there are clauses which, if the league is adopted, may result some day in our finding ourselves actually at variance with the league? And, finally, what is our value as a member of the league if we are in no position to back our views with force?

Gentlemen, there is more than a bare chance that war may come upon us again. If it does, without general training of our young men and without a reserve organization which permits us to develop and systematize our fighting units at once we shall be in the position of the householder who, threatened by burglars, buys a revolver, oils it, loads it, learns to shoot with it, drives off the intruder who ultimately confronts him, and then throws it under the house to rust and rest undiscoverable.

I now quote from a very eminent authority, Secretary Baker, This was published in the Washington Post of February 6, 1920:

"After all is said and done," declared Secretary Baker, "the mind depends upon physical power. There must be power to execute the high ideals of right-thinking men and women."

* * * * * * * *

"The fear of our becoming a military nation exists no longer," asserted Secretary Baker.

"That idea was dissipated by the war. Now we find ourselves convinced that this country does not desire a military policy, strictly speaking, but a policy of defense that will always enable us to render the greatest resistance to oppression with the least sacrifice.

"Universal training has a large value aside from its military features. It is an education in itself, and we have ceased to regard the Army as an alien institution. Our own sons in future will understand its attitude better and appreciate its qualities under a system of universal military training."

I now read from an editorial in the North American, of Philadelphia, in reference to universal military service:

In July, 1918, it was announced that President Wilson had completely changed his views, and that he favored the principle of obligatory training.

* * * * * * * *

Eventually, it seems, the views held unanimously by military experts and sustained by the country's costly experiences in the war prevailed over the prejudices and hesitancy of the administration, for President Wilson wrote last week: "I have given my approval in principle to the various very moderate training projects suggested by the General Staff." Thus he has given belated acceptance to the doctrine which Theodore Roosevelt, voicing the very essence of democracy and Americanism, declared so persistently during the last years of his life:

"The fundamental national duty is the duty of self-defense, just as the fundamental political right is the suffrage. A cardinal feature of the permanent policy of this liberty-loving, democratic Republic should be the principle of universal obligatory military training and military service for all our young men."

High praise is due to President Wilson for having taken his stand at last for a system which is the first requisite for national safety—a rational, equitable scheme of defensive preparation. Universal military training does not imply or require universal military service in time of peace—that would be applied only in a great national emergency. The system of training would simply guarantee that if the call ever came the Republic would be ready to defend itself.

Finally I quote the President's letter published in the Washington Star of February 9, 1920. This is the last witness I shall summon to the stand before closing:

In the present circumstances it would seem to me unfortunate to make a party issue upon this subject, particularly since within a few months the party will assemble in convention and declare the principles upon which it deems it wise to commit itself in a national election. The present disturbed state of the world does not permit such sureness with regard to America's obligations as to allow us lightly to decide upon this great question upon purely military grounds while the demonstrated advantage to the youth of the country which came from military service in the war plainly suggests that in the national interest, quite apart from military considerations, the moderate and carefully conducted course of military training may have the highest possible advantages. In our discussion of the subject, you will recall, I gave my approval in principle to the various very moderate training projects suggested by the General Staff, and I would be very glad to have you convey to appropriate Members of the House who will attend the caucus my strong feeling against action by the caucus which will tend to interpose an arbitrary party determination to the consideration which this subject should receive from the best thought of the Members of the House, considering alike the national emergencies which may confront us and the great disciplinary and other advantages which such a system plainly promises for the young men of the country.

Mr. President, I voted in the committee to support the present military training feature of this bill and shall do so on the floor if it comes to a vote. Some Senators feel, however, that the sentiment of the country is against it. That may be so. The opposition probably comes from war reaction, war weariness, and the fear that the compulsory feature would be repugnant to the people of the country, and that what they stood in war they will not stand in peace.

I feel that we are not quite alive to the beneficial advantages of the system. If it is to be defeated here in the House, as seems possible, would it not be well to recognize the existing opposition to the compulsory feature and establish the principle of the system in another manner?

I therefore propose the following plan, which can be accomplished by a simple amendment to the present provision: That we provide for the training by the United States Government, under the military organization, of all youths of 18 years who volunteer for the training period prescribed in the bill. It might be well to fix at the outside a maximum limit to be trained of 200,000 boys, or any portion of that number who may volunteer under the plan of training prescribed in the bill; to provide that the quota of each State shall be determined as the proportion of the population of each State at the last census bears to the entire population of the United States; and that the allotment of each State shall be made through the proper machinery and channels to be established by the Army organization.

I feel that some proper measure should be provided for the expansion in time of war of the military forces, and that this should be accomplished by having the young citizenry of the country, who owe an obligation to the National Government, trained in this manner. I feel that some system acceptable to the American people should be tried. I am deeply interested in the experiment of such training on the morale and physical health of the future citizens of America. I believe that such a trial will show such great benefits that the youth in the future, arriving at the age of 18, as well as their parents, will eagerly welcome the opportunity to have the educational, disciplinary, and physical advantages of such a training. I believe that the benefits to the health and also to the mental and physical growth of the boys will be such that all parents with any spark of filial pride or patriotism will look forward in the future to having their sons perform this voluntary obligation to their country, and will respond gladly to such a voluntary system and will popularly support it.

I make this suggestion at this time in order that we may have the opportunity of considering its advisability. This bill has been written by the members of the Military Affairs Committee, who sat during the entire period of the war and handled all the military legislation necessary to prosecute it. Members of this committee assisted in our preparedness plans. They fought to cut the red tape. They observed the progress of America in the war. During that time they have had but one thought in mind—the service of their country and the successful conclusion of the conflict. The bill has been written with a realization of the errors we have made in the past ever in mind and a firm determination that the mistakes of the past shall not, if the committee can prevent it, be the mistakes of the future; that the people of this country shall have a military policy democratic and simple, but effective enough to protect us against the attack of any nation on the face of the earth; a Military Establishment which will defend our honor and integrity, uphold law and order and the institutions of America, and insure peace and contentment to all the people of the land.

It has been written in the memory of the heroic sacrifices made by the men who served and forgot the neglect of the past, in the memory of the fathers and mothers who gave their sons in the struggle. It has been written in the memory of those heroic American freemen who now lie under the white crosses on the battle fields of France. It is written so that future generations may know that the men in this Congress have not forgotten the great lessons of the war, nor the great service rendered by its citizens in the face of almost insurmountable obstacles which might have been avoided had we had a proper vision of the future. It has been written in the memory of the fact that it is our duty to civilization to preserve inviolable the principle of government for which the fathers fought, the danger of the overthrow of which, by our lack of vision, was almost accomplished by German autocracy and militarism in 1917 and 1918.

I will not answer the absurd criticism of universal military training that it is undemocratic. I shall content myself with quoting the brief, pungent, and preeminently logical comment of that sublime American, Theodore Roosevelt:

Military service should no more be optional in a democracy than should the payment of taxes. One should be accepted as an obligation just as much as the other. * * *

Military training should be required as a matter of right, and not as a matter of favor of all our citizens. In a free democracy the nation has a right to the services of its citizens both in war and in peace.

Whatever may have been the criticism of compulsory military training, there can be no logical criticism of voluntary military training, except upon the ground of the expense involved.

It happens, Mr. President, that I have made something of a study of the Nation's finances. I am aware of the necessity for economy. Our appropriations for next year may reach $6,000,000,000. There is no need to preach economy to me. I recognize the necessity for practicing it. But, let me ask, why do we have this deficit facing us? Why are we called upon to appropriate $6,000,000,000 this year? Why have we a bonded indebtedness of $25,000,000,000?

I will answer if we had prepared for war in time of peace instead of in time of war our expenditures would not have been one-half what they were. Because of our unpreparedness, because every move we made in war time to recruit and equip our Army, it cost us $2 where one would have sufficed in time of peace.

In other words, Mr. President, the chaotic, embarrassing condition of our finances must be placed upon the shoulders and upon the consciences of those statesmen who were either pacifists or moral cowards, who proclaimed that we should never be compelled to wage war again, and who made no provision for the inevitable in the program of human existence.

I do not care to listen to the economy pleas of such statesmen. If they force us to return to our former prewar status of inefficiency and unreadiness, then they will at a no distant day doom us to billions more of unnecessary expenditures and to the tortures of increased taxation and unlimited bond issues. After that will come the deluge and anarchy.

Too long this Nation has been penny-wise and pound-foolish. Economize we must and economize we will, but we must neither preach nor practice that false economy which spells disaster, shipwreck, bankruptcy, and dissolution for this Republic and of human society generally.

If we have learned nothing from the tragedy of this great war, then sad indeed is and will be the fate of America. If we shall be permitted to return to our former prewar condition of unpreparedness, then certainly we have not made the United States, much less the world, safe for democracy. If we have not profited and shall not profit by our calamitous experience of the last three years, then the dead will have died in vain, and hundreds of thousands of other dead must follow in the shadow of the departed.

Senators, let it not be said that in this great crisis in the world's history, standing on the brink of unspeakable possibilities, we have no plans for the future protection and preservation of our country and of our wives and children.

"Lest we forget," "lest we forget," let us here and now highly resolve that the dead shall not have died in vain; that those who lie beneath the poppies on Flanders' fields and beneath the white crosses that dot the sacred soil of France shall not have made the supreme sacrifice futilely and to no purpose.

I do not know how it is with other Senators, but to me the most eloquent, the most appealing voices, are the voices that are mute and hushed in the solemn stillness of death. Trumpet tongued are they, and I can hear ringing down the corridors of destiny this cry: "We have willingly laid down our lives for civilization, but we demand that this sacrifice shall not be a vain one; we demand that our brothers and our sons left behind shall be saved from a like fate and not led to the slaughter because of unreadiness and unfitness to fight for the liberties and rights of mankind."

It is not conscience that makes cowards of us all, but the lack of it. It is because of a craven fear that a namby-pamby, molly-coddlish constituency may chide us if we vote our convictions and make proper provision for the eventualities, nay, for the certainties, of the future.

I do not know how other men reason, but to my mind the fact is entirely clear that had the United States been ready for war when we entered the struggle the sanguinary contest would have been ended a year sooner than it was, and the last million men who gave up their lives in France would be living to-day, vigorous factors in the world's economy instead of memories only, lost to civilization, lost to humanity, lost to those who loved them dearly.

I can not comprehend the texture of the conscience of those men who, by reason of their inaction and neglect, were responsible for that greatest of the world's tragedies, and who yet can walk the earth, supremely content and utterly oblivious of the consequences of their shirking the call of duty.

Not for the purple of 10,000 kings, not for all the gold of Midas or Crœsus, would I have upon my conscience the knowledge that, by reason of my supineness or remissness, I was responsible for the death of a million heroic young men whose lives were sacrificed because of America's unprepardeness for her great part in the salvation of civilized society.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I now move to strike out and insert in order to perfect the text which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has moved to strike out.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I think we can simplify the matter somewhat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand, a substitute has been offered by the Senator from Arkansas for the amendment offered by me, so that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is not now in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is an amendment to the text, and is offered for the purpose of perfecting the text. It therefore takes precedence over either the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee or the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gore	McCormick	Ransdell
Beckham	Hale	McCumber	Sheppard
Brandegee	Harris	McKellar	Simmons
Calder	Harrison	McLean	Smoot
Capper	Henderson	McNary	Spencer
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Myers	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Swanson
Comer	Kendrick	New	Thomas
Culberson	Kenyon	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Keyes	Nugent	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Page	Wadsworth
Elkins	Knox	Phipps	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Pittman	Watson
Glass	Lodge	Pomerene

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I desire also to announce that my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. CURTIS. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I have the amendment before me, and I want to submit to the Senate that it is absolutely in no sense an amendment to the amendment that has been offered by me to strike out. I should like to read to the Chair just what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand that it is an amendment to the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee to strike out.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is simply a perfection of the text, and a motion to strike out that part of the text and insert the provisions as presented by me.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the bill has been read and perfected, and this amendment is to strike out and insert various words and phrases and clauses that have no reference in the world to the amendment that is pending; and this amendment can not take precedence, because that has already been done. These sections have been gone over and perfected, the committee amendments have been offered, and after that has been done I have offered my amendment, which is to strike out, on page 65, bginning with line 4, all of sections 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, and 61, being that portion of the bill which provides for universal compulsory military training.

This is an entirely different amendment. As I understand from the Senator's argument a while ago, the object of it is to substitute a voluntary system of training for a compulsory system of training. After the compulsory system is stricken out, if the Senate should vote to strike it out, it strikes me that this amendment would be in order to perfect the bill. That might be true; but surely it can not be in order to insert an entirely new system of training, in view of the pendency of this motion of mine to strike out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that it would be in order to have the amendment first stated, in order that the Senate may intelligently deal with it? It has not yet been read.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this is, as I understand, a series of perfecting amendments. I only wanted to say that there is nothing better settled than that on a motion to strike out and insert, or a motion to strike out, the passage which it is proposed to strike from the bill is open to perfecting amendments. That is the rule of the Senate, and it is laid down in Jefferson's Manual. Of course the exercise of that right must be always preserved on this motion, because unless you can perfect what it is proposed to strike out you can not tell whether the body will desire to strike it out or not.

I do not mean to argue the question. The rule is absolutely plain on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Page 65, line 9, strike out "three" and insert "ten."
Line 10, strike out "subject to" and insert "eligible for."
Lines 10 and 11, strike out "shall be inducted into" and insert "may enlist in."
Line 12, strike out "shall."
Line 19, after the word "months," strike out balance of line and all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24.
Page 66, strike out line 1 and line 2, down to and including the word "desire."
Line 12, strike out "all persons" and all of lines 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and the word "years" on line 18.
Line 22, strike out "liable" and insert "eligible."
Lines 23 and 24, strike out "inducted into the service" and insert "enlisted for training."
Page 67, commencing on line 11, strike out the remainder of the section.
Page 69, line 4, strike out "liable to" and insert "eligible for."
Line 7, strike out "be required to" and insert "upon their request."
Line 20, strike out "liability to" and insert "eligibility for."
Line 21, strike out "liability" and insert "eligibility."
Page 70, strike out lines 15, 16, 17, and 18.
Line 23, after "development," insert "and who may enlist for such purpose."
Pages 70, 71, and 72, strike out sections 56 and 57.
Page 72, commencing line 18, strike out title of section and all of lines 20, 21, 22, 23, and line 24 to the end of the sentence, and insert new title, "Enlistment and assignment of reservists upon the completion of training," and the following:

"Each reservist who has completed the prescribed training under the provisions of this act may, subject to proper regulation, enlist in the permanent personnel or in an organization of the organized reserves or of the National Guard of the United States established for the locality in which he lives."

Line 25, after "reservist," insert "so enlisted in the organized reserves or the National Guard of the United States."
Page 73, line 8, strike out "assigned" and insert "enlisting."
Line 9, at beginning of line, strike out "to" and insert "in."
Strike out proviso commencing on line 18 and ending on line 24.

Line 3, after the words "shall be" insert "discharged and."
Line 8, strike out "assigned to" and insert "enlisting in."
Line 24, commencing at beginning of sentence, strike out remainder of the line, and, on line 25, strike out down to and including the word "and." Strike out small "i" in the word "in" and insert capital "I."

Page 75, line 5, strike out comma after United States and strike out "enrollment."
Line 12, strike out "enrolling in."
Page 77, lines 5 and 6, strike out "but not liable for military training under the provisions of this act" and insert "except enlisted men of the permanent personnel and the organized reserves."
Pages 80, 81, and 82, strike out all of section 65.
Page 91, strike out section 76 at bottom of page.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has presented here a series of probably 20 or 30 amendments to the original text. It is utterly impossible for me, at least, to understand the effect of the amendments, and I therefore ask that the Secretary be instructed to read the text as it would be if amended in accordance with these proposals.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. These amendments are so numerous that it is difficult to keep track of them from the reading at the desk. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that we postpone action on them until we can have the bill printed with the amendments in italics, so that we can see what they are when we read the bill. Otherwise, it will be difficult to pass on the questions. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that before we take action on the amendments there shall be a reprint of the bill made showing the amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to say that we are exactly in the situation which the Senator from Minnesota so well describes. It is absolutely impossible for anyone who has not been heretofore made familiar with the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey to know what effect they would have. The only way it could be done would be to have the text of the bill printed with the amendments italicized. Then we could see what are the amendments and vote intelligently upon them.

While I am on my feet I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are there any circumstances under which we can have a straight vote on the question whether we shall adopt universal military training as reported from the committee? If there is, then we want to have that kind of a vote.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would like to yield to the Chair, because I preferred a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think that the Senator from Tennessee has presented a direct parliamentary inquiry. The inquiry of the Senator from Tennessee is whether there might arise a combination of circumstances under which a certain vote might be taken. The Chair can not answer that question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I had the floor, and I yielded to the Senator from Tennessee. I understand that I have the floor at the present time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not intend to yield it at the present time. I simply want to explain the purpose of these amendments.

The amendments were carefully prepared some weeks ago. They provide, instead of a compulsory system, that all applicants, at the age of 18 and for 10 years thereafter, may voluntarily apply for the military training, and that the United States Government will train those volunteers. That is all the amendments do. They change the present system from a compulsory system, which at the present time, I understand, will be defeated here and in the House, and in my desire to at least make some preparation for national defense beyond the organized Army, which I believe under this bill is too small, in order to save that provision, and have at least those trained who volunteer and offer their services to their country, and recognize the obligation, I propose to make the system voluntary. That is all the amendments do.

The question is for those Senators who are so concerned regarding the compulsory feature of this bill to determine in their minds whether they are willing to accept a voluntary system and train those men who offer themselves to their country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask the Senator, if that is the case, why can we not have a straight vote on whether we shall have compulsory training, and if the motion to strike out is carried, then, if the Senator will present his amendments, not in the form of amendments to sections that now exist, but as independent amendments, we can all understand it, and it may be that we would all want to vote for the Senator's amendments? It is impossible for any of us to tell, in the form in which they are put before the Senate, whether they are good, bad, or indifferent. We know hardly anything about them.

It seems to me the correct way to get at the matter would be to vote on whether we are going to have compulsory training. If we conclude not to accept compulsory training, then I for one shall be very very glad, indeed, to consider the training offered by the Senator from New Jersey. But I think we ought to have a vote on compulsory training.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey if his amendments will not permit the Senate to determine the question of compulsory training as distinguished from voluntary training, and if the issue which the Senator from Tennessee seeks to join will not be joined upon those amendments?

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey represent the views of a majority of the majority of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs? Are they agreeable to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. They do not represent the views of the majority of the committee. I am for compulsory military training, but I recognize at the present time that this question is one which will probably be defeated. There are so many Senators opposed to the compulsory feature, feeling that the sentiment of the country is against it, and that it is unwise to adopt it, that they will vote against it. I believe that it is defeated, and therefore, in order that we may have at least some system of training, as an experiment, if you will, giving an opportunity to test its advantages and having those who gain benefit from it go out and become missionaries, to widen its scope, I have offered these amendments to save the system of military training by providing that, instead of the objectionable compulsory feature, a voluntary feature shall be inserted.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask if the Senator has consulted with the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], to get his views on this proposition, and whether the amendments are acceptable to him as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have consulted with the Senator from New York. I am not willing to quote the Senator. I think the Senator stands as I do. He believes in compulsory military training. He believes it would be a great benefit to the country. He is committed to it, and so am I committed to it. I was a member of the subcommittee. But it is defeated.

Mr. HARRISON. Did not the Senator entertain those views when the committee voted for compulsory military training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to have the Senator from New Jersey answer it. When did he change his view on the proposition and as to whether it could be passed through the Senate? It was voted out of the Committee on Military Affairs by a majority, I understand, standing for compulsory military training.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is the Senator interrogating me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I first wish to answer the Senator from Mississippi by saying that the expressions of various Senators, including many on the Senator's own side, that they intended to oppose it have led me to the belief that it would be defeated, and I think the Senator knows that it is defeated.

Mr. HARRISON. I think, without question, it will be defeated, but I am wondering when the change of heart came over the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am willing to overlook the political side of the question in order to do something for my country and save whatever I can of the principle of military service.

Mr. HARRISON. That is a very commendable course.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion to amend divisible? It is a motion to strike out and amend. If it is divisible, I ask for a division of the question, so that we can vote first on the motion to strike out and then vote on the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not a motion to strike out, as the Chair understands; it is a motion to amend. It is a series of perfecting amendments offered to the original text of the bill, and clearly takes precedence over a motion to strike out. A portion of Rule XVIII provides:

> But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded, for the purpose of amendment, as a question, and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend until the Chair finishes its ruling?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to correct the statement of the Chair, if he will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just as soon as the Chair completes the ruling.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest that the Chair be allowed to complete his ruling.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am sure the Chair does not desire to convey an erroneous impression. The pending motion is not one to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending motion is an amendment to the original text.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But the Chair has read Rule XVIII, which refers to the pendency of a motion to strike out and insert. The pending motion is not to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a motion to strike out. So what the Chair has just read is not pertinent to this issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks otherwise. In a recent decision the following ruling was made:

> Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. I wish to ask whether this amendment (proposed by Mr. SMITH of Georgia to perfect the text to be stricken out) is in order? We are now considering the amendments of the committee.
> The VICE PRESIDENT (Mr. MARSHALL). The Chair rules that the amendment is in order, it being always in order to perfect the part to be stricken out before considering an amendment thereto.

Which, of course, must be true, else after that portion shall have been perfected the Senate might not want to strike it out. Therefore a proposition to perfect must take precedence over a motion to strike out.

The Chair holds that the amendments of the Senator from New Jersey are in order and will take precedence over the motion to strike out presented by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is no way, in my judgment, by which the Senate can avoid, in justice to itself, passing upon the question of universal military training. I shall not avoid it. I am in favor of it just as absolutely to-day as I was yesterday, the day before, two years ago, and four years ago.

As I understand it, the Senator from New Jersey offers some amendments to the original text of the bill. They provide that instead of compulsory military training there shall be voluntary military training. The Senate must vote as between those two, when the vote is taken upon the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Some gentlemen upon the other side of the aisle seem exceedingly anxious to have a roll call on this question. I am willing that we shall have a roll call on it. They seem to suspect that there is something in the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey which will deprive them of an opportunity to do something about this matter which they want to do. It will not. They can vote on the question. I am ready to vote on it now.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from New York speaks of Senators on this side of the Chamber, but I presume he does not intend to include all, because I am not in the category of those who occupy the position of some of those who oppose universal military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Senator from Oregon and I have worked together on this matter for several years. I know just where he stands, and have always known.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I had intended to say something in advocacy of that provision of the bill for compulsory training, but I have not felt well enough to do it in the past few days. However, I take this occasion to say, as emphatically as I know how to say it, that I stand for the sections of the bill that provide for universal compulsory training. I have committed myself to it more than once on the floor of the Senate. Only a short while ago I addressed myself to the pathological side of the question, showing the good which the selective-service law has done for the young men of this country, first, in detecting the deficiencies among them, and, second, in curing defectives and restoring them not only to useful military life but to useful civil life as well.

I had hoped that I might be able to say something on the subject of the traditional policy of this country, Mr. President, from Washington down to the present time. I think the records and history of our country would show that the policy of compulsory service and the policy of compulsory training, too, if you please, do not violate any of the precedents or traditions of our country.

I feel, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] feels, that the sentiment of the Senate is rather against compulsory universal military training, although it does not carry with it compulsory service in the true sense of the word; and, feeling as he does about it, in order that something may be saved from this wreck, because I feel that it is a wreck, I hope that the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey may prevail.

There has not been anything in this country that has done as much for the young men of the country as drafting them into the service under the selective-service act; and, in my opinion, nothing would do the country as much good as taking these young men from civil life during peace time into the cantonments, where the rich man's son and the poor man's son would work side by side in the development of our country.

The vocational training which has been provided for them under regulations of the War Department has proved to be efficacious in developing young men. I have gone through the vocational institution at Holabird, where young men are taken from the factory, from the farm, and from behind the counters, and taught vocational training, and after one year's service, taking the lessons which are given to them, they go out from the Army, where they have enlisted for a year's service or more, and accept positions in the automobile factories of the country, for instance, at from $40 to $60 a week. In other words, those young men are benefited by the short experience they have in the Army.

So I hope the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey will prevail, and that out of this wreck, where something was attempted to be done to rehabilitate the young men of the country we may at least give to every young man between certain ages an opportunity, if he sees fit, to volunteer for this training.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am as thorough a believer in compulsory military training as the Senator from New Jersey. I have spoken for it on this floor and voted for it repeatedly, and I have not changed my mind. But it is perfectly obvious, and it is not necessary to go into the reasons, that compulsory military training, as provided in the bill, can not pass the Senate. It is also certain that it could not pass the House. I think the complete defeat of military training for the young men of the country would be a misfortune. I do not see how any objection can possibly be urged if it is made voluntary. Therefore, I agree entirely with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] that, in order to save the principle, it is very desirable that the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey should be adopted.

I regret exceedingly that we can not take it as reported from the committee by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], but I think it is much better to take the voluntary system than to take no system at all. I believe there is great value in it not merely for military purposes and for the defense of the country but for the discipline that will be received by the young men who take the training. I think it is altogether too valuable and too important to be lost entirely.

I sincerely hope, therefore, that we may adopt the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey, which, though necessarily numerous, are changes in language which simply mean making it voluntary instead of compulsory.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not disappoint those who desire to vote on this very important subject this afternoon. I had not intended to submit any remarks to the Senate upon this or any other feature of the bill, for the statement by the chairman of the committee when it was taken from the calendar was so complete and so satisfactory as to need no further elaboration. But in view of the certain defeat, a result which has been apparent to me from the inception of the consideration of the bill, of this most important feature, I shall give, as briefly as I can, some reasons for my change of opinion regarding the subject of compulsory military training.

It is not a new subject, certainly not a new one as regards the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. It has there been actively discussed, considered, commended, and criticized ever since I have had the honor of being a member of that committee. It was brought to our attention long before we entered the war; it has accompanied the discussion of every military bill coming to us for consideration, and is a subject which will not down until it shall have been finally disposed of to the satisfaction of the majority of the American people after they shall have become thoroughly informed of the defensive needs of the country.

I am not an enthusiast over the subject of compulsory training. I regard it from the standpoint of any other necessary thing which may be obnoxious to public sentiment or to personal inclination. But the experiences of the past four years, unusual in character and world-wide in their operation, force one to consider the future from a standpoint entirely different from that which prevailed prior to our engagement in the war. We were thrown into it somewhat unexpectedly. Although the certainty of our participation had long been apparent, it came as the armistice came—almost without warning. We were obliged overnight, as it were, to begin the construction of the mightiest military armament, when you consider the distant field of its operations, ever undertaken by any nation since the world began.

Not only so, but the need was immediate. There was little time for deliberation, scarcely any time for anything except action. We were confronted immediately after our declaration of war, therefore, with the problem of raising an army and with the consideration of alternative methods of raising that army, one by the old volunteer process and the other by a system of enforced draft.

I opposed the draft system to the best of my ability. I believed it was thoroughly wrong in principle and would not only prove inoperative but deplorable in practice. I believed that it was entirely within our power to secure all the men we needed by appealing to their patriotism and by inviting their voluntary cooperation. I still believe that system would have been practical.

On the other hand, I have reason now to know that the apprehensions which I entertained regarding the draft system were not realized by the experiences of the Nation after that system was adopted. Resistance to it was sporadic and occasional; so far as its extent may be considered, it was negligible. Under its operation we raised the required Army, one of the greatest, one of the most gallant, and one of the most effective forces ever gathered together for the championing of a great principle or the defense of a great nation. Its success was almost immediate, and ultimately it was overwhelming. Those of the Senate who championed that system have every reason to be satisfied with the vindication of their judgment and with the satisfactory manner in which at all times the system was developed.

The one thing, however, which was needed for a perfect Army, or a comparatively perfect one, was preliminary training, the lack of which resulted in increased loss of life, in a very considerable degree of added expenditure, and possibly in prolongation of the war, the latter conclusion, however, being entirely speculative.

I was upon the subcommittee which prepared this bill. As one of its members it became my duty to hear the arguments for and against the various provisions afterwards crystallized into form, and which make up the bill as it came to the Senate. At the beginning of these hearings my objections to the military training had undergone no change. I was quite as much opposed to it as a universal system in America as I had been prior to our entrance into the war. But, in listening to the arguments and to the experiences, and particularly to the experiences of American officers having in charge large bodies of men at the front, responsible for their efficiency and for their safety, and bound to care for them to the utmost extent compatible with the risks of actual war, I was compelled ultimately, in spite of my preconceived prejudice, to admit the justice of their contentions for the establishment of the policy.

During our consideration of the bill an exhibition drill was given to the members of the committee, I think last September, in front of the eastern portico of the Capitol by a squad of aliens who had been subjected to military training for about three months.

It demonstrated the discipline, both mental and physical, which had been applied to 25 aliens enlisted under the laws of the country and submitted to a system of training at Camp Upton. On the 1st of July, 1919, not a single man of the squad could speak the English language, save one, who was an unlettered American. These men comprised Syrians, Greeks, Serbians, Hollanders, Czechs, Portuguese, and Spaniards, the polyglot representatives of many nations; yet within the short space of less than three months they had acquired a fairly good mastery of the English language, while their manual of arms was the most perfect that I have ever seen exhibited by a similar number of men. It was little short of marvelous.

Immediately after the performance ended we were invited to talk with these men. We took advantage of the privilege and examined them as to their experiences. They declared the system to which they had voluntarily submitted themselves, and which was both military and educational in its features, had transformed them from ignorant foreigners into American citizens. They had been taught the language, the art of reading and writing, music, history, and those physical exercises which are the equivalent of sound physical training, whether for military of any other purpose. They sang the national airs; they gave their opinions of our institutions; they expressed themselves with enthusiasm regarding the military policy of the country, so far as they had come in contact with it; and expressed the hope that they might be permitted to remain until, through this system of training, they had qualified themselves for the active duties of material citizenship.

That object lesson, Mr. President, coupled with the convictions of the men tried in battle, speaking from the fullness of their hearts, citizen soldiers as well as Regulars, tested in the crucible of actual warfare, so appealed to my judgment as to compel my reluctant consent to a favorable consideration of this section of the bill. I believed then, however, that it was premature. I know now that it is, for there is no doubt in my mind that the majority of American sentiment is against compulsory military training. I do not think that sentiment is as widespread as it was prior to the war; I do not think that it is as widespread as it was during the war; and I am satisfied as the stories of men, suffering from the want of training, shall become more and more a part of our universal information, and as it shall develop that this system, compulsory so-called, nevertheless embraces within its area mental education and vocational training, as well as physical exercise and discipline, that it will appeal more and more to the average man, who more than ever needs to learn that respect for law and constituted authority lies at the foundation of law and order, and a lesson to be acquired very largely by the gregarious instruction of our youth.

Another element, Mr. President, working against a fair consideration of this subject at this time, is the approaching presidential election. The daily unfolding of the political kaleidoscope constitutes a perspective upon which our eyes are constantly fixed, and in which we display more interest, active and passive, than in any other subject of present importance. The result is, both as to Democrats and Republicans, that what we do or fail to do at this time is subjected, so far as we can do so, to the supreme test of political opinion; in other words, how will a given policy affect the electorate; how many votes will be repelled by this particular action; how many will be attracted by the other? That is the supreme test of our legislation of to-day, and will continue to be so until the people next November shall determine whom they want for their next President. Consequently, to attempt to impose upon the country any important policy at this time is absolutely impossible. Political cowardice, if there were no other reason, would serve to make us hesitate; and he who hesitates is lost.

The House of Representatives rejected this proposal incontinently. It received recognition at the hands of the Senate Military Affairs Committee; and it is evident now, whatever we do, that the bill will not carry any method of training, either voluntary or otherwise. Whatever we do upon this subject must be done after the next election.

Like the Senator from Oregon, therefore, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, not with the reluctance which he expresses, for, after all, it may be the best way to draw the attention of the public to the plan, and, by giving to the volunteers that identical equipment which the volunteers at the officers' training school at Plattsburg acquired before the war, furnish an object lesson not only of its importance but of its necessity. No man, Mr. President, I think, can be found to-day who does not recognize that the voluntary training school for reserve officers at Plattsburg was one of the most valuable and important elements of our Army education prior to our entrance into the war. It turned out a large number of men fairly well equipped for the duties of active officers in the new Army, the lack of which would have been a most serious handicap, and at the same time served as a basis for the establishment of similar schools of training elsewhere, thus featuring it as an American institution. The people of the United States owe a debt of gratitude to those who had the moral courage at the time to institute that school, to adopt that system of training, and to apply it to the enthusiastic young men who flocked there to enjoy its advanatges. So, I hope that, if we should be so fortunate as to secure a voluntary system, it may in its unfolding and in the benefit that it may accomplish go very largely toward removing initial objections to the system as un-American.

Mr. President, I freely confess that if the expense attendant upon the adoption of the system were anything like as here represented to be, I do not believe that, howsoever important it is, we should adopt it at this time; but the estimate of the expense so far as the committee are concerned has not been a matter of haphazard. The committee are as anxious to minimize public expenses as any other Members of this body possibly can be. They have taken no chances upon it, and have sought and received the best possible information to be acquired from every possible source at all familiar with or at all competent to advise us upon it.

Here let me say, Mr. President, that this bill, however unpopular it may ultimately become, is the best considered and most thoroughly prepared piece of proposed legislation that has been placed upon the calendar of the Senate since I have been a Member of it. The chairman of the committee has virtually devoted all his time to it for the last six, eight, or nine months. He has labored upon it in season and out of season, by night as well as by day; he has had about him the best experts that the War Department could furnish, and he has made his own selection of them. He himself, in my judgment, is better informed upon the military affairs of the United States than any other man in public life, and is as sincerely anxious to present to the people a thoroughly prepared, efficient, and economical system for our Military Establishment as any Member of either body of this or any previous Congress.

I here wish to pay my tribute of appreciation of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, because I know the work that he has done, the disinterested efforts he has put forth, and the sincere and patriotic desire that has animated him at all times to prepare and then to effectuate, if possible, the passage of a military bill as nearly perfect as human experience, human prejudices, and conflicting interests and ambitions have permitted.

So in considering the matter of cost naturally the committee were much exercised, but when it appears, not only from the recitals of the bill but from the charts which illustrate it, that the only difference between it and the House bill in the matter of expense is less than $10,000,000, while the results to be obtained from them are as the pink chart on the wall to the blue and green one on the extreme left of the Chamber, then certainly no man should hesitate because of an approximately small difference in supporting that bill which accomplishes so much more and relatively at so much less cost.

But, Mr. President, the Senate wants to vote. I am ready, as the chairman is, to vote either upon the main question or upon any of its features. I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be adopted; and I am very sure that as time shall pass, and as we recede from the excitements and passions of the war, and as we perceive the necessity now, as ever, of some system and degree of defensive military preparation, as we shall discover from the operations of whatever peace may be ultimately declared that human selfishness and human nature, although it has experienced the severest affliction of all time, is in its fundamentals altogether unchanged, we shall be able to approach a subject of this kind more in a spirit of patriotic endeavor to serve our country than in contemplation of individual prejudice or political advantage.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am very much surprised that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who offers this amendment, should have kept it in concealment so long. He advises the Senate now that he has had it under consideration for almost as long a time as the bill has been before the Senate; and now it is presented for the attention of the Senate without giving Senators even an opportunity to read a printed copy.

Mr. President, this amendment as presented by the Senator from New Jersey can not possibly be intelligently considered and voted upon this afternoon; and I hope the Senator will agree to have a print of the bill made with the amendment so inserted as to indicate what effect it will have.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to suggest that a print be made, not of the whole bill, but of those sections which involve compulsory military training; and I do that for these reasons——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Oh, yes; I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, if that is done, that will be all that is necessary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat his suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. That the reprint with the amendments suggested by the Senator from New Jersey be made only as to the compulsory military training provisions of the bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The provisions amended?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; just the sections affected by the amendments, and not have a reprint of the whole bill, because that would be a waste of paper; and not only that, but the clerks at the desk could hardly follow the amendments that have already been agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, before this question is settled, I simply wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] that I presume he understands that these amendments simply provide for a change from the compulsory to the voluntary system, and that the bill has been very carefully examined and these amendments prepared with that end in view. Has the Senator from Nebraska made an examination of the provisions as they will be changed by my amendments?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is exactly what I am saying. In the hubbub of the Senate, and in the midst of being called out from the Senate several times, I have endeavored to do so; but I have not been able to reach any intelligent conclusion, and I doubt whether anyone can reach an intelligent conclusion, on a number of questions. For instance, I should like the Senator from New Jersey to tell me what this is going to cost. Can the Senator come anywhere within a hundred million dollars of the cost?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think—and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] can correct me if I am wrong—that the 600,000 as originally contemplated in the 18-year-old class will cost about $168,000,000. Whatever proportion those who volunteer bear to the entire number 18 years of age, if there are 100,000 who volunteer, at $280 a head, the cost would be $28,000,000. The Senator himself can figure it out.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There are other considerations here. The original bill provides for training within three years. The Senator's amendment, as I understand, provides for training over a period of 10 years for each individual.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It provides for one four-month period of training for anyone between the age of 18 and any age beyond that when he may volunteer for training.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes. Now, the Senator says that he has had this under consideration for weeks. It seems to me that if he has had it so under consideration for weeks he ought to be able to give us an intelligent estimate of what the cost is and how it affects this bill; but in introducing his amendment he has made no statement to that effect, and I am entirely in the dark.

I am unable to reach a decision, in looking over these amendments, as to whether the men so trained are subject to compulsory military service in the event of war. Can the Senator answer that question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will answer the first question the Senator asked me, and that is how much it will cost. It will cost the proportionate amount that the number that present themselves for training bear to the entire class of 600,000 which we originally contemplated. If it is one-sixth, it will cost one-sixth of $168,000,000. If it is one-third, it will cost one-third that amount. That is the best estimate I can give. It will cost much less than the compulsory military training, because it has been estimated that only 75,000, and probably only 50,000, men would present themselves for training. I hope it will cost the entire amount, because I want to see at least 600,000 men trained every year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I can answer one of the questions of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would be very glad to have the Senator answer it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator asked whether the men who voluntarily take this training and are then assigned to the organized reserves voluntarily would then be subject to service in time of war. The answer is in the affirmative, if the war takes place within the five years of their period of enlistment. There is nothing strange or new about that. A man who enlists in the Regular Army to-day is subject to service in time of war if the war starts while he is still serving his enlistment period.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That answers that question, which has seemed in doubt, from a hasty examination of the amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not nearly so mysterious and dangerous, Mr. President, as it may seem to the Senator from Nebraska. He does not seem to be very enthusiastic about——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am yielding for a question. I would not like to lose the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We may well be excused for being a little suspicious under these circumstances. Here is a sudden right-about-face of all Senators who have been very ardent in advocating compulsory military training.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator will qualify that statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that statement, in view of the fact that I presented these amendments. There is nothing suspicious about them whatsoever. I am simply giving the Senator from Nebraska an opportunity to vote on a voluntary system. He has objected to the compulsory feature. My position is perfectly plain.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the statement that there is something suspicious about it is extremely offensive.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask the chairman of the committee, if I may, in the time of the Senator from Nebraska, whether this scheme of voluntary military service has ever been considered by the committee as a committee; and does not the Senator think that it should be referred to the committee and let them pass on a volunteer scheme?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can not help expressing my amusement at the way Senators on the other side squirm.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not express——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the Senator will allow me to answer the question, if I can.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not asking the Senator any question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought the Senator from Tennessee asked me a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yielded to the Senator from Tennessee. I shall be delighted to have the Senator amuse himself at the way we squirm, but I would like to have him amuse himself in his own time.

The Senator from New Jersey misunderstood me. I did not say that there was something suspicious in his action. What I said was that we might well be excused if we entertained suspicions at this sudden conversion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Ah!

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We have been engaged here for a number of days in a struggle upon the floor of the Senate against the provision reported out of this committee involving compulsory military service, involving a proposition that the Government shall take a five-year mortgage upon every young man in the country 18 years of age, and proposing to subject him, in the event of war, to compulsory service, without any act of Congress providing for a draft. We have been engaged in fighting and antagonizing that proposition, and we had before the Senate at the time an amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to strike out those objectionable clauses.

Now, we are informed that for weeks one of the ardent advocates of compulsory military training and compulsory service, together with the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, have been discussing a plan of substituting for this proposition a volunteer military service, without affording us the opportunity of examining a printed amendment, without affording us even the notice that generally goes with important amendments that are to be offered.

Under those circumstances we may well be excused for being a little suspicious. We would at least like to have time to examine the phraseology of the proposed amendments. We would like to know what we are called upon to vote for.

It is for that reason, Mr. President, that I ask unanimous consent that the parts of the bill which it is proposed to change shall be subjected to a reprint, together with the changes which the Senator from New Jersey proposes to make. It may be that when they are presented and we have had an opportunity to examine them we will vote for the amendments. But we want to know what we are voting for, and I make that request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just a word, and I shall not detain the Senate further.

The subcommittee in drafting the bill, upon which we spent months and months, was careful to so construct it that it should constitute, in the first instance, and in the most important particulars, a foundation upon which could be built any kind of training, training for a portion of the young men of the country of a given age, or training for all of them, whether compulsory or volunteer. Our greatest hope was to get sound military legislation. The subcommittee which drafted the bill was unanimously in favor of compulsory universal military training. That subcommittee, may I say, although it may not seem important, was composed of four Republicans and three Democrats. It never occurred to us to bring any partisan discussion into the question.

So it has always been in the minds of the subcommittee which drafted the bill, and of the people who have helped us, that we could impose upon the foundations here built any kind of training by the simplest of amendments one way or another. The bill originally printed, as a bill providing for compulsory military training, would carry the same aspect it has now, except that a few words here and there would be different.

So there is no about face about this thing at all. We have always been willing to face alternatives. The thing we have tried to do is to build a strong and sure foundation.

The Senator from Nebraska has referred to the "about face," or what he calls one. The Senator from New Jersey now proposes several amendments to the text of the bill, perfecting, as he wants done, section 51 and other sections. The Senate must vote upon that; at least, if I can get a roll call, they will. The Senate in that vote will vote their choice as between voluntary training and compulsory training. I shall vote for compulsory training. That is all. There is no about face about it. There is nothing mysterious about it.

Now, may I say to the Senator from Nebraska, and to other Senators who may be interested in this amendment, I do not think I am confessing to any guilt when I say I have known about several alternatives that have been carefully considered, all built upon the one foundation provided in the structure of the bill.

As the Senate knows, section 51 is the key section of the bill, so far as a training system is concerned, and the first sentence is the important one. All that follows is subsidiary in importance. That section reads, in its first sentence, that—

> All male citizens of the United States (excluding residents of Alaska and the insular possessions) and all male persons who reside therein and who have declared their intention to become citizens, other than persons excepted by this act, shall, upon attaining the age of 18 years, or within three years thereafter, be subject to military on naval training.

That is the phrase which carries the compulsion. That is the key phrase of the section. The key amendment offered is to strike out the words "subject to" and insert the words "eligible to," which changes the entire meaning from compulsion to a contract entered into voluntarily. All the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey which follow are exactly in line with that idea, with some few exceptions, where it is necessary to strike out an entire sentence that has to do with the choice of the first three years, for instance, in the training. The Senators will find, in going through these amendments, that in several instances the word "liability" occurs.

That is stricken out and the word "eligible" is inserted. The words "subject to" occur, and those are stricken out in each case, and the words "eligible for" inserted.

That is what these amendments of the Senator from New Jersey do. Of course, I do not ask the Senator to take my word for it, or to take the word of the Senator from New Jersey for it, that the thing is absolutely accurate. I do not know how it can be made more so, but if the Senate wants to have the bill reprinted in these particular sections showing the amendments, very well.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understood the Senator from New York, in reply to a question of the Senator from Nebraska, to state that the soldiers enlisted under this section would be liable to military service in the event of the breaking out of a war during their period of training. Then I do not understand what the words "for this purpose alone" mean, in line 12 of that section. I assumed it meant that they were enlisted for the purpose of training alone.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think the Senator heard exactly what I said. They may enlist for the four months' training, for training purposes alone. Then, I said that if they voluntarily enlisted in the organized reserves they would be subject to call for service in time of war during the period of that enlistment in the organized reserves.

Mr. PITTMAN. I did not hear the Senator say "their enlistment in the reserves." I thought he was referring to their enlistment for training during the four months' period.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the statement made a moment ago by the chairman of the committee, I do not think there is any disposition on the part of any Senators not to accept the explanation which has been made either by the chairman of the committee or by the Senator from New Jersey as to what would be the effect of these proposed amendments. But there are quite a number of them, and even if some of us should vote in favor of voluntary training, we might have differences of opinion as to the details.

To illustrate, under a proposed amendment, as I now carry it in my mind, all young men who are between the ages of 18 and 27 would be eligible to these privileges for training. It may be that Senators would have a different opinion as to what ought to be the limit as to age or whether married men should be permitted to enter this service. There are quite a number of questions of that character which come up, and I think every Senator should have an opportunity to consider them before he votes upon this question.

The amendment as it has been presented is divisible, but we are now near the hour of adjournment and it can be printed so that we can have it before us to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was not insisting that the Senate go ahead without having the amendments printed. I merely wanted to explain how they came to be drawn. There is nothing new about them and nothing mysterious about them. The Senate, of course, has a perfect right to have them printed, and I would not beg the Senate to forego that right.

May I suggest, however, that the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey are applicable only to sections affected by the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe there are two other sections.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; on page 80 and page 91. But there probably will be no objection to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Section 76?

Mr. McKELLAR. Section 65, on page 80.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment affects that?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And also section 76, on page 91?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right. My amendment does not refer to those two sections. I think the Senator's amendment there is very proper. I do not think I shall object to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I explain one or two more things about the structure of the bill, Mr. President, so that the Senate may understand exactly what we are doing?

The amendments of the Senator from New Jersey were intended, I understand, to affect only the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask whether the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey strike out the sections relating to registration?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. I have tried to commence three or four times, and I would like to get a chance to explain. There will be a few more amendments—about six in number—necessary in the bill at the first part of it if it is determined to make the training voluntary instead of compulsory—very simple and perfectly obvious amendments—and my suggestion is that, if the Senate is going to vote on this question as between compulsory and volunteer training, those changes should be indicated.

There is another thing in connection with it, and one which I regret having to relate. In my humble judgment—though the Senate may differ from me—if the Senate abandons compulsory universal military training it can not afford to accept that provision of the bill which reduces the Regular Army from 280,000 men to 210,000 men in five years. The Senate, I think, in its best judgment, will make up its mind to maintain an Army of 280,000 men, which, incidentally, will add to the cost of the bill if this is to be the military policy of the country.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the National Guard at the end of that time, under the Senator's own estimate, be so much increased as to leave just as much protection as there will be under the bill as now framed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know. How can we tell how large the National Guard will be under the volunteer system?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly the Senator knows that the increase would very largely exceed the reduction which would take place in the Regular Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not so sure of that. There are 40,000 men in the National Guard now. If we add 90,000 men to them, which is the number we propose to take off of the Regular Army in five years, we would have 130,000 men in the National Guard. That is a little more than we have ever had before.

Mr. LENROOT. What is the Senator's own estimate, under his plan, of the National Guard at the end of five years?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under our plan of universal military training applied to the Guard, men could take their training in the Guard as an alternative, and we expected that that would keep the Guard full. We do not know what number the Guard will go to. The national-defense act authorized 425,000 men. I said yesterday that I did not believe it could ever pass 350,000 under any circumstances.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the estimate the Senator himself has made?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Exactly. I said it could not under any circumstances pass that number due to lack of facilities. I put that just as high as I could in order to make those estimates as generous as possible. I do not know what number the Guard will go to if we do not have universal military training and use the Guard as one of the vehicles for that training, but I do suggest to the Senate, as I think it is my duty to do, that it may seem wise not to reduce the Regular Army to 210,000 men if we are not going to have universal compulsory military training.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate more than a moment. As I have gathered from the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey, sections 56 and 57 of the bill are stricken out entirely. Section 56 requires the registration of persons liable to military training. Section 57 provides, however, for the reenactment, so to speak, of the conscription law passed on May 18, 1917, during the war. Of course, the striking out of those two sections effectually does away with the universal military training provided for in the bill. The striking out of those sections is an absolute striking out of the universal compulsory military training provision.

The Senator from New York says that I am squirming. I made a bad impression on him if that is so, because it has been those two sections that I have been fighting against ever since the proposal was first made. I am very happy that those sections are going out and that when they do go out of the bill universal compulsory military training is defeated by the Senate. I am glad to know, too, that the Senate is overwhelmingly against the proposition, and that there seems to be a majority on both sides of the Chamber against it, as I believe they ought to be against it for the reasons I have heretofore stated.

So far as the preparation of the bill is concerned and the attitude of the Senator from New York, I may be pardoned for saying a word. The Senator from New York, the chairman of the committee, has indeed been an earnest, intelligent, vigorous, active supporter of universal compulsory military training. He has never wavered in it, he has never faltered in it, and I have the highest respect for him and his views. I believe he is wrong, but that is all the difference between myself and the Senator from New York. His splendid efforts in behalf of that system were, I believe, unwise. It is very unfortunate that his efforts could not have been expended in a better cause.

In regard to the voluntary features of the bill, as proposed in the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey, I have very hastily gone over them, and I am glad we are going to have unanimous consent to have that portion of the bill reprinted, so that we can see just what the provisions are.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator, of course, understands that the request for unanimous consent is open to objection. I shall not object if it is agreed to under certain conditions, one of which is that this shall be the pending question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I would not want to preclude myself from offering an amendment to the amendment. Of course, it will be the pending question to-morrow. There is no question about that. The parliamentary situation is such that when we adjourn it will be the pending question to-morrow.

I can not say whether I am in favor of the proposal of the Senator from New Jersey or not. After having examined it carefully it may be that there will be no question about it or no objection to it. It may be best for the country, in my judgment, but I would like to have until to-morrow, so that I can see just what it means.

I am glad to see that there is practical unanimity, as it appears now, on the part of the Senate that the measure providing for universal military training shall not become the law. I am delighted to see the overwhelming sentiment that causes a practical withdrawal of the proposal from the Senate entirely. I construe the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey as an abandonment by the Senate of any such proposal.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator is using rather strong language about it. I agree entirely with the remarks made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] a short time since. I have never been otherwise than a champion of universal military training. I am sorry that I can not vote for it, and I am sorry that it can not prevail.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that. I have always understood that to be the position of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. But in case it can not prevail and this matter comes up, as it will come under the parliamentary situation, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question or two if I may do so. I assume, of course, that the organization of officers, and so forth, was prepared having in mind the existence of compulsory training. Of course, if that is to be entirely eliminated or if there is substituted for it a system of voluntary training, I wondered whether it would necessitate or make advisable any change in the number of the commissioned personnel as organized under the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think so; I think it can be reduced; in fact, I know it.

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the thought I had in mind, and I wondered what plan the committee had in view in the event that we should substitute the voluntary system for the compulsory system.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The allotment of the commissioned personnel of the permanent organization would have to be reduced, and it should be reduced. As soon as the Senate votes on this question and makes its choice between the two systems of training, if it chooses the voluntary training system I shall present amendments which the Senate can consider and which will immediately fit those little points in the bill to the different kinds of training.

Mr. POMERENE. Without having any technical knowledge on the subject, it occurred to me that some changes would be, at least, advisable.

Mr. NELSON. Has the request of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] been granted for a reprint?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The Chair has not stated it, because there has been debate. If there be no further debate, the Chair will state the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My request for unanimous consent has not been granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been granted. The Chair is about to state it. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that that portion of the pending measure affected by the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] be reprinted, showing how the bill would read if amended.

Mr. NELSON. With the amendments in italic, I suggest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Would it not be better to have the text printed as it will appear when perfected?

Mr. NELSON. We want to have it so printed that we can tell at a glance what the amendments are in the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, as I said a moment ago, there will be about six more amendments necessary to the bill besides these, but I am not disposed to ask that they be included, as they have not been offered in the list of amendments proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. They are so simple that I think the Senate, when I point them out in the event the amendments of the Senator from New Jersey carry, will accept them without cavil.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now ask unanimous consent that the pending question, which is on my amendment, be voted upon at 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator had better make it "not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I request that the vote on my amendment be taken not later than 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that vote is simply to be taken on the pending amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, because there are other amendments that will have to be voted upon. The Senator's request refers merely to his amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It refers merely to the amendment which I have offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the request.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from New Jersey has offered a large number of amendments, and until we have an opportunity to examine the amendments in order to ascertain what they are we can not tell whether there will be any debate upon them. I am sorry I shall, therefore, have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD STRIKES.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk, in order that it may be read and referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 346) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce is hereby authorized and directed to conduct an inquiry, by subcommittee or otherwise, respecting any existing strike of interstate railroad employees not conducted or authorized by any recognized organization of railroad employees. For this purpose such committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer and such other clerical assistance as may be necessary. A report of the results of such investigation, including a statement of the causes and purposes of such strike and the merits of the controversy involved therein, shall be made to the Senate as soon as practicable, accompanied by such recommendations as may be deemed proper. The expenses of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator desire the resolution to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

Mr. McCORMICK. I am afraid that despite what the Senator may desire, it will have to go to that committee.

Mr. WARREN. Under the rule, it will have to be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Inasmuch as the resolution provides for an expenditure from the contingent fund, it will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I assume that the resolution refers to the strike reported in the city of Chicago or thereabouts.

Mr. McCORMICK. It refers to that strike, Mr. President, and to other strikes which, as I am now informed, have taken place from New York to California without the authority of the officers of the 16 responsible railroad brotherhoods.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to follow that question by another, and to ask the Senator what information he has as to the extent and character of the strike. It might be of some value to the committee to know that.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the information which I have is meager. It has been coming to me during the course of the day. At noon men had walked out in Buffalo, Toledo, Chicago, Kansas City, and Los Angeles, according to the reports which come to me, together with other smaller cities which are important railroad centers. These walkouts have taken place despite the efforts of the responsible leaders of the 16 railroad crafts. According to the newspaper reports, the immediate and precipitating cause of the Chicago strike was the dismissal of a conductor; but, so far as I have been able to learn, the actual cause of the strike is the failure of the President to appoint the wage board provided by the new act for the determination of disputes regarding wages.

As the Senator remembers, some 10 days ago the committee of executives and the representatives of the brotherhoods failed to reach an agreement. The men, led or misled by some among their number, impatient and restless, in these cities have disregarded the judgment of their elected officers and have walked out. The later reports indicate that in some of the centers the situation is very grave indeed. Since no commission or wage board has been appointed under the law, it seemed to me appropriate that the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, or a subcommittee of its members, should take steps to discover the facts and publish them to the country, and to acquaint the Senate with them, all to the end that such moral pressure as may be brought to bear may induce the men to return to work pending the lawful arbitrament of the wage dispute.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no accurate information upon the subject, but——

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not speak by the book, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. I saw a statement in the papers this morning to the effect that the brotherhoods had recommended those who were to be representatives of the labor organizations, and that the railroad companies had recommended those who were to be representatives of the companies, but that great difficulty was being found in the selection of men who were to be representatives of the public and who would accept those positions. I simply state that for what it is worth. I know nothing about it.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 9, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 8, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord, we would approach Thee in the spirit of Him who taught us when we pray to say: Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors, and lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3664. An act for the relief of the Link-Belt Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.;

S. 3663. An act for the relief of Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato as managing owners of the Italian bark Doris; and

S. 3662. An act for the relief of Th. Brovig as owner of the bark Bennestvet.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 6025) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3664. An act for the relief of the Link-Belt Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 3663. An act for the relief of Gaetano Davide Olivari fu Fortunato as managing owner of the Italian bark Doris; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 3662. An act for the relief of Th. Brovig as owner of the bark Bennestvet; to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 3779. An act to authorize the Ozark Forest road improvement district of Baxter County, Ark., to construct and maintain a bridge across the White River, near Norfork, Ark.;

S. 3263. An act to authorize the construction of flood-control and improvement works in Minnesota River and Big Stone Lake between the States of Minnesota and South Dakota;

S. 2786. An act authorizing the sale of lands in Gregory County, S. Dak.; and

S. J. Res. 167. Joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

CALL FOR A QUORUM.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point that no quorum is present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anderson	Crowther	Heflin	Riordan
Anthony	Curry, Calif.	Hill	Robinson, N. C.
Ayres	Davey	Hoey	Rodenberg
Bacharach	Denison	Holland	Rowan
Bankhead	Dooling	Kahn	Sabath
Barkley	Doughton	Kennedy, Iowa	Scully
Bell	Drane	Kiess	Sears
Benson	Eagan	McCulloch	Shreve
Bland, Mo.	Eagle	McFadden	Siegel
Bland, Va.	Ellsworth	McKenzie	Smith, N. Y.
Booher	Esch	Mann, Ill.	Smithwick
Brinson	Garland	Merritt	Steagall
Britten	Garrett	Morin	Stedman
Buchanan	Godwin, N. C.	Nichols, Mich.	Strong, Pa.
Burke	Goodykoontz	O'Connor	Sullivan
Campbell, Pa.	Graham, Pa.	Oliver	Sweet
Caraway	Greene, Vt.	Parker	Ward
Carew	Hamill	Pell	Wason
Carter	Hamilton	Rainey, Ala.	Whaley
Clark, Fla.	Harrison	Rayburn	Williams
Costello	Hayden	Reed, N. Y.	Winslow

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-three Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

TERMINATION OF STATE OF WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 511.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider H. J. Res. 327, being a House joint resolution "terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes." That the House shall meet at 11 o'clock antemeridian on Friday, April 9, 1920. That the House joint resolution shall be read in extenso. That general debate shall continue on said resolution until 5 o'clock postmeridian on Friday, April 9, 1920, the time to be controlled, one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. PORTER, and one-half by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. FLOOD. That at the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the said House joint resolution to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina if we can agree on time for debate on the rule?

Mr. POU. I was hoping the gentleman would be willing to agree to an hour and a quarter on a side. The demand for time on this side is very great.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say that there has been great demand on this side also, but I have been unable to arrange for more than one hour on a side. If that is satisfactory to the gentleman from North Carolina I will ask unanimous consent that the debate on the resolution be limited to one hour on a side.

Mr. POU. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that debate on the rule be limited to one hour on a side, and also ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the rule at the end of the debate.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I should have to object to that, because, unless we can vote down the previous question, it would be impossible to amend the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It would be a waste of time to have a roll call.

Mr. CALDWELL. Under the rule as it is written, if the previous question is considered as ordered, the rule would be adopted and there would be no opportunity to offer an amendment to the resolution except on a motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will say that if we can hold our forces together there will be no opportunity to amend this resolution.

Mr. CALDWELL. I understand; but you may not be able to hold your forces together.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time for debate on the rule be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina, and at the termination of the two hours the previous question may be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Before the gentleman from Kansas begins, will he permit me to put a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. FLOOD. The views of the minority—I do not know what number were printed—has been exhausted, and I ask unanimous consent that there be another print of it—say 2,000 copies.

Mr. SNELL. We would like to have the majority report printed, which has been nearly exhausted.

Mr. WALSH. They will be printed as one document.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that there be printed 2,000 copies of the majority and minority reports. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the reading of the rule makes it perfectly clear what its purpose is. I shall not take the time of the House to repeat its provisions. It is the intention, I am sure, of every Member of the House to get at the questions involved at the very earliest possible moment, so that Members may discuss the merits of the proposition rather than the technicalities that might be involved in the rule.

The resolution declaring that a state of war with Germany no longer exists is opposed by the President and his party friends. Then, he "kept us out of war," now he keeps us in. In considering the questions involved it is proper to say that the resolution does not end the war. It declares the fact that it is already ended. The President with great formality told Congress and all the world on November 11, 1918, that the war with Germany had come to an end. Germany surrendered arms and implements of war and withdrew from the invaded territory she had occupied during the war and retired within her own borders.

Those associated with us in the war have long since agreed with Germany upon a treaty of peace and have resumed trade relations with the German people. Our own people are trading with our former foes, though the President has not yet, with the advice and consent of the Senate, arrived at a treaty of peace. A year and a half have passed since the armistice terminating the war was agreed to. The question therefore as to whether it is advisable for Congress to declare that a state of war no longer exists, when reduced to simple common sense, admits of but one answer. The war is over and Congress should make formal declaration of that fact.

What is there that is subtle or mysterious in the situation? The President and others who object to the resolution give no reason that appeals to the judgment and common sense of the American people for the position they take. Can the President hold, in the face of all the facts, including the fact that all the former foes of Germany have resumed trade relations with their former enemy, that a state of war still exists? If so, it is not only the President's right, but it is his duty to interrupt the trade not only of our own people, but the trade and commerce of the people of all other nations with Germany. If we are still at war with Germany, our own citizens and our former allies are giving aid and comfort to the enemy. No suggestion has come from the President that trade with Germany by any nation or people should not continue. The knowledge, common to all, of these undisputed facts make it so clear that a state of war no longer exists that it scarcely leaves a question even for academic discussion. The effect of the resolution declaring the fact that a state of war no longer exists will be to clear up that shadowy question.

Our rights under the conditions of the armistice are continued under the terms of the resolution, and Congress is exercising its power over foreign commerce by declaring the conditions of reciprocal trade relations with Germany. The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, may negotiate and conclude a treaty with Germany at any time. The questions arising out of the causes of the war and growing out of the war which affect the Government and people of the United States are neither forfeited, laid aside, nor abandoned. They are left for settlement by the terms of a treaty to be negotiated in the future. This may be done before the 4th of March next year. If not, it will be done after the 4th of March next year. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the meantime we have grave domestic questions of the greatest importance that make the proposed action not only advisable but imperative.

But the President and his party adherents say the resolution formally declaring that a state of war does not now exist with Germany is an encroachment upon Executive functions. By what process of reasoning does the President or anyone else arrive at such a conclusion? The Constitution nowhere prescribes the method by which war may be terminated or a declaration be made that a state of war no longer exists. On April 6, 1917, Congress declared that a state of war existed between the Imperial German Government and the United States. The war has long since ended. American sons on land and sea, in the air and under seas, so acquitted themselves as to bring victory to American and allied arms. Our boys added imperishable glory to the valor of American citizens bearing arms.

The war is over. That fact is known of all men. Congress, therefore, is within its rights in formally declaring that a state of war no longer exists. It is the duty of Congress to withdraw from the President the powers granted to him for war purposes. [Applause on the Republican side.] We take no powers from him that belong to him in time of peace. Does the President or the Secretary of State or any of the President's supporters contend or assume that in negotiating a treaty with Germany the President has a constitutional right to have at his instant command the armed and naval forces of the United States? Does the President have in mind that in such negotiations he may resort to force if perchance Germany should hesitate or refuse to agree to the terms on which he insists? That would be a monstrous perversion of the treaty-making powers of the President and an assumption of the powers of Congress. In the event of failure in diplomatic negotiations it is for Congress to declare whether or not there shall be a resort to the arbitrament of arms. It is the duty of the President to send to the round table men fortified by ability and experience in diplomatic negotiations, not by armed forces.

Besides, an examination of the terms of the treaty which the President heretofore submitted to the Senate and which was by that body rejected does not justify the assumption that he contemplates such reparations and indemnities for the United States from Germany as would justify the American people in resorting to force of arms even in the event they were refused. At Versailles the President sought and secured obligations for the people of the United States rather than reparations and indemnities. [Applause on the Republican side.] So the denial by Germany of anything for which the President has contended since the day of the armistice in 1918 would not justify the American people in resorting to war. No one has suggested a possible justification or excuse for resuming a state of war with Germany or for continuing war powers in the President. He is left with the utmost freedom to negotiate a treaty, with the advice and consent of the Senate, as provided by the plain terms of the Constitution. It does not now fall to the President's lot nor is it incumbent upon him as a duty to negotiate a treaty ending the war, but rather a treaty under which the United States shall resume the normal conditions of peace with the Government and people of Germany after the war. The war is over, as the President solemnly declared a year and a half ago, and Congress is in the rightful exercise of its authority in declaring a state of war no longer exists. The resolution should be agreed to by Congress.

We may then terminate the war powers of the President and restore normal constitutional government to the people of the United States. The people are wearied by a year and a half of life under an Executive with war powers in time of peace. They long for the freedom of a Government with three separate and independent branches. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Autocratic war powers are galling to a free people in time of peace. Labor, industry, business, and commerce are all impatient to resume a status under the laws and conditions that pertain to peace. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to discuss the pending rule without including in such discussion the so-called peace resolution. If the House has authority under the Constitution to deal with the question of agreeing upon terms of peace with Germany, then the so-called peace resolution is of supreme importance. However that may be, the majority of the Committee on Rules decided to take no chances. If you adopt the special rule, no amendment of any kind will be in order. So once again we are back to the old order of things.

One motion to recommit; one motion only will be in order. What a peculiar spectacle is therefore presented. For two days the so-called peace humbug will be debated. Not a line can be changed. Not an "i" dotted or a "t" crossed. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am not surprised that the Republican side of the aisle, from which there was so much opposition to the war, should applaud again when you are playing Germany's game, for that is what you are doing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] After all, you are proposing to enter into a treaty agreement with Germany, but you must take the so-called peace resolution in its entirety, no matter what your views may be. This situation, Mr. Speaker, would be humiliating to the Members of this House if we did not remember that all legislation is subject to the control of four members of the Republican steering committee. When one remembers this, he is hardly surprised at anything that is done.

The so-called peace resolution is carefully safeguarded in the pending rule against any possible amendment. The minority members of the Committee on Rules offered a substitute for the special rule, wherein it was provided that after 10 hours of general debate the so-called peace resolution would be considered under the general rules of the House. We could see no good reason why all amendments should be cut off, but, of course, we did not prevail with the majority of the Committee on Rules. Therefore the House must accept the resolution in toto or reject it. This is typical of the autocracy which has ruled this House since the day it was organized for business. Perhaps it makes little difference, after all, Mr. Speaker, whether the so-called peace resolution is or is not amended, for this House has no more power to propose peace with Germany than any other body of 435 Americans. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When the Constitution was framed the power to negotiate peace was left to the President and the Senate. The Constitution is plain. We have no authority. If anything is accomplished, it will not be affected one way or the other by any action taken by the House of Representatives. We have no more authority in the premises than the board of aldermen of the town of Smithfield, in which I live. If I believed, Mr. Speaker, this resolution would bring peace—honorable to America—God knows I would vote for it, for there is no man living who more earnestly yearns for peace than I.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the controversy? Why is it so difficult to bring back longed-for, prayed-for peace? Let us for a moment consider what has taken place. The war ended in a blaze of glory for America. Thrilled by the immortal messages of President Wilson, our boys astonished the world and brought the war to an end fully a year sooner than anybody supposed possible. Proud, indeed, was the place then occupied by America. A great, unselfish Nation, under the leadership of a great, unselfish President, had attained a position absolutely unique and without parallel in the history of the world. Statesmen of all nations believed that militarism and autocracy had received their death blow.

At length the time came to build a treaty of peace. True to her best traditions, America was asking nothing for herself from the council of the nations soon to be convened at Versailles. But there was one hope in the heart and mind of every American: It was the hope that the treaty would be so framed as to make another world war impossible. From every stricken home that prayer went up to the God of nations. Good men prayed to God to help President Wilson win out in his fight for a League of Nations. In every stricken home fathers and mothers said, "We can stand our sorrow a little better if the great men in council at Versailles do all in their power to make another war impossible." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

President Wilson won his great fight; and, whatever you Republicans may think, that alone would entitle him to immortality. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For the first time in the history of the world it looked as if an agency was about to bet set up which would substitute reason for brute force. Mr. Wilson brought back the first draft of the treaty. It was criticized. He took into account the criticisms made, returned to Versailles, and had changes made which seemed to answer every reasonable objection of those who favored the setting up of a League of Nations. He returned to America and submitted the work of the council of Versailles to the Senate.

What was the result? During every hour of the long debate in the Senate more than two-thirds of that body favored the essential provisions of the treaty. The fight raged around the League of Nations, and more than two-thirds of the Senate wanted a League of Nations. The only living ex-President stood for a League of Nations. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The candidate of the Republican Party who opposed Mr. Wilson stood for a League of Nations. But it was impossible to agree, and the result is this humbug which is to be presented to the House. This anomaly in treaty making, this bastard resolution [applause on the Democratic side], is the result presented here to a body which has no jurisdiction at all under the Constitution—a body as utterly powerless as any other set of men. Yet we are asked to initiate a treaty-making process with Germany.

What is the purpose of this so-called peace resolution? I do not believe there are a half a dozen men in this body who believe that anything is going to come of the resolution. It was introduced for the purpose of embarrassing President Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It was introduced for the purpose of making political capital to be used in the next campaign. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is hoped to use it as the excuse for broken pledges. It was framed and introduced not in good faith but for the purpose of enabling somebody to go before the people and say, "We tried to get peace with Germany. We introduced a peace resolution. The House of Representatives passed it; President Wilson vetoed it. The blame is therefore upon President Wilson." And any man who makes that argument before the American people will know that he is perpetrating a lie. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Nevertheless the purpose of this resolution is to enable somebody to build up a fictitious argument whereby the Republican Party hopes to ride into power in the coming campaign. If you wish to do something practical why do you not repeal some of the statutes made necessary by the war? Why not repeal some of the legislation you yourselves so bitterly denounced? Why not begin now and pass some of that constructive legislation you talked about so much in your campaign? Why do nothing but attack the President? What has he done to justify any of the assaults that are constantly being made upon him? In all his course of action he has been a typical American. He had no selfish ambition. He was not striving to accomplish something to the detriment of somebody else. He believed that a stricken world longed for peace. He believed that the people of America wanted a tribunal established which would substitute reason for force. This is his offense—his only offense. An effort to make war impossible—an effort to set up an agency which will forever render it impossible for any set of men without any warning whatever to embroil the world in another war. And yet he is charged with plotting and designing with somebody to set up a tribunal which will send American boys across the water to their death. This, Mr. Speaker, is just such a lie as was uttered when it was stated immediately before the McLemore resolution was considered by this House that President Wilson actually wanted war with Germany. He has done nothing selfish, but he led America to heights to which she had never attained before. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Splendid as her traditions are; unselfish as she has always been; high and lofty the purpose which she has always cherished, never in her history had she attained such splendid heights as were reached under the leadership of this immortal American. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why this turning away now from the splendid ideals for which the boys fought? There can be but one answer. The President must be discredited in the eyes of the world if the Republican Party is to win another victory. You saw him at once step into the leadership of the world. You heard the great men of Europe cheerfully acknowledge his leadership. You saw him held up as the apostle of democracy and peace. You knew that it was a title which was rightfully his. Point out one single act in his career from the day he took the oath as President down to this good hour of which America may not be justly proud. Recount the splendid things he has done. Measure after measure, so righteous, so just, so necessary that it was impossible to hold organized opposition against their passage. That is the record of this man. You feared that his leadership had become so powerful your party would be permanently displaced from power. Shame upon the men who have engaged in the plot to discredit this great world leader. The damnation of history will be upon you, and in my humble judgment your damnation by the American people is very near at hand. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, we do not linger long upon the stage of action. It may be that in the years to come some descendant who bears my name will read of the things we do here and now. I put in the RECORD my protest against the assaults which have been made and are being made upon this great American in the White House. I put in the RECORD here and now the pride that I feel in following his leadership. I put in the RECORD my condemnation of the plot to discredit him. And this miserable makeshift resolution which you are going to pass to-morrow is but a part of that plot. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

One other thing I put in the RECORD also. It is this plea: The men who conscientiously favor the establishment of a League of Nations whereby reason may be substituted for force ought to be able to get together. The men who would stop the building of great navies, who oppose great standing armies, necessary only when men are killing each other; the men who love peace and are willing to accept the principles laid down by the Prince of Peace Himself—these men, in the providence of God, ought to be able to get together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For my part, I declare here and now I would walk out of my party to-morrow if I thought it stood against the principles I have just enunciated.

Suppose Germany refuses to accept the conditions set forth in your resolution, what will you do about it? Go to war again? That is your only recourse, unless you appeal to the League of Nations—the only hope for peace in the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me say this in conclusion: If our Republican friends wish to do something practical, why does not your steering committee direct that bills be reported simply repealing some of the burdensome laws made necessary by this war? You promised constructive legislation during your campaign. Constructive legislation—save the mark! The sum total of your record is the defeat of the treaty and this miserable makeshift resolution. All the while business is staggering to hold up under the burden of war-time legislation.

I say here and now that a more incompetent Congress than this never assembled under the dome of this Capitol. You have talked and talked, and killed time, and done nothing but defeat the treaty and play politics. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And what is the position of America to-day with respect to the treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations? That treaty has been ratified by nearly all of the nations of the earth. The League of Nations is an accomplished fact. It is organized ready for the great work it was brought into being to perform—the work of preventing war, the duty of restraining men from killing each other. The question is not whether the League of Nations shall be set up, but whether America shall become a party to an agreement to substitute reason for brute force.

Mr. Speaker, I hang my head in shame when I contemplate the position now occupied by America. Where do we stand, with the great democracies of the world? With England, with France and Italy, with heroic Belgium, with our neighbors in South America? Oh, no; we stand no longer with our allies; we stand with Germany and Russia and China. And all this is the work of this Republican Congress. While other nations have agreed to submit their differences to the League of Nations, America stands off in company with Germany and Russia and China. And she stands there because this Republican Congress would not permit her to stand anywhere else.

And all the while the people are burdened with war taxes, and these taxes can never be reduced unless we enter the League of Nations. Do not forget that. We may as well speak plainly; we have now come to the parting of the ways; we must choose our associates; we can not stand forever alone. We must become a member of the League of Nations or continue to tax the people to build a still greater Navy and maintain a still greater Army. A great Navy and a great Army will always be necessary unless we resolve with the other democracies of the world to submit our differences to the League of Nations.

I thank God my party has always stood for a small Army. With perfect confidence we submit the work of Mr. Wilson to the American people. God help us if they repudiate his earnest, unselfish efforts to make war impossible. That and that alone has been and is his purpose. [Loud applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, no rule has been presented to this House during this session of Congress that is so thoroughly in accord with the wish, desire, and demand of the American people as the one that is now before you for consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.] This rule provides for the regular and orderly consideration of House joint resolution 327, and I desire to consider briefly each section of the resolution, so that there can be no misunderstanding as to what we are trying to do at this time and what kind of legislation this rule proposes to make in order.

Section 1 simply declares—

> That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

This resolution is predicated absolutely on information formally given to Congress by the President about 17 months ago, when he said:

> The war thus comes to an end, for having accepted these terms of the armistice it will be impossible for the German command to renew it.

I understand the opinion of the minority of this House is that the statement made by the President of the United States that the war now comes to an end does not mean anything. Let me tell you that, if I understand the English language, it does mean something. Let me tell you something further, that the day he made that announcement to the people of the United States it meant something to them; it meant that the war was over. Furthermore, it meant something to him at that time, because if you follow up and read the balance of the sentence you will see that he says "because it is impossible for the German command to renew it," and it is absolute folly, and everybody knows it, to say at this late day that it did not mean anything. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Furthermore, every man, woman, and child knows the war is over, knows that hostilities have ceased, knows that we have brought home and disbanded our armies and navies, and also knows there is no desire or attempt on the part of anyone to renew these hostilities. With such a condition confronting us and the usual and normal treaty-making bodies having failed of accomplishment, it is plainly the duty of Congress to declare officially that this state of war is at an end. [Applause on the Republican side.] Or, in other words, this is simply an official recognition of a condition that already exists, and is done in the normal, logical way and in no way interferes with or encroaches upon the rights of the treaty-making authorities to conduct such negotiations as they see fit in regard to final treaty.

Section 2 simply provides for an official date for the termination of the present state of war for the purpose of terminating various emergency acts of Congress, joint resolutions and proclamations by the President, which are absolutely dependent on the date of the termination of the present emergency. This resolution proposes that in lieu of a date fixed by presidential proclamation we shall have the date when this resolution becomes operative as the official date of the termination of the war, but otherwise it has no effect on existing laws different from a proclamation by the President or the final ratification of the treaty in the usual way.

As you all know, we have some emergency legislation for merely the period of the war. Other laws that continue for various periods after the war, among them the maintenance of the Shipping Board, War Risk Insurance Bureau, food and fuel control under the Lever Act, employment bureaus, authorization of foreign loans, espionage law, War Finance Corporation, trading-with-the-enemy act, Overman Act, and countless numbers of boards, bureaus, and commissions created under these acts that can not be done away with, expenses that can not be stopped, until we have an official date for the ending of this state of war. That is done by section 2 of this resolution. And, above all, it is a definite step toward ending extravagant war-time expenditures for things no longer needed and to-day are a useless burden on an overtaxed people.

Section 3 deals entirely with foreign trade and commerce and a resumption of trade relations with Germany, matters that have always been entirely under the control of Congress and never before have been disputed. It is plain legislation based upon facts to be ascertained by the President. It has ample precedent, and we know that the wording of the section follows closely a Supreme Court decision on a similar matter, and its legality and constitutionality can not be successfully assailed. This section provides for an immediate resumption of trade and business between Germany and the United States under the same conditions and on same basis as our allies are now trading with them for a period of 45 days. But if during that period Germany does not notify the President of the United States that it has also declared a termination of the war with us and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals all claims and demands against the United States or our people that they would not have a right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, then the President shall so proclaim the fact and further commercial intercourse shall be prohibited except as at present on a special permit granted by the President. Or, in other words, this section puts us immediately on the same commercial basis as England, France, and Italy are under the treaty of Versailles. The legitimate business of the country will have just so many more war-time restrictions removed and once more may proceed to handle all foreign trade under the orderly peace-time conditions that prevailed before the war. And this is one thing above all others that the American people are clamoring for at the present time—"the removal of war-time restrictions on business." [Applause on the Republican side.]

I was told only yesterday that there are many chemicals and supplies of special manufacture that are sorely needed in this country which are for sale cheap in Germany, but on account of the state of war still existing we can not buy them direct, but England is buying them and reselling the same things to us at an enormous profit.

Section 4 simply provides for the enforcement of the act.

Section 5 amply provides for and protects all the property rights, privileges, and advantages to which the United States has become entitled to under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, or that we are in any way entitled to by reason of our participation in the war. We give up nothing and maintain our rights in every particular, under this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, this is the most important piece of constructive legislation presented to this House during this session. It is a business proposition from start to finish. It is what the people of this country want, and in the minutest detail protects every constitutional and property right at home and abroad.

Every man in this House knows in his own heart this is the proper thing to do at this time, and if it was not for outside political reasons there would not be one vote in this House against this rule or this resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is certainly most amusing to find the political party that came into power on the slimsy pretext that "he kept us out of war" to-day almost unanimously opposing this resolution and trying to keep us out of peace. If there is any criticism at all it will be because Congress has not been more alert and presented a similar proposition many months sooner. Seventeen months have passed since the signing of the armistice, and we are still suspended in the air. And if present conditions continue, and if some definite action is not taken soon, we will lose here in Washington the fruits of the victory that were so gloriously won by our boys in France. It is up to us now to act and to act promptly. Let us adopt this rule and this resolution by the same overwhelming vote that declared a state of war to exist three years ago now, declare that it no longer exists, and show the people at home and abroad that we are going to prepare for peace with the same vigor as we prosecuted the war, and as far as we are concerned, and it is in our power, we stand for an immediate and effective peace. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has used 22 minutes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, those of us on this side, of course, realize that the ways are greased for the passage of this resolution through the House to-day and for the adoption of this rule. However, there is a grave responsibility resting upon the minority of this House here to-day and that is to expose to the American people the fact that this great House has become so reactionary that it has gone back to the old days of the gag rule, and comes in here with a rule to-day that absolutely denies to the House of Representatives the right to voice its opinion on this great subject which is now before the House. We realize that fully. We realize furthermore that it is the purpose of the majority side of this House to bring in this resolution, as has been so clearly pointed out by my colleague, Mr. POU, to embarrass the President of the United States and to lay the foundation for another plank in the Republican platform to undertake to fool the people at the polls in November. I had sincerely hoped that the House of Representatives would have been spared the odium in the public mind which now rests upon another legislative body in this Nation because after eight months of long debate they have not been able, because of their incompetency, because of their personal hatred of President Wilson, to ratify the treaty of peace and put us back upon a peace basis. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I had sincerely hoped that the House of Representatives would maintain its standing before the American people and not be placed in the same category as another legislative body in this country is in the eyes of public opinion. But it seems that our Republican friends who are in control and who are manipulating this program here to-day are determined that the House of Representatives shall have a say in this matter; although the Constitution gives the House no voice in it, they are determined to pull off this game of camouflage to-day and undertake to discredit this great body of Representatives of the American people by their action. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So far as I am concerned, speaking as a member of the Committee on Rules and as a member of the minority, we welcome the issue which you gentlemen have presented, and we are more than willing to go before the great bar of public opinion in November on the question which you have raised here to-day. Now, gentlemen, so far as the merits of this resolution are concerned, they will be debated by other Members of the House who are members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is not my purpose as a member of the Committee on Rules to go into that matter, but I do want to emphasize the fact that the great House of Representatives here to-day is afraid under its present leadership to give a chance to Members of this House to go on record on this proposition. This is not the voice of the House of Representatives. This is the voice of the steering committee of the majority side, who have passed the word to the majority members of the Rules Committee to bring in this old gag rule, which absolutely denies not only to the minority but denies to the members of the majority the right to offer amendments and express their own views on this proposition.

You have gone back into the old reactionary days, afraid to trust the Representatives of the American people on a great issue like this. Now, gentlemen, I want to call the attention of the country and of this House to the attitude of the majority Members of this House toward the President of the United States. My colleague, Mr. POU, went into detail and showed the purpose of the majority side is to embarrass the President in his relations with the other great nations of the world at this time, the most critical in the history of the world. They are not only trying to embarrass him, but it is a personal hatred on the majority side against the President, and they never let slip an opportunity in order to criticize him and in order to denounce him and in order to humiliate him before the eyes of the world. And here day before yesterday an opportunity came, and it is in the RECORD where every American citizen can see it, which expresses the real attitude of the majority Members of this Congress toward the President of the United States. A distinguished Republican of this House, in making a speech, undertook to ridicule the President of the United States. He undertook to denounce him when the President was doing what he thought was his full duty in undertaking to bring this matter to the attention of the American people and was speaking through the Western States, appealing to the citizens of that section of our Nation, and in ridiculing the President that distinguished gentleman said—and here is the RECORD—that while he was doing this that he was "taken sick," and immediately after those words in the RECORD are the words "Applause on the Republican side."

Ah, gentlemen, has the great Republican Party of this Nation come to that? I do not believe the people out in the country are that way. I am speaking of the Representatives here on the floor. Great God, gentlemen, think of it! That the Representatives of the Republican Party on this floor are cheering and applauding when one of their Members says that the President of this Nation has been stricken and is on his sick bed. I presume had the same gentleman announced that he had been stricken and was now at the point of death, which, thank God, is not true, the RECORD would have shown cheers and prolonged applause on the Republican side.

Ah, I remember a number of years ago that I presided over a Democratic convention in Kentucky when the great McKinley was stricken, and by a unanimous vote that Democratic convention adopted a resolution of sympathy for the stricken President and gave publicity of it to the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, my friends, here on this floor, seeing President Wilson, a Democratic President in the White House, lying upon a bed of illness, when one of the Representatives upon the Republican side mentions the fact that he is sick the Republican side of this House applauds the statement, and there it is in the RECORD for the American people to read.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Give the page.

Mr. CANTRILL. It is in the first column of page 5266 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. What date?

Mr. CANTRILL. April 6. The words used are:

> That is when he got sick. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Ah, my friends, that tells the story, the whole story. It is an effort upon the part of the majority party in this House to discredit the President of the United States. Why are you afraid to trust the people on your side under this rule to offer an amendment? Why, there is not a man in the House but knows that when this resolution goes to the Senate it will be debated for days and for weeks and will be thrown open to amendment in every particular phase of it. Has the majority party in this House sunk to such a low level of intelligence that they are afraid to risk even their own membership to offer an amendment to this resolution, which they say will bring peace to the country? Gentlemen on that side of the House may cry, "Peace, peace," but there is no peace until it is brought about in a constitutional way through the President of the United States, with two-thirds of the Senate concurring, and every sensible man in the United States knows that is true, and every sensible man knows that this rule and this resolution is nothing on earth but the worst type of camouflage to embarrass the President in this critical time in the history of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Ah, my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, said that after the 4th day of March certain things would happen. I have an idea that before the 4th day of March certain things will happen in this country when the people pass upon the great issues which come before them in the November election. [Loud applause.] Why, my good friend from Kansas would undertake to make it appear that after the 4th of March his party will be in power in the Nation, but if he would read, as no doubt he has but fails to say anything about it here, what is going on in the daily newspapers to-day, where one of their candidates now for President says that the other candidate bought and stole the State of Minnesota from him in a primary election, going out with the greatest corruption fund in the history of the party, I can imagine that our Republican friends will have great harmony when they get to that convention and undertake to railroad and run the steam roller over some of these gentlemen who even now are beginning to cry fraud and corruption on the part of the Republican Party in taking delegate votes away from them in their own primary. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ah, gentlemen, there has never been anything like it before in the history of the country. Courts in the country are indicting and convicting men for the corrupt use of money in Republican elections, and yet they undertake to stand up here and make it appear that all is peace and harmony in their ranks, and that they will sweep the country in November. I do not believe it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the utterances of the two Democratic Members, and noting their deep concern and intensity, the only thing appropriate that I can think of just now is, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." [Applause on the Republican side.] And after the ebullitions of political animosity we have just heard I am not surprised at the general exodus on the Democratic side. There has been nothing said by either gentleman about the resolution except generalities, and the unguarded charge that the only purpose of putting an end to the war is purely personal, and has no significance whatever beyond the desire of the majority to do an unkind thing to some man's reputation. I do not care now to discuss the political fortunes of any man. That should be the least of our concern. But the country's interests in peace is commanding and must not be refused on the grounds that some one's reputation may suffer. Such personal misfortune can easily be relieved by the President's willingness to agree with a majority of the Senate and the people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I take it that every Member of the House, Republican and Democrat, is anxious to see the war ended, not only actually, as it has been for the past 17 months, but technically as well, so that all the war legislation that depends upon the technical ending of the war will cease to operate by the terms of the legislation. Members will note that most of the war legislation ends with the ending of the war without further action, and will therefore continue until the war is ended. Those who had suggested before the debate opened that there was no such thing as ending the war without a declaration of peace, through a peace treaty, do not do themselves the greatest credit, because the vast number of wars in history have ended without a formal peace treaty. The peace treaty, it is true, is the general form of ending a war in our country, because of the definition in the Constitution. But as the President, by his own acts, can make war without a declaration, which under the Constitution is made by Congress as the authoritative body to make war, so can peace be reached without the act of the President, even without the act of the Congress. This plan has not been used in our own history, since never before did any Executive create the situation now before us. Technically there would be confusion and doubt if we permitted the present status to continue, for the war legislation would remain with us. The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress is the war-making power; but, gentlemen of this House, the American Navy, under the orders of President Wilson, was landed at Vera Cruz. That was an act of war, and there was a state of war existing between this Nation and Mexico by the act, not of Congress, but of the Executive. [Applause.] The reason we have a declaration of war is not to notify our enemy that we are going to fight but to announce to neutral countries that there is a state of war between these nations and all other countries must respect the rights of belligerents. The laws of nations on matters of war, chiefly in the interest of countries not in war, supply the reason why it has been the common practice in the interest of all countries that, when a state of war exists, Congress will make the proclamation. In the present war Congress did not declare war, but that a state of war exists by the overt acts of Germany. The war was here before the declaration of war, and could not depend upon a declaration.

No man who respects his own opinion would dare say that this country could not be put in war without an act of Congress. It has been done; and no man, it seems to me, in the light of what has taken place in the past history, not of our country but of other countries, as reinforced by the finest opinion yet collected by the greatest international lawyers and authorities upon the relations of nations—no man would say that the only way to end war or to bring peace is by a treaty by the President. That indefensible position would permit our President in spite of the wishes of the Nation to make of himself a dictator in times of peace by refusing to make peace. We would be glad to have the President bring the peace and thus end war-time legislation. This side would be glad to see that, as well as the Democratic side. But in the regular processes, constitutionally considered, the treaty of peace was submitted on the 10th of last September, and after the most exhaustive consideration by that body, on the 19th of November, after contest followed contest, covering more than a score of test votes, each of which showed that the ratifying body by a decisive majority was ready to ratify the treaty and end the war upon conditions to prevent the surrender of American sovereignty and independence, it was defeated by Executive influence. [Applause on the Republican side.] On the 18th of November, the day before the final vote came, which was two and one-half months after the treaty was presented to the Senate, came the Executive order, "Defeat it," and it was defeated. To appeals from treaty friends he replied, "I have no concession in mind." Three months later a second effort was made, when it was taken up again, when all the reservations were again attached by decisive majorities, most of them two to one; the treaty with the reservations were favored, but the necessary two-thirds failing, again came the short statement, "Unacceptable," and the treaty has not been ratified although in every case it was demonstrated that only one obstacle stood in the way.

There has not been a moment since the 1st of October when the war could not have been ended technically, as it has been practically, in 24 hours if the President had been willing to have ended the war. [Applause on the Republican side.] And if my Democratic friends are right, that there is no way to end this war except by the treaty form, coming from the President and ratified by the Senate, then I want to say to the country that there will be no ending of the war [applause on the Republican side] until after the initiation of a treaty shall be placed in some other hands than those of the present President. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, why do I say that? I say that because the President announced, after he had received an official statement signed by 39 Members of the Senate, 7 more than enough to defeat it, to the effect that the treaty in the present form, with the League of Nations as written, could not be passed, "When the treaty comes back, gentlemen on this side will find the covenant not only in it but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure." I quote his exact language.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will not. That treaty came back and in spite of the wish of the other American and European commissioners to separate them for the sake of peace the league was intertwined 79 different times with the treaty by actual count. In other words, the threat was fulfilled. You can not, as I see it, separate them. That means that to end the war you must either ratify the treaty with the protection of America safeguarded by reservations adopted by decisive majorities or ratify it without providing that safeguard which has never received but a small minority of the Senate, one of the two.

The President says you must ratify it without change. Reservationists are nullifiers, including the mild reservationists. His position can not be accepted, and will not, by the American people, because on September 6 he made the remarkable statement in Kansas City, Mo., that his "cause"—that is, the league—was more important than the Government of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. FESS. Can I have one minute more?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. FESS. I accept the situation that you can not end the war, if the only way to end it is by the treaty method, until after the 4th of March. The President will not let loose his hold on the war measures until he has his way. The Senate will not, and should not, allow a surrender of our sovereignty. I say that the American people demand the ending of the war, but they will not surrender our independence. That means a deadlock only to be ended by this resolution. [Applause on the Republican side.] The President, refusing to end the war upon the basis of protecting America, continues to exercise war powers over laws dependent upon the continuance of war—not only to continue, in my judgment, his war powers, but, as Members will recall, he is asking this Congress not only to continue these war powers but to enlarge them. The one supreme demand of the country is peace, that we may speedily return to normal again. I as one Member of this House will vote to stop the war-time legislation in peace times, and the way to do it is now to make peace by this Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the rule. It is sufficient to say, regarding the rule, that it proposes to make in order legislation of which this House has not jurisdiction, legislation which is intended as a substitute for the ratification of a treaty in the constitutional way which has been entered into by the President, and as a subterfuge intended to deceive the American people and to invoke a partisan spirit.

Section 2 of the resolution in effect is intended to bring to an end certain war legislation. Gentlemen of the majority of this House know full well, and the country knows, that they have had the power at any time during this session, if you please, to introduce and pass bills repealing or limiting any one of these pieces of war legislation; so that there is no necessity for the passage of this resolution for that purpose, nor is it the orderly way of bringing this war legislation to an end.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, this resolution is an indirect attempt to ratify in part the treaty of Versailles. Section 3 attempts to coerce the German Government, by penalizing them if they do accept all the terms of the treaty of Versailles which bind them. That proposition is so clear that there should be no hesitation in declaring that it is the purpose of this resolution so to ratify in part. It does not attempt to ratify that part of the treaty which binds the United States, but it does attempt to give us all the benefits of the armistice of November 11, 1918. It omits, however, the covenant of the League of Nations. To destroy the league is one of the chief purposes of the majority in this House, as it was of the majority which controls another body.

I am proud to proclaim my individual opinion that the covenant of the League of Nations, as negotiated and made a part of this treaty, constitutes the greatest advance in civilization in more than a century; and the President, who was in large degree responsible for it, whose genius for statesmanship, whose great personality only made it possible, has translated the dreams of righteous men and women for a thousand years into a workable plan for the maintenance and preservation of universal peace.

What has been the nature of the opposition to this treaty? It has been intensely partisan. It is one of the unfortunate features in the consideration of this resolution that evidences abound on every side that the majority in this House are considering it in a partisan spirit. The opposition to the covenant of the League of Nations which gentlemen have said has been intertwined in this treaty has come from two sources. There are those who oppose it outright—irreconcilables they have been termed—men who stand up in the open and declare that under no circumstances do they favor an association of the civilized nations of the world with the United States to maintain peace. There is another class who, while openly professing to favor a league of nations, yet by intrigue, by astute manipulation of language, give the falsehood to their profession, and have thrust the stilleto into the heart of the league with a view of destroying it and disparaging the President who brought it before them. As between the two classes of opponents, the open, outright enemy, and the enemy who, under the guise of favoring the league, seeks means to destroy it, I prefer the open rather than the deceitful enemy.

Partisanship, Mr. Speaker, may temporarily thwart the realization of this ideal for international righteousness and peace, but it will appear again either under President Wilson or some later Executive, and the United States will assume her proper place among the nations of the world.

There has been a willful and persistent propaganda proceeding for months to disparage the President of the United States. Gentlemen know this is true. Gentlemen know that such a propaganda was organized. Gentlemen know that its mailing list comprises every city and hamlet in the United States, to which are constantly mailed veiled attacks upon the President, under various guises but intended nevertheless to destroy him. Why destroy and disparage our President? Because the Republican Party in the United States, upon his triumphal return to this country after the negotiation of this treaty, saw that he was regarded among the civilized peoples of the world as the most momentous figure in current history. Looking ahead, they dreaded his influence and his power with the American people, and they determined deliberately, in so far as they could, to destroy that great influence and prestige.

Gentlemen may as well understand that they can not destroy character, idealism, vision, particularly of the kind which seeks to make for peace, and so far as humanly possible to avoid war, and that it will continue to live and live forever, and that around that vision will be entwined in all history the immortal name of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Has the gentleman any more time?

Mr. POU. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina five minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. There have been other Presidents maligned. The great Washington had his traducers. Jefferson, the tribune of the people, who spoke for popular rights, had his enemies. John Adams and the other great men who have served the American people were slandered by men of their times.

I had occasion recently to visit the library and to read for nearly a day current newspapers of the last year of the administration of Abraham Lincoln. I have never seen in any current press of the day more vicious, indefensible denunciation and characterization of any man than appeared concerning that great man at that time. Yet to-day the gentle spirit, the magnanimity, the modesty, the courage, and the patriotism of Abraham Lincoln are a part of our common heritage North and South. [Applause.] And when the history of this present administration comes to be written there will be found more constructive legislation than perhaps in any administration of the country, unless it be that of Thomas Jefferson. In most of that legislation Republicans joined with what was then the Democratic majority in this body to enact it into law. In fact, you seek to justify this resolution here by citing an alleged declaration of the President to the effect that the war had ended. Great pity it is that the Republican majority should not only seek to cite and follow the declarations of the President when it suits their purposes, great pity it is that while you followed him in the various pieces of constructive legislation which he recommended during the past three Congresses, you do not continue to follow him in this Congress, but have permitted the heat of party passion, the desire for party success, to induce you to leave the ways that have illustrated the best that is in your party when you were followers in that respect of Woodrow Wilson, and for the sake of selfish, partisan success have in this Congress attempted to destroy him.

Mr. Speaker, a partisan majority may pass this resolution. The other body by a bare majority may pass it. But not only is it without warrant under the Constitution, but it will not, as it is intended to do, deceive the American people. Partisan spirit may ebb and flow, but in the end the American people will do the righteous thing and approve the essential features of this treaty, including the covenant of the League of Nations. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Dr. TEMPLE. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, the plain fact is that the war is over in every sense except that which is purely technical and legal. The passage of this resolution will be a mere declaration of the truth, and will make the technical state of affairs correspond to the facts. That is its purpose, and it has no other purpose.

Gentlemen on the other side say that we have no constitutional power to recognize an existing fact. They have said repeatedly to-day that the war can not end except by the ratification of a treaty of peace, and that Congress has no constitutional authority to recognize any other termination. I wish to point out a provision in the act known as the trading with the enemy act, approved October 6, 1917. I read from the United States Statutes at Large, volume 40, page 412.

The words "end of the war," as used herein, shall be deemed to mean the date of proclamation of exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace, unless the President shall, by proclamation, declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the end of the war within the meaning of this act.

[Applause.]

Gentlemen say the war can not end until the ratifications are exchanged and proclamation of that fact made by the President. But by this act, passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress, in which the Democratic Party were in the majority, these words were enacted into law. You voted for that act and I voted for it. The majority of the Members on the Republican side, almost all of them in fact, voted for it. We declared that the date of the end of the war should be the date of the President's proclamation announcing the ratification of the treaty of peace—unless the President should by proclamation announce a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the end of the war within the meaning of this act.

Now, what we had the right then to authorize the President to do we have the right now to take up ourselves. We have the right to repeal that authorization and to fix some other mode of determining the date which shall be the end of the war within the meaning of that act and of all other war legislation. The President's authority to announce a prior date is an authority conferred upon him by act of Congress. We may repeal that provision in the act and ourselves assert the right to name a prior date. We could not have conferred on him a right that we did not ourselves possess. [Applause.]

Gentlemen have told us that this resolution is intended to dispose of the pending treaty in the Senate, and that support of it is an evidence of partisanship. I should like once more to put on record the facts concerning the last vote that was taken in the Senate on the question of ratifying the treaty.

On that vote there were, including the pairs, by which Members announced their position on the question, 34 Republicans who were in favor of ratification and 23 Democrats. Against ratification there were 15 Republicans and 24 Democrats. The majority of the Republicans, more than 2 to 1, voted for ratification with the reservations which had been adopted by the majority of the Senate, and it was the votes of the 23 Democrats, added to the votes of 15 Republicans, that prevented ratification. At any rate, the passage of this act will in no way affect that treaty. It has been sent back to the President with a notification that the Senate has rejected it.

It must not be supposed, however, that such action by the Senate is necessarily a final disposition of a treaty. The history of the treaty for international protection of industrial property is somewhat unusual, but it plainly shows what has happened, and what may happen again, to a treaty rejected by the Senate. The treaty referred to was signed at Paris March 20, 1883, by representatives of the United States and other powers, great and small. It was not until June 12, 1884, more than a year after the date of its signature, that the Senate unanimously voted against its ratification. Nearly two years afterwards, on February 2, 1885, President Arthur sent the treaty back to the Senate with a message recommending reconsideration. Two years more went by, but at last, four years after the negotiation and signature of the treaty, on March 2, 1887, the Senate advised and consented to its ratification.

Now, if there should be a like state of affairs, even for a much shorter time, in regard to the present treaty, on what basis are we to live and do business until the treaty question is finally disposed of? The passage of this resolution will not affect the future of the treaty at all, if it has a future, nor will it interfere in any way with the negotiation of another treaty, if such a course should become necessary. It will simply give us a modus vivendi in the meantime.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. No; I have not the time. Gentlemen have said that we ought to repeal all war legislation and put the country on a peace basis. I wonder if the gentlemen have examined the war legislation. I have looked at 61 different acts of emergency legislation passed for the purposes of this war only. Thirty are to come to an end on the proclamation of the treaty of peace. Thirty-one are to come to an end at different periods—3 months, 6 months, 18 months, 3 years, 5 years, and in one case 10 years after the ratification of peace. The one that makes certain arrangements continuing for 10 years after the ratification of peace provided, however, that the corporation created by the act should take up no new business six months after the date of the ratification. If we should go over these acts one by one and repeal them, or repeal those parts which are not intended to remain in force after the end of the war, and retain those provisions which must remain in force after the war, it would be more than a full session's work for the Congress.

In addition to this there are permanent acts that provide special powers for the President under special conditions in time of war. Nobody wants to repeal the permanent legislation, but if we provide now that for the purpose of interpreting any act of Congress, whether permanent or emergency legislation, which contains provisions contingent upon the termination of the war, the date of the approval of this legislation shall be considered the date of the termination of the war, every one of these acts will operate just exactly as if the treaty had been ratified and the President's proclamation had been made. Those that were to operate only during the war will cease; those that were to continue for three or six or eight months or longer after the cessation of the war will operate as they were intended to operate. We merely substitute one date for the other; we merely assert and act upon a right which Democrats and Republicans alike asserted in passing the act of October 6, 1917, in which we authorized the President to fix the termination of the war at a date prior to the ratification of the treaty of peace. We repeal that provision and ourselves fix a date prior to the ratification of any treaty.

I do not think that any argument can support the statement that we have no right to repeal that provision of the act of October 6, 1917, and to fix another prior date, when we had the right to give the President authority to fix the termination of the war at a date prior to the ratification of the treaty. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina has 8 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas 17 minutes.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who have or may speak upon this matter have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD, on both the rule and the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, why not give every Member of Congress an equal right on that proposition? The great majority of us are cut off by the rule, and certainly all Members should have an equal right.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend remarks on this rule and resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days to extend their remarks on the rule and the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Reserving the right to object, I shall object unless it is confined to their own remarks, with such quotations as may be necessary.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will accept that modification.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection with the modification? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in any discussion of the rule or the peace resolution we ought first to sweep aside all technicalities and personalities and the question of the constitutionality of the resolution, which has been so ably discussed by the gentleman from Ohio, Dr. FESS. Everyone in this House knows that if this House passes a peace resolution, if it is ratified by the Senate and is signed by the President, and is ratified by Germany, we will be at peace without any further discussion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I have not the time. I would be delighted to yield, but I have little time.

Second, we ought to sweep aside the camouflage of this partisan debate. The House is sick, sore, tired, weary, and disgusted with it, and the people of the country are tired of it, and we ought to approach the discussion without it. We did not indulge in it during the war and we ought not to in discussing this resolution.

Third, whether we happen to like or dislike the President, that question ought not to enter into the debate. We have our own personal views concerning what has been his attitude, but his personality does not enter into the discussion, and we ought to sweep any of those feelings aside.

The peace resolution then resolves itself into three questions:

First, as a matter of fact, is the war over or does it continue? We know that the war is over. If it is, what, if any, is the objection to an announcement of the fact in this House, and in the Senate, and what is the objection to having the President admit it when the matter is presented to him?

Second, are we in favor of war, or peace, and are we in favor of returning to peace-time conditions? If we are in favor of returning to those conditions, and I believe the people of this country want us to return to them, why should not this House and the Senate and the President of the United States say so, without further debate?

Third, the question comes to us, Shall we or shall we not allow one willful man to inflict his sole view of foreign relations, enforced by secret diplomacy, on 120,000,000 free American citizens, or shall we let the majority rule in this House, shall we let it rule in the Senate, and shall we let the people of this country again say what they desire?

Is it possible that the minority in this House will contend that only one man in the United States is competent and able to say what the people want or what the Congress wants? It was ably said by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] the other day that there are more and always will be more than one man who can say what we ought to have or do in the United States. And parenthetically I might say that I, myself, believe it is time the President of the United States did express himself upon the question of the third term, which was so ably discussed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], and also upon the question of exactly what he desires or will accept with respect to the peace treaty.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] stated that two-thirds of the Senate of the United States had always been in favor of the League of Nations. If two-thirds of the Senate were always in favor of the League of Nations, I can not help asking myself the question why it was not ratified. That statement can not concur with the facts, because any time that two-thirds of the Senate of the United States favor that league they will secure it, and they will secure it in the form in which the Senate desires it. I think that the gentleman perhaps forgets that either 21 or 23 Democrats, of the Senate minority, voted against that treaty and against that League of Nations because they wanted it Americanized. The President can secure the League of Nations in the treaty any moment that he will go as far as England is willing to go in securing the Americanization of the league.

Why does the President of the United States take so many inconsistent positions? It is inconceivable to me, and I do not believe that the minority of this House, whom we know desire to state the facts when they can, will agree with me. On page 7607 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 27, 1919, in discussing the prohibition law, we find the President stating as follows:

> I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of the Congress.

Did he not say, then, in effect, that the war was ended? Yet we find on page 7583 of the RECORD of the same date, October 27, 1919, the following statement by the President of the United States:

> The country is confronted with this prospect at a time when the war itself is still a fact, when the world is still in suspense as to negotiations for peace, when our troops are still being transported, and when their means of transport is in urgent need of fuel.

The President has thus taken two absolutely inconsistent positions, and I do not believe the Democratic membership of this House can indorse any man who does such a thing. I know they can not indorse them both. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen of the minority have taken the name and fame of the President of the United States into this discussion.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question, before he proceeds along that line, for information?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Why is it that the resolution desires that a state of war be concluded as respects Germany but not as respects Austria-Hungary? Why want peace with Germany and not with Austria-Hungary?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Senate was offered a treaty by the President terminating the war with Germany, and we are dealing with the status as we find it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman for his answer.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I take it for granted that neither the Rules Committee nor the House has any desire to bring the war to an end by resolution until the opportunity to end it by treaty has been afforded. The President has never presented to the Senate any treaty with Austria.

Mr. MONTAGUE. But the contention of the gentlemen is that they do not need any treaty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further. I was about to say that in so far as this discussion brings in the name and the fame of the President of the United States, it has been brought in by the minority of this House. The majority members of the Committee on Rules did not assail the President. The House of Representatives does not contemplate assailing either his character or his reputation. His reputation has been and is now in his own keeping.

When he went to Europe no man had greater fame than he, and no nation in all the annals of time stood higher in the estimation of the people of the world than did the United States. Both the President and the Republic he represented occupied the highest place in fame that could be attained by any man or any people. The President was received in every land he visited in a manner befitting the reception of an emperor. But the President was ambitious. His ambitions were not satisfied with the Presidency of the United States, and yet the office of President of the United States is the most powerful office in the world. The duties and responsibilities resting upon the President call upon him to make many sacrifices and to forego many pleasures.

He can not gratify his personal wishes nor all his desires for foreign travel. He must lay aside every ambition for applause except by the people of his own country. He must smother every hope for honor beyond the Presidency of the United States. But President Wilson did not observe these limitations.

The President must remain in the country, whose servant he is. He can not freely mingle with the people of other lands without endangering his own prestige and inviting trouble for the Government and people of his own country.

The Presidency carries with it such great power that artful diplomats and international statesmen in other lands should not be tempted to beguile the President with unusual attentions, courtesies, and presents to exercise his power for the welfare of other people than those of the United States.

It is not improper to draw a lesson for future Presidents from the experiences of President Wilson's absence from his own country and seat of government and to call attention to some of the conditions his visit made possible that seriously affect the future of the Republic and the welfare of its people.

On the 1st of December, 1918, the people of the United States were honored and esteemed in every land beneath the sun. Strict adherence to our own business for a century and a third made us powerful as a Nation and independent and free as a people from the vexations and turmoil of European politics.

At the moment when the world needed the help of a great and powerful country the United States offered its manhood to save the world from the brute force of Germany. The soldierly conduct of our boys on land and sea won additional honor and respect for our country from every people who know of their chivalry in the camps and their valor in the field. The American people had a place in the affections of England, France, and Italy, and of all the allied countries, and at the same time commanded the respect of the people of the central powers.

The President's arrival in Europe was marked with the unusual attentions that have ever been given to princes of the royal blood or to emperors with imperial power. In Paris, in London, in Rome, every art of the entertainer was exhausted upon the President.

He approached royal palaces amid the applause of the multitude; he entered royal banquet halls in ancient and regal procession; he was wined and dined in royal state in every capital he entered. He was flattered with every attention that mankind can give to man. He liked it all.

Diplomats and international statesmen constantly attended him and paid him homage. If he had vanity it was encouraged. Nothing that could please him was omitted from the preliminaries that marked his approach to the peace table.

The statesmen of other lands, intent upon the welfare of their own countries, artfully led him to see their countries' needs. He was easily beguiled into assuming the rôle that had been carefully created for him.

Masters in the art of international statesmanship do not always disclose their purposes. The Government and the people of the United States are to pay for all these honors and attentions in the years to come.

The President wanted a League of Nations. It was given to him. Those who sat with him at the peace table wanted to add more territory to their domains; wanted more friendly harbors at the doors of teeming millions at the ends of the paths they controlled on the seas; wanted dominion and control over smaller and weaker nations; wanted indemnity for the losses they sustained in the war; wanted security and prestige for the Government and people for future years; and wanted the United States to share the burden of policing Europe and maintaining the boundaries of their nations, and they got what they wanted.

The peace conference ended a part of its work early in July, 1919, and the President left Europe amid the silence of the multitude and without even the honor of attention from his former flatterers. If Woodrow Wilson only were concerned, the affair might pass without serious comment. But every returned traveler and uncensored report from Europe tells the story of American unpopularity in every country overseas.

The cordial feeling for the Government and people of the United States that formerly existed is wanting now. Civilized and Christian people covet the good opinion of mankind. The President's presence in Europe, his absence from his own country, left the people of the United States without that good opinion.

No country can safely permit its chief executive to intrude himself into the domestic affairs of another country. When the President of the United States in France, in England, and in Italy mistook the royal reception he had received from those in high places and the applause that was given him by the multitude for an invitation to become their political master, he lost his own prestige and that of his country. It will require the work of years to restore the Government and people of the United States to their former cordial and congenial relationship with the other countries of the world with whose people the President came in contact.

When he left Europe he did not leave with the fame he took there with him, and if there is in this country to-day a justification for the President's lack of fame asserted by members of the minority, the President alone is responsible for it. [Applause on Republican side.] The House of Representatives can not tarnish his fame. If his fame does not satisfy his friends or gratify him, it is his fault and not the fault of the House of Representatives. The merits of this resolution should not be connected with the character or reputation of the President of the United States. The people of the country want a solemn declaration that a state of war no longer exists with the Imperial German Government.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 214, nays 155, answered "present" 1, not voting 57, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the provision of the resolution the House will proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 327, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 327, terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States; permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Whereas the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose, it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall willfully violate the foregoing prohibition whenever the same shall be in force shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both, and any property, funds, securities, papers, or other articles or documents, or any vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, concerned in such violation shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER] is recognized.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, the master minds that conceived and adopted the Constitution undoubtedly recognized that the highest degree of efficiency in time of war could best be obtained by making the President Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. This was the policy of the Romans, and their successes in warfare may have influenced the framers of our Constitution in their decision. Justice Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, illustrates the wisdom of such a policy in the following convincing language:

> Of all the cases in the concerns of government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinctly exercise the power by a single hand. Unity of plan, promptitude, activity, and decision are indispensable to success, and this can scarcely exist except where a single magistrate is intrusted exclusively with the power.

In the War of 1812 with England, Congress, in harmony with this policy, vested in President Madison extraordinary war powers, some of which were similar to the existing war measures, and he was enabled thereby to bring the war to a successful conclusion. In the Mexican War, Congress, adhering to this policy, vested similar war powers in President Polk, and that war ended in victory for American arms. In the War between the States, Congress, still adhering to this successful policy, delegated similar powers to President Lincoln, who suppressed the rebellion and preserved the Union, and, lastly, the grant of the same powers to President McKinley effectually terminated the Spanish-American War. Our Republic has never been unsuccessful in war [applause on the Republican side], which is persuasive evidence of the soundness of our war policy and a conclusive argument against any departure therefrom.

Immediately after declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government on April 6, 1917, Congress, recognizing the wisdom of our war policy of the past, enacted many laws, in some instances upon the request of the executive branch of the Government, conferring upon the Chief Executive greater powers than those granted to any of his predecessors. They placed at the disposal of the President every resource of the Nation in men, money, and industry, and the activities of the individual were restricted in every way that would aid in the successful prosecution of the war; in fact, the war legislation was so drastic in character and application that the liberties of the individual were largely abridged. The war was fought to a successful conclusion, and hostilities ceased with the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, and since that time every reasonable person must admit the war is ended and a state of peace exists. Even the President himself admitted the war was ended in an address to Congress on November 11, 1918, when he said:

> * * * The war thus comes to an end * * *. We know only that this tragical war, whose consuming flame swept from one nation to another until all the world was on fire, is at an end. * * *

It is now upward of 17 months since the signing of the armistice. The President still retains all these powers, and refuses to surrender them unless the Senate yields to his arbitrary views as to the terms and the conditions of the treaty of peace. The Senate is without power to negotiate a treaty, the President originating and the Senate having only the negative. The treaty of Versailles, signed on June 28, 1919, has been rejected by the Senate and returned to the President, and no one can predict how long this controversy between the Senate and the President will continue. It is certain to last for many months. The Republic remains legally in a state of war, and the people are still subject to the penalties provided in the trading-with-the-enemy act, the food-control act, the espionage act, and other similarly drastic legislation.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I decline to yield.

President Madison, at the close of the War of 1812; President Polk, at the close of the Mexican War; President McKinley, at the close of the Spanish-American War, promptly annulled their extraordinary war powers by treaties of peace, and President Johnson—Mr. Lincoln's successor—did likewise by congressional enactment and proclamation. Everyone assumed that President Wilson would follow a like policy and exercise the powers vested in him by the act of October 6, 1917, United States Statutes, volume 40, page 413—trading with the enemy—which provides for the termination of that law by the "ratification of a treaty of peace unless the President shall by proclamation declare a prior date, in which case the date so proclaimed shall be deemed to be the end of the war," and thus promptly remove the shadow of this restrictive war legislation from the activities of the American people so that constitutional government could be resumed and prewar conditions reestablished, which the country has been rightfully demanding for many months. [Applause on the Republican side.] The war measures should have been vacated and annulled immediately after it became apparent that the controversy over the ratification of a treaty of peace might be prolonged indefinitely. All of these war powers were intrusted to the President, and his unfortunate and long-continued illness places their enforcement in the hands of subordinates, a result which Congress obviously never intended, and a condition which endangers the constitutional rights and liberties of our people and adds to the imperative necessity for their immediate termination. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The authorities on international law agree that there are three ways of terminating war between belligerent States: First, by a treaty of peace; second, by the conquest and subjugation of one of the belligerents by the other; third, by the mere cessation of hostilities so long continued that it is evident that there is no intention of resuming them.

War may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may (1) abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty, or (2) belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace, or (3) a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary. (Oppenheim, International Law, vol. 2, p. 322.)

There are three ways of terminating hostilities between belligerent States, namely, (1) by a mere cessation of hostilities of both sides without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other, so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace, whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

Under the first mode the relationships between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and owing to the numerous difficulties involved, combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision. (Phillipson, p. 3, Termination of War and Treaties of Peace.)

It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, a situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances. (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, July 22, 1868, Dip. Cor., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32 to 34, cited Moore's International Law, vol. 7, p. 336.)

It is true that the usual and normal method of terminating a war status is by a treaty made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. If this were the only means by which the war could be ended Congress would be powerless to grant relief, but the authorities on international law cited above agree that there are two other ways of terminating war, one of which is the cessation of hostilities for a long period of time without any intention on the part of either of the belligerents to resume them, and the other by conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other.

Mr. Seward said, in one of the cases cited:

What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and it must in every case be determined with reference to the collateral facts and circumstances.

The power to determine this question of fact is undoubtedly in Congress. Now, what are the facts? The armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, and neither of the belligerents has indicated the slightest intention of resuming hostilities; on the contrary, the armies of both sides have been demobilized, commercial relations between the peoples of the United States and Germany have been partially resumed, and all the nations associated with us in the war have formally ended the war by treaty with Germany, and the Imperial German Government has been supplanted by a Republic.

Germany has conceded our demands by the treaty of Versailles, and the only controversy remaining is the one between the Chief Executive and the Senate over the ratification of the treaty. Under this state of facts no reasonable mind can escape the conclusion that the war is long since terminated. It therefore becomes the imperative duty of Congress to declare officially the fact that the war is ended. The Constitution does not withhold from Congress the power to declare war at an end, as it has the power to repeal or amend any of its legislative acts. Neither does the Constitution require that war declared by Congress must be ended by a treaty of peace negotiated by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. This, no doubt, is the customary way of ending a war, but it is not the only way of doing so, and the peace by treaty having failed of accomplishment, such action on the part of Congress is not an infringement of the treaty-making power of the President. Congress, which alone has the power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy and to marshal all the resources of the Nation for the successful prosecution of war, surely has the power to vacate its official acts by declaring the war at an end, and thus fulfill its obligations to the country.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PORTER. I decline to yield. The Constitution contains no such absurd provision that a resolution declaring a state of war and the laws passed in the prosecution of that war are irrepealable, so the power of annulment by Congress follows by necessary implication. If it were otherwise, and these great powers remain in some mysterious way in the hands of the President until a treaty of peace has been made and proclaimed, and there is no other way to end such a state of war except by a treaty of peace, the President could maintain a dictatorship just so long as he is able to hold the presidential office—a condition repugnant to every fundamental principle upon which this Government is founded.

It is an unprecedented situation in the history of our Government, the evil of which necessarily requires an unprecedented remedy. It therefore becomes the plain duty of Congress to exercise its constitutional powers and declare the state of war at an end, and fix a date whereby these laws will automatically terminate according to their own provisions. The passage of this resolution will not disturb in the slightest degree the status of the treaty negotiations.

The President will be as free and untrammeled in the negotiation of the treaty after its passage as before. It simply declares the war to be at an end, fixes a date for the termination of the war legislation, and upon certain conditions permits the resumption of trade with the German people.

America is exclaiming, in the words of Gen. Grant, "Let us have peace." [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, no man in Congress is more desirous of securing peace between the United States and the Central Powers of Europe than I am. No man is more desirous of again establishing unfettered business relations than I. I want again to enjoy with all the people of my country that business and social relation with the peoples of the world which existed so pleasantly before the war.

I can not believe, however, that the joint resolution under discussion will bring that result. It is an attempt to establish by joint resolution peace with Germany without the settlement of the vast questions existing between our country and the German Government. It is an attempt on the part of the Republican Party to curry favor with the citizens of the land by establishing a false peace by resolution and thereby endeavoring to accomplish unconstitutionally what the Republican Senate had a chance to accomplish constitutionally and in accordance with the precedents established and followed during the entire history of our Government, from the time of the adoption of the Constitution to the present day.

The framers of our Constitution were fresh from contact with the inefficiency and lack of cooperation under the Articles of Confederation. They had beheld, as is so often expressed, with their own eyes, the difficulty in negotiating a treaty of peace by the legislative body under the powers conferred. They had in mind the difficulty of a large legislative body performing the task of making peace and negotiating a treaty. They had tried out that system and realized how difficult it was to establish a stable, efficient, and lasting government upon that basis.

When it was therefore proposed in the Constitutional Convention that Congress should "make war," the word "declare" was substituted for the word "make," because it was feared that the word "make" might be construed to give Congress the power to wage war and the conduct thereof. Having in mind the disasters of that experience under the Continental Congress, they had no liking for its continuation. When it was proposed to insert, after the words "declare war," the words "and peace," the amendment was unanimously voted down, in spite of the fact that the Articles of Confederation had invested in Congress the power to determine both peace and war. In his notes recording the proceedings, Mr. Madison says that on August 17, 1787, on the motion for adding "and peace" after "war," it was unanimously negatived, the motion, of course, being to amend the phrase to declare war by adding "and peace," so that, if adopted, the amended clause would read "to declare war and peace."

To-day, after a glorious history of nearly a century and a half, after having conducted many wars and never lost one, after relying solely upon the Executive for the declaration of peace and negotiating treaties, it is proposed by the majority side of this House that we shall wrest from the executive branch the power allotted to it by the Constitution. Peace they would have without a written treaty. How can we have peace without the settlement of existing disputes? How can we accomplish satisfactory business relations without our governmental representatives in Germany? Who is to look out for American interests and business operations? Who is to protect American citizens who visit Germany, believing peace under this resolution to exist?

One man may start a fight, but it takes two to settle it. One nation may declare war, but it takes two to settle the controversy. The only way our country has ever terminated a war with a foreign foe and brought about peace has been by treaty. This method and this alone has ever been adopted by the Government of our country. No one will contend that any other method was ever contemplated under our Constitution, or that it can be successfully employed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No precedent can be found for any different method; certainly none can be found for peace by congressional resolution. We have always left such matters to the Executive under Article II, section 2, of the Constitution, which declares that "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," and so forth. Writers upon international law evidently had no idea of such authority existing in Congress, or else they would have discussed the question. I have been unable to find any authority dealing with it. They mention but three ways to accomplish peace, namely, by conquest, by negotiation, and by abandonment of hostilities.

It may be possible with the approval of the President and the coaction of the other nation to open up trade relations by a joint resolution of this kind through the repeal of emergency legislation which restricts or prohibits trade and all forms of intercourse with the enemy and that which has become unnecessary since hostilities ceased. This the Republican majority has had nearly a year to do and has failed absolutely in its opportunity and duty. Is it safe, however, by one fell swoop to set aside such legislation without careful and minute consideration of each particular measure and without the stipulations of a treaty to assume control? This joint resolution does not settle the great number of questions still pending adjustment. It is likely to become, as has been well said, "peace by lawsuits," similar to that which followed the various proclamations which were issued after the Civil War when the United States courts became clogged with litigation upon questions depending upon the date of the termination of hostilities and establishment of peace.

We lose the innumerable advantages to be acquired under the treaty. It leaves the concourse of personal and national questions in statu quo. It removes none of the irritating and vexatious matters from controversy; it leaves the field wide open for further disagreement, unpleasantness, and a bait, indeed, for further war; it accomplishes nothing further than we now have as to trade relations. Our people are now doing business with Germany under license, and this method can be broadened as circumstances require and advantages permit until the ratification of the treaty. The armistice provides that the United States shall be paid for the expense of the army of occupation, but does not provide the manner of payment. The treaty, which supersedes, provides that the money for this purpose shall be paid to the reparation commission, but if we are not a party to the treaty, and therefore have no representation upon the all-powerful reparation commission, how and in what manner shall this vast expense be paid? The joint resolution fails to specify and can not do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We have taken over German ships located in our ports to the extent of some $25,000,000. Title to them is questioned. Who shall decide, as we are not of the reparation commission, and have no member to protect our interests? Our title is largely subject to their decision. Only the courts in the absence of the treaty can decide. Peace by lawsuits, as I have said. In the meantime they are subject to libel in any neutral port.

Article 231 provides:

The allied and associated Governments affirm and Germany accepts the responsibility of Germany and her allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the allied and associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her allies.

Article 248 provides:

Subject to such exceptions as the reparation commission may approve, a first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent States shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the allied and associated powers during the armistice or its extensions.

From this fund comes the occupation expenses and all other funds to which we are entitled.

Article 274 provides:

Germany undertakes to adopt all the necessary legislative and administrative measures to protect goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the allied and associated powers from all forms of unfair competition in commercial transactions.

Germany undertakes to prohibit and repress by seizure and by other appropriate remedies the importation, exportation, manufacture, distribution, sale, or offering for sale in its territory of all goods bearing upon themselves or their usual get-up or wrappings any marks, names, devices, or description whatsoever which are calculated to convey directly or indirectly a false indication of the origin, type, nature, or special characteristics of such goods.

A most salutary provision in the interest of the manufactures and commerce of our country. One which gives to the business men of our land a guaranty of fair business dealing, which should be of inestimable benefit and advantage.

Article 278 provides:

Germany undertakes to recognize any new nationality which has been or may be acquired by her nationals under the laws of the allied and associated powers and in accordance with the decisions of the competent authorities of these powers pursuant to naturalization laws or under treaty stipulations, and to regard such persons as having, in consequence of the acquisition of such new nationality, in all respects severed their allegiance to their country of origin.

This settles a question which might well be a very disturbing element. Happily, if the treaty be ratified, this question would forever be closed.

Articles 297 and 298, entitled "Property rights and interests." By this long article the question of private property rights and interests in an enemy country are settled according to the provisions laid down therein. It is most valuable to many of our citizens. It provides for the settlement of property interests now under the control of the Alien Property Custodian. It is most essential to many.

Article 439 of the treaty provides:

Without prejudice to the provisions of the present treaty, Germany undertakes not to put forward, directly or indirectly, against any allied or associated power signatory of the present treaty, including those which without having declared war have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present treaty.

This is a most valuable provision, as it sets at rest all questions prior to the war and removes from controversy all questions of that nature.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Under this has been enumerated various matters in which our people are vitally interested and financially concerned, such as contracts of various kinds, negotiable instruments, insurance—fire, life, and marine.

I might continue, Mr. Speaker, with a great array of other subjects gleaned from this great document, which fairly bristles with matters of inestimable worth and advantage to the American people, all of which we lose without treaty ratification.

It is true that if this resolution can become a constitutional law, and Germany acts in accordance with the provisions thereof, then Germany on behalf of itself and its nationals waives and renounces any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles. What about all those rights and benefits which the United States and its nationals have against Germany? What about the mutual agreements, such as I have mentioned, wherein the United States is financially interested and are of such importance to our business relations? It only further demonstrates what I have said, that there can be no satisfactory peace between sovereign powers except through treaty regulations, and this authority being definitely delegated to the Executive and the Senate by the Constitution, this body has no jurisdiction in the premises. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Some will say, "But the Executive and Senate have failed to agree. Shall we continue under war-time conditions indefinitely?" To this I reply that no branch of our Government has any power except that specifically delegated by the Constitution. Congress has no more authority to assume the powers of the Executive and of the Senate because they refuse to act than the Executive would have to assume legislative power because Congress refused to act upon some legislation which the Executive deemed advisable. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The failure to ratify the treaty has not alone been injurious to our own country, but likewise to the German people, in that we have no representative upon the reparation commission and are therefore unable to use any direct influence either for or against the German people. The powers of exacting tribute and reparations from Germany and the control of the economic conditions in Germany are vested in the reparation commission, and the attitude of that commission toward Germany will be the cause of alleviating or of perpetuating the present status for the moderation of which a great clamor has arisen. America, however, through nonratification is rendered powerless to act, powerless to help; her hands are tied. Now, if the treaty were ratified and America had her representative on the reparation commission, with the American people back of him, his influence would be most powerful, and, with Great Britain, she could make it possible for Germany to produce and play her part in the world. America could make it possible for Germany to carry out the provisions of the treaty. No joint resolution such as the one proposed can give us this representation and grant us the great influence to which we are entitled. No resolution can benefit mutually Germany and America.

America went into the war asking nothing for herself. History records that she has ever been just even unto being magnanimous to her vanquished foes. Yet here is a resolution, a so-called peace resolution, which attempts to bind Germany to the treaty terms, negotiated in good faith with us, while we refuse to adopt it ourselves, and which leaves America free and independent of its terms and stipulations.

It double-crosses the American people by depriving them of the rights and benefits of the treaty, a document framed by the brightest minds of the universe. It double-crosses the German people by exacting from them every provision of the treaty while we give them nothing in return—no guaranty of its approval by us. It is but a peace mirage, which leads to confusion, litigation, and trouble. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The resolution is unfair to our people and to the people of Germany. It requires Germany to perform in 45 days, with a distracted people and partial revolution brewing throughout the land, what the Republican Senate of the United States has been unable to accomplish in the past 12 months, during which time they have been debating the question and providing campaign material for the fall election.

What happens if the German Government is unable to pass the necessary legislation within 45 days, which, to my mind, is absolutely impossible? Why, then, it is provided "that commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the people of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited under a penalty of not more than $10,000 or, if a natural person, imprisonment for not more than two years, or both." No person under this provision could send food, clothing, or money to a starving relative or friend without being subject to jail sentence unless he first obtained a license, no matter how small the gift might be. I have been much impressed and amazed by the drastic features of the Volstead Act, but am constrained to believe that it is an innocent babe when compared to the drastic penalty features of this joint resolution, under which no natural person convicted of the slightest infraction could escape the penitentiary and might also be compelled to pay a heavy fine in addition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the proponents of this resolution have no idea that it can ever become a law, and hence fear not its unconstitutionality. The Republicans well know that no President, having in mind his oath of office, would for a moment consider the signing of a resolution which is diametrically opposed to both the letter and spirit of the Constitution—a resolution that runs counter to every precedent in our history. They know it is an utter impossibility to secure a two-thirds vote which is necessary to pass it over the President's veto. What, then, can be their object? It is plain to behold. It is merely another mode by which they hope to gain political advantage; to still more harass the President and to fool the American people with this false hope of peace; it is an endeavor to divert the attention of the American voter from the utter failure of the Republican Senate to bring peace by treaty adoption according to the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

America, when the President left Paris with the great treaty document in his possession, stood out as the beacon light of freedom and the friend of all distressed nations and peoples wheresoever dispersed; America held the torch on high and the world looked to her gigantic form with love, adoration, and a firm sense of help and protection. Not alone did the allied nations do this but the vanquished also relied upon the justness and fairness of America. The fame of America had spread over the world. Little nations felt secure under the protecting wing of the American eagle, and great nations felt the cooperating power of America would still the troubles of all lands. The Stars and Stripes became the symbol of peace and the Statue of Liberty the emblem of freedom and love. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Such was the situation when the President returned with the treaty document, which many were wont to call the "constitution of the world." When the President landed in New York crowds choked the streets and cheered themselves hoarse. No victor was ever greeted by greater numbers nor more enthusiasm. It was too much for the Republicans. Means must be employed, thought they, for the destruction of the popularity of this Colossus of the American Government. The sages of the Republican Party were consulted. A propaganda was put forward to persecute him, even unto the brink of the grave. A committee was named by the Senate to intrude unto the very sick bed of the President under the guise of obtaining information concerning Mexican affairs. It was determined that the treaty must not be ratified unless upon Republican terms, that they might cry, "We saved the country." Investigation committees were named, and after expending some two millions of the people's money in hearings, junketing trips, and so forth, demonstrated nothing but the fact that this was the cleanest war America ever fought. Accusations and vituperations were leveled at the great men of our Navy and that wonderful Army which sprang up overnight to the dismay of the Central Powers. All to no avail. They could not fool the people. The Republican leaders have become distracted, and now, as a last resort, they endeavor to take from the Executive the power to make peace, even though it hazard the very structure of the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, so great has been their endeavor to destroy the glory and luster bestowed upon the temple of democracy by the Democratic Party during both peace and war that the Republican Party has actually ceased to function on all the great and important legislation so badly needed. Nothing constructive has been performed by them during their congressional control. It is a sad commentary, indeed, that the Republican legislative branch should be so callous to American needs in its partisan pursuit of the Democratic Party. Well did the President know whereof he spoke when he asked the country to give him men of his own party to legislate in the conduct of the Government. The election of a Republican Congress has been disastrous, not alone to our own country but to the world at large. The failure of the Senate to ratify the treaty has deprived us of that representation which would have no doubt kept the world at peace and prevented further strife, bloodshed, and devastation. America was the hope of the world—a hope blasted by Republican policies and politics. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to find myself at odds with the bulk of the Members on my side of the Chamber. But I am unable to deal with this matter as a party question. It does not seem to me to be a matter for partisanship. The American people want peace. We should not make their desire for peace a matter of partisanship nor make it a political football. It is not only unwise from a political standpoint, but it is bad from the standpoint of public policy. I can not give my consent, my conscience will not permit, to voting against this resolution. [Applause.]

I concede to gentlemen who may differ from me the privilege of doing as they see proper. I do not doubt that they are inspired by high motives. I do not call their motives into question and I ask of them the same consideration. It would be easier for me to fall in and go with the majority of my side, to go with the crowd; it would be easier, and would take much less courage, than to take a position which I realize is not popular. It is not pleasant to be in a minority, especially in a small minority.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

Let us see what the political situation is. Gentlemen upon my side of the House say that this is a partisan measure, that it is presented by the Republicans for party reasons, and not in good faith. Well, with the reasons and motives which inspired those who brought forward this resolution I have small concern. The thing that concerns me is what is for the good of my country. [Applause.] I refuse to deal with this question upon any other basis. If, as is said, the Republicans are mean and insincere in advocating this measure, that does not affect me. I am concerned alone with my own motives and must follow my own conscience, no matter what kind of company it may take me into. [Laughter.]

Let us frankly consider what the political situation is. The country wants peace. That desire has been thwarted for 17 long months by obstinacy, selfishness, and political considerations. At present the country is in some doubt as to who is to blame. The great mass of the people feel that both sides are to blame. They blame the President for his attitude in insisting upon the acceptance of the covenant of the League of Nations exactly as he had submitted it and for refusing to accept reasonable reservations. They think he has tried to dictate to the Senate, "Sign on the dotted line."

And the people have no patience with the way in which the treaty has been kicked and cuffed around by the opposition. They believe the treaty would long ago have been ratified in some form or other acceptable to them had opposition not been inspired by selfishness, hatred, and other unworthy motives. At present the blame is placed by the people upon both parties and upon both sides.

In order to end that situation and to avoid it, our Republican brethren, with great astuteness, have brought forward this resolution in the House, where quick action may be had. Their plan is that they will vote for it and thereby gain the reputation with the people of the country that they are for peace and want to do all they can to bring it about—and that we shall vote against it and thereby take upon ourselves the odium for the delay and place this side of the House in the attitude of saying "No; we will not agree to peace, except on condition that the League of Nations be accepted without reservations just as our President desires." Shall we Democrats, as men of good sense, permit the Republicans to mix this draught, load it with poison, and set it in front of us, then will we drink it down to the last drop and say, "Thank you"? "Vain is the snare set in sight of the bird." [Applause.]

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No; the gentleman will please excuse me. The people will visit upon the public man or the party that takes that obstinate position against their proper desire for peace a punishment which I shall not accept for myself, because I do not intend to deserve it. [Applause.]

PRESIDENT AND SENATE IN HOPELESS DEADLOCK.

What is the situation as to the treaty? In his letter to Senator HITCHCOCK of March 8 of this year, the President of the United States said with reference to article 10 of the League of Nations:

If article 10 is not adopted and acted upon, the governments which reject it will, I think, be guilty of bad faith to their people whom they induced to make the infinite sacrifices of the war by the pledge that they would be fighting to redeem the world from the old order of force and aggression. They will be acting also in bad faith to the opinion of the world at large to which they appealed for support in a concerted stand against the aggressions and pretensions of Germany. If we were to reject article 10 or so to weaken it as to take its full force out of it, it would mark us as desiring to return to the Old World of jealous rivalry and misunderstandings from which our gallant soldiers have rescued us, and would leave us without any vision or new conception of justice and peace. We would have learned no lesson from the war but gained only the regret that it had involved us in its maelstrom of suffering.

And, again, he said:

Either we should enter the league fearlessly, accepting the responsibility and not fearing the rôle of leadership which we now enjoy, contributing our efforts toward establishing a just and permanent peace, or we should retire as gracefully as possible from the great concert of powers by which the world was saved.

And, further, in his letter he said:

I need not say, Senator, that I have given a great deal of thought to the whole matter of reservations proposed in connection with the ratification of the treaty, and particularly that portion of the treaty which contains the covenant of the League of Nations, and I have been struck by the fact that practically every so-called reservation was in effect a rather sweeping nullification of the terms of the treaty itself. I hear of reservationists and mild reservationists, but I can not understand the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier. Our responsibility as a Nation in this turning point of history is an overwhelming one, and if I had the opportunity I would beg everyone concerned to consider the matter in the light of what it is possible to accomplish for humanity rather than in the light of special national interests.

What does that mean, gentlemen? It means that the President is resolved upon the League of Nations, in substance and in effect, exactly as he submitted it to the Senate, and that he will not accept any reservation whatever in a matter of substance. That is what it means. Nobody can read that letter and fail to understand the President's position.

What further is the fact? The Senate for the second time has rejected the League of Nations. The Senate adopted reservations. They had been discussing it for months and months. The discussion has gone on until the people of the country are tired and disgusted, and can not endure it any longer.

The Senate has shown to any man who understands the situation that the League of Nations will not be accepted without substantial reservations. It seems to me all ought to realize that. The issue is projected into the next campaign. It will become further, to a lower degree, the football of partisan politics. It is kicked and cuffed around. Another twelvemonth will go by. Is there any man of good sense who believes that two-thirds of the Senate will be found 12 months from to-day who will vote to accept this League of Nations without any substantial reservation? I do not believe there is a man before me who will give his assent to such a conclusion.

Then where will we be if we do not accept this proposition or some other of similar purport? We will project this issue into the next political campaign. We will distract the public attention from grave domestic questions that need to be solved. We will divert the thought of the people of America away from problems which concern them and enter into the troublesome foreign questions with the certainty that at the end of the campaign we shall be found exactly where we are to-day, hopelessly divided, and a deadlock existing between the President and the Senate. The result will not be, as I believe every reasonable man who is informed on political considerations will agree, that two-thirds of the Senate of the United States, as it will be constituted one year from to-day, will accept the League of Nations exactly as it is and without any substantial reservations.

THE TREATY IS DEAD.

The people of this country want peace, and they need peace. For over a year we have been discussing this question. The treaty of Versailles is dead. So far as the United States is concerned it might as well not have been written. [Applause.] The President is in irreconcilable deadlock with the Senate. Twice has the Senate rejected the treaty. Twice has it been demonstrated that the Senate will not ratify the treaty without material amendments to section 10 and other sections of the covenant of the League of Nations. The President indicated in his recent letter to Senator HITCHCOCK that he would not consent to any substantial change in these sections. There is no hope that either Senate or President will yield. They are immovably deadlocked. It can not be hoped that two-thirds of the Senators will vote to approve the treaty in any form acceptable to the President. We can go neither backward nor forward. The treaty is dead. Let us recognize that fact and deal with it accordingly.

ACTUAL WAR ENDED MONTHS AGO.

America wants peace. Actual warfare came to an end 17 months ago. For weary months an agonized world waited on the deliberations at Versailles. Finally the treaty was agreed upon, and now for an anxious yearlong distressed America has looked on while peace was made the football of politics, selfishness, and obstinacy. A weary year of waiting with nothing accomplished. We stand to-day where we stood when the treaty was agreed upon.

America wants peace. Our enemy is beaten and humiliated. Germany's ships have been sunk or surrendered; her armies have been disbanded; her military power has crumbled into dust; from the mightiest she is become the weakest of nations. Even now Germany is torn by revolution and civil disorder. Actual warfare with Germany has been over for months; she has abjectly surrendered; she has accepted the hard terms imposed upon her; she sues for peace; she grants our every demand. Civil disorder in Germany threatens to spread and engulf the world. In good faith we owe it to her, even an enemy, as well as to the interests of our own country, to recognize formally the ending of the war which has been accomplished in actuality.

It were better, I agree, that the technical ending of the war should be by formal treaty. But if the authorities which have to do with formal treaties remain in hopeless conflict we can not afford to haggle over technicalities, but should proceed in a practical way in the exercise of reason and good sense to extricate ourselves from the situation. If peace can not be had by treaty, then let us have peace by other proper means—peace, if need be, by congressional action. It seems foolish to strain over procedure and to refuse to move because we can not have it just in our own way when we are in substantial agreement as to the end.

AMERICA WANTS PEACE.

America wants peace. Unrest and discontent are universal. The rich are dissatisfied with their taxes. Labor cries out against profiteering and exploitation. Suspicion and distrust are everywhere. The faith of the people in their officials is shaken. Officers of the Government are suspicious of the loyalty and fidelity of our citizens. The masses point to the vast accumulations of profiteers and war contractors and in turn are denounced as "reds" and "radicals." Distressing economic conditions are aggravated by uncertainty as to the future and by the consciousness that peace has not yet come. Business halts and is uncertain which way to go. Stimulated by inflation of money, there is a spurious activity, but enterprise and development hesitate and fear to advance. They do not know what a day may bring.

HARSH LAWS HARSHLY ENFORCED.

Actually the war has been over for more than a year, yet the people continue to groan under harsh and restrictive war laws. The conscription act remains unrepealed, while militarists seek to make it a part of our permanent system. The espionage act is yet in force. Under it numerous prosecutions have occurred since the armistice.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman 11 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Good citizens are yet afraid to express their honest opinions. [Applause.] The explosives act, the trading-with-the-enemy act, the food-control act, and other oppressive war laws are yet in effect. Workingmen dare not insist upon adequate wages and fair conditions because of laws passed to help to win the war. The people are heartily weary of the harsh war laws and the conditions arising from the war status. They are tired and cry for relief. Without regard to the merits of the League of Nations and the treaty, those who press for ratification must be made to understand public sentiment. The people will not tolerate that the war laws be held at their heads like a loaded pistol to force them into accepting the treaty. They claim the right to consider the treaty and the league upon their merits. They resent the attempt to intimidate them and to demand their acceptance of the treaty as the price of relief. Public men and parties which seek thus to impose upon the people will find themselves the mark of hearty disapproval.

Actually we are not at war, but technically there is no peace. Patrioteers and profiteers, reactionaries, militarists, war contractors, and their kind, yet draped in the flag, pose as models of civic virtue. The present is their opportunity. They praise themselves and decry all the rest, and improve the time to press the measures and systems which they favor.

PEACE THE CRYING NEED OF THE WORLD.

The good of America demands an immediate return to peace conditions. We must get to lower prices and to the lower cost of living of normal times. We need to order our lives on a peace basis and to devote our energies to increased production and to stoppage of waste by a return to prewar methods and conditions. We need to repair the home life, to restore spiritual things, to bind up the wounds of mankind, and to turn anew to feelings of amity, kindness, and world brotherhood. Peace is the crying need of America, as it is of all the world.

The proposed resolution carefully safeguards all American rights. Section 3 requires Germany to waive and renounce—

* * * on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles.

Section 5 of the resolution provides:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise; and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

In view of these provisions there is no danger of any loss on account of the operations of the Alien Property Custodian or under the trading-with-the-enemy act.

ONLY TWO ALTERNATIVES.

The imperative need of our country is for peace without further delay. The President and the Senate are in hopeless deadlock. It is clear that they can not agree upon the treaty. There are only two alternatives to an indefinite continuation of the present uncertainty and controversy. The President may negotiate a new treaty with Germany for submission to the Senate. This course it appears the President will not take. He appears resolved upon the existing treaty. This situation will plunge the matter into the coming political campaign, with resulting bitter strife and controversy, and the distraction of public attention from pressing domestic questions, with the certainty that in the end the necessary two-thirds will not be found in the Senate, so that in all probability a year hence will find the treaty exactly where it is to-day.

The other alternative is the adoption of the pending measure—peace by resolution—termination of the war by congressional action. This alternative is forced upon us unless we agree that peace may yet be deferred for another year or more. I can not hesitate to make the choice. [Applause.]

NOT A MATTER FOR PARTISANSHIP.

It is with regret that I find myself at odds with the majority of Democratic Members. They argue that the pending resolution is a Republican measure and pressed on us for partisan purposes. I despise a partisanship which would baffle with our country's welfare, but I must not allow any meanness of purpose which inspires the measure to swerve me from what I conceive to be my duty. I refuse to accept this as an issue for partisanship. If it be true that the measure is inspired by the desire for petty party advantage, yet I must support it without regard to its partisan effect. I must act for the public welfare, no matter if that course should take me into bad company. [Applause.]

Again, my friends on the Democratic side charge that the resolution is aimed at the President and is intended to embarrass him. They urge that I should accept the President's leadership and decision, and leave the matter in his hands. I respect the office and personality of the President. But I am not thinking of the President; I am thinking of the welfare of my country. [Applause.] I want to smooth away the friction that is growing among our citizens. I want to still discontent and dissatisfaction and the possibility of domestic strife and civil disorder. I want to do whatever I may to restore my country and to promote the peace and welfare of the world. The issue is not the President's issue. It is America's issue. It must be decided without regard to the personal or political fortunes of any man.

CONGRESS HAS POWER TO END THE WAR.

It is asserted that the measure is unconstitutional, but this contention gives me small concern. Congress has the power to declare war—it is absurd to contend that it may not end the war which Congress has put on foot. The Constitution gives the President the right to appoint ambassadors and, "with the consent of the Senate, to make treaties." He has no express authority to end war, nor has he any exclusive jurisdiction of foreign affairs. Treaties made following a war usually provide for the terms of peace, but this function is not a necessary incident to a treaty. Actual warfare might go on despite a treaty, and also might warfare cease as an actuality though no treaty be made. The Constitution makes it the exclusive duty of Congress to declare war, to provide our armed forces, and to create and control the militia. It lays the exclusive duty on Congress "to provide for the common defense and general welfare." If the power to end war is not granted exclusively to the President, undoubtedly Congress may exercise it.

The President is given no express power to make peace. Such authority as he has in making peace is implied from his constitutional warrant to negotiate treaties. He has no power to make peace except as an incident to a treaty. If a case should occur in which no treaty could be made, the President could exercise no function in connection with ending a war. For instance, if there were no responsible government in Germany with which a treaty might be agreed on, the President could do no act to make peace. If the United States should fight a war of conquest and as a result should annex the enemy country, there would be no government for the President to make a treaty with. In such a case there could be no treaty, and unless Congress has power to terminate a state of war we would remain perpetually in a war status. Thus is reduced to an absurdity the argument that Congress can not end the war status. Congress can not "make peace," for that involves negotiations with a foreign government and the agreeing upon a treaty, which is the President's exclusive function; but there is no doubt in my mind that Congress may terminate a war status, leaving the President to negotiate the terms of peace. [Applause.]

THE SOURCE OF ALL AUTHORITY.

I hold that under the American system such powers as are not expressly or by implication conferred upon the executive and judicial branches of Government are reposed in Congress, the legislative branch, composed as it is of the representatives of the people of the United States, who at last are the source of all authority. To hold that Congress can not end a war which it has declared to exist is to say that Congress has no authority to repeal one of its own laws—the act declaring war. It involves the shocking theory that, no matter how complete our victory nor how unanimous the minds of the people, we can not end a state of war except by the exercise of the will of the Executive. [Applause.]

Only the President can "make peace," for making peace involves an agreement with an enemy government—a treaty, the agreeing on which is an exclusive presidential function. The error of those who argue that Congress can not terminate a war seems to be due to the wrongful assumption that "to end war" is "to make peace." The two phrases are not at all synonymous.

It has been argued with a show of reason that by the proposed resolution Congress purposes to "negotiate" with Germany, to make a proposal for German acceptance, to "agree" with Germany. This is a fundamental error, as an analysis of the resolution shows. The resolution does three distinct things. Sections 1 and 5 terminate the status of war and provide that the resolution shall not be a waiver by the United States of any of its rights. Section 2 provides that the war laws shall no longer be in effect. Sections 3 and 4 cover the third subject of the resolution and provide for the resumption of trade with Germany upon conditions named. It is only to these conditions that Germany is required to assent. As to no other matter connected with the resolution is German agreement required. It is upon these sections that those who argue that the resolution is an effort to make an agreement with Germany rely. These sections may be stricken from the resolution and yet leave it a perfect whole. If they are unconstitutional, that fact can not affect the validity of the other sections of the resolution. But sections 3 and 4 are not unconstitutional.

In almost the same language has Congress passed previous laws. Section 3 of the McKinley Tariff Act of October 1, 1890, was almost identical in substance. That law was held constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Field against Clark, one hundred and forty-third United States, page 649. The court held that the placing of conditions upon trade with a foreign country which involved affirmative action by that country was not an interference with the treaty-making powers of the President and did not constitute negotiation.

Gentlemen upon my side of the Chamber argue that Democrats should oppose the pending resolution, for that it will be vetoed by the President and its passage by Congress avail nothing. The President has a responsibility belonging to his office which he will no doubt exercise with his wonted admirable discretion. But Representatives also have a responsibility. It is not for Congress to dictate what the President shall do, nor for the President to direct what Representatives should do. [Applause.] I am bound to believe that he has no desire to do so. It is upon us to deal with this measure upon its merits and with the conscientious purpose to promote the public good. This I shall do, and will be quite content with whatever action the President may take.

AMERICA IS FREE TO ACT INDEPENDENTLY.

I can not agree with those who argue that we are bound in honor to join in a treaty with the nations associated with us in the war. They entered the war without our leave. We entered it upon our own initiative. We cooperated with them to defeat the common enemy. We went into the war unpledged to our associated nations. We have come out of the war without owing them anything; to the contrary, they are our debtors. [Applause.] The honor of America is not pledged to unite in a common treaty with our associated nations. It is pledged neither expressly nor by implication. The people have not pledged American honor, neither has it been pledged by Congress nor by anyone authorized by the people to speak for them. We entered the war for reasons of our own; we spent our blood and treasure without stint; we have asked neither land nor money, favors nor indemnity; we fought in defense of the civilization of the world. Continued cooperation with the nations associated with us in the war is neither obligated nor compelled. We will hereafter, I hope, act freely, as heretofore, for the welfare and dignity of America and for the peace and hope of mankind. [Applause.]

The nations associated with us in the war have made peace with Germany. America alone of all the nations retains her war status. We do not abandon our associated nations by terminating the state of war. We do but join them in their status of peace. We do not abandon them to a common enemy. They are at peace and no longer require our support or protection. It is absurd to say that American honor is pledged to stand alone among the nations in a state of war with Germany. If in any sense American honor is under pledge, it is to promote peace, harmony, and good will at home and among the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1917, the Congress of the United States, acting under power conferred by section 8, Article I of the Constitution, "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water," by a joint resolution declared the existence of a state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States, and on December 7, 1917, declared the existence of a state of war between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the United States.

The Congress, in the exercise of power conferred by section 8, Article I of the Constitution, "to raise and support armies," and "to provide and maintain a Navy," and the President of the United States, under the power conferred by section 1, Article II of the Constitution, "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and section 2, Article II of the Constitution, "the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States," prosecuted the war, already declared, to a successful and triumphant conclusion. The President, acting conjointly with the allied military commanders, on November 11, 1918, under authority of his powers as Commander in Chief of the armed forces in the field, concluded with the authorities of the Imperial German Government an armistice, the effect of which was to suspend military operations pending negotiations for the conclusion of a treaty of peace.

Thereafter the President, under authority conferred by Article II, section 2 of the Constitution, "he shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur," and by authority of Article II, section 1, vesting in the President the executive power, concluded and signed on the 28th day of June, 1919, a treaty of peace with the Imperial German Government by which matters at issue between the United States and the Imperial German Government were either settled or agencies for their settlement set up. In due course the President submitted the treaty to the Senate of the United States for its advice and consent or its rejection. The Senate, in the exercise of its constitutional power, refused its consent to the treaty.

In the course of the war measures were enacted which, by their terms, were to expire with the existing state of war between the United States and Germany, or "when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed," or "six months after the present war," or "the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratification of the treaty of peace," or which contained a term or clause fixing the date of their termination with relation to the legal state of war.

After the refusal of the Senate to consent to the ratification of the treaty of peace it was returned by the Senate to the President, in whose hands it now rests. Neither of the allied powers nor Germany has been notified by the President that the United States has declined to ratify the treaty. Thus stands the history of the case. Thus far each department of government has acted clearly within its constitutional prerogative.

In this posture of our international relations the House of Representatives is presented with House joint resolution 327 by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PORTER], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as follows:

Joint resolution terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Whereas the President of the United States, in the performance of his constitutional duty to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, has advised the Congress that the war with the Imperial German Government has ended:

Resolved, etc., That the state of war declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the United States by the joint resolution of Congress approved April 6, 1917, is hereby declared at an end.

SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

SEC. 3. That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with the German Government and its nationals, and for this purpose, it is hereby provided that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles, the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany and the making of loans or credits and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall willfully violate the foregoing prohibition whenever the same shall be in force shall upon conviction be fined not more than $10,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than two years, or both; and the officer, director, or agent of any corporation who knowingly participates in such violation shall be punished by a like fine, imprisonment, or both, and any property, funds, securities, papers, or other articles or documents, or any vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, furniture, and equipment, concerned in such violation, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as a waiver by the United States of any rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which the United States has become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or which were acquired by or are in the possession of the United States by reason of its participation in the war, or otherwise, and all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States are hereby ratified, confirmed, and maintained.

It will be observed that section 1 undertakes in the name of Congress to declare at an end the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States; that section 2 pretends to fix a date for the termination of all legislation enacted by Congress whose termination was fixed as contingent upon the end of the war or the ratification of a treaty of peace, and so forth; that sections 3 and 5 seek to set up a plan whereby all questions growing out of the war may be settled in a treaty of peace with the Imperial German Government, negotiated and ratified by an act of Congress.

That the powers of the Federal Government are delegated powers is a truism so generally accepted and so long recognized that its repetition should not be necessary but for the audacity of the resolution in challenging heretofore well-accepted principles. That the powers of the Congress, of the Executive, and of the judicial department are all derived from the Constitution is likewise a maxim that is hoary with age. The Congress in the exercise of any power must find its warrant in the Constitution and not elsewhere. [Applause.]

Let us then examine the resolution section by section and seek to ascertain the source and basis, if there be such, of the authority sought to be exercised. Section 1 decrees—the state of war * * * is hereby declared at an end.

It will not be contended, by even the boldest, that anywhere in the Constitution will there be found express authority in Congress to "declare peace" or "declare a state of war at an end."

However, it may be suggested in some quarters that "the same power which has the right to declare and carry on war would seem naturally to be the proper power to make and conclude a treaty of peace." The language is from Kent; but the same author proceeds as follows:

But the disposition of this power will depend upon the local constitution of every nation; and it sometimes happens that the power of making peace is committed to a body of men who have not the power to make war. In Sweden after the death of Charles the Twelfth the King could declare war without the consent of the national diet, but he made peace in conjunction with the Senate. (b) So by the Constitution of the United States, the President, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, may make peace, but it is reserved to Congress to declare war. This provision in our Constitution is well adapted (as will be shown more fully hereafter) to unite, in the negotiation and conclusion of treaties, the advantage of talents, experience, stability, and a comprehensive knowledge of national interest with the requisite secrecy and dispatch.

The department of the Government that is intrusted by the Constitution with the treaty-making power is competent to bind the national faith in its discretion; for the power to make treaties of peace must be coextensive with all the exigencies of the Nation, and necessarily involves in it that portion of the national sovereignty which has the exclusive direction of diplomatic negotiations and contracts with foreign powers.

A power to make treaties of peace necessarily implies a power to decide the terms on which they shall be made, and foreign States could not deal safely with the Government upon any other presumption.

In this connection Dr. William Rawle, in his view of the Constitution (Philadelphia, 1829, pp. 110–111), remarks:

Treaties, by which peace is completely restored, may, as already shown, be made by the President and Senate alone, without the concurrence and against the will of the House of Representatives.

It has been made a subject of doubt whether the power to make war and peace should not be the same, and why a smaller part of the Government should be intrusted with the latter than the former. Sufficient reasons may certainly be assigned for the distinction. Peace is seldom effected without preparatory discussions, often of length and difficulty, the conduct of which, of course, belong only to the President and Senate.

If there should be any question that the clause of the Constitution vesting the treaty-making power in the President and the Senate is not absolutely exclusive, and if there should be any doubt that such grant does not wholly comprehend all of the powers of ending war and of making and declaring peace, that doubt should be conclusively removed by reference to the debates in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, when the function of Congress with reference to making or declaring war and the treaty-making clauses were under discussion.

On August 17, 1787, the convention debated the clause appearing in the tentative draft as "to make war," and the following transpired, as will appear in Elliot's Debates:

FRIDAY, AUGUST 17, 1787.

On the clause, "to make war,"

On the motion to insert "declare," in place of "make," it was agreed to: Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia—ayes, 8; New Hampshire—no, 1; Massachusetts, absent.

Mr. Pinckney's motion to strike out the whole clause was disagreed to, without call of States.

Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature the power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

Mr. Gerry seconds him. Eight Senators may possibly exercise the power, if vested in that body, and 14 if all should be present, and may consequently give up part of the United States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole legislature.

On the motion for adding "and peace," after "war," it was unanimously negatived.

Adjourned.

It will be noted that the issue was sharply and clearly drawn in the convention, and the distinction between the powers to declare war and to declare peace were well defined. After the language had been made to read "to declare war" instead of "to make war" the convention by unanimous vote of the States declined to confer on Congress the power to declare "peace." This action was not supported by any claim or argument that the Congress in any other clause possessed such a power, because such was not the case, but the action can only be explained upon the hypothesis that not only did the convention not intend to confer on Congress the power to declare peace, but, on the other hand, expressly forbade such a power to the Congress.

Mr. Joseph Storey, in his celebrated work on the Constitution, makes the following comment upon the action of the convention:

In the convention, in the first draft of the Constitution the power was given merely "to make war." It was subsequently, and not without some struggle, altered to its present form. It was proposed to add the power "to make peace"; but this was unanimously rejected upon the plain ground that it more properly belonged to the treaty-making power. The experience of Congress, under the Confederation, of the difficulties attendant upon vesting the treaty-making power in a large legislative body, was too deeply felt to justify the hazard of another experiment.

Under the Articles of Confederation Congress had "the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war," and though Yorktown was fought in 1781, peace did not come until 1783. Under the Confederation there was no President or Executive and both the legislative and executive powers necessarily reposed in Congress. It was the bitter lesson of experience with the Confederation that the States were convinced that a new plan was necessary and under a compulsion that wisdom dictated separated the powers of war and peace.

It may with reason be inferred that the convention by changing the clause "to make war" to that of "to declare war" intended to leave the prosecution of war, which is executive in its nature, to the President.

This distribution of powers did not occur by chance. It was not by mere hazard that the function of declaring peace was not allotted to Congress. There was no casting of lots as to where the various parts should be placed in a mere mechanical process of composition. It was an evidence of that marvelous system of checks and balances that like a thread runs with fixed and designed purpose through the plan of Federal Government. Congress may raise armies, but the President commands them; though he commands them, supplies and money can only be provided by Congress; the Executive may spend money, but Congress alone may appropriate it; the Executive may collect taxes, but Congress alone may levy them; Congress may pass laws, the judiciary alone may construe them; Congress may declare war, the President and Senate alone may declare its end or peace. Other instances suggest themselves to your mind without their statement.

A state of war creates a status that affects two nations, not one. Its termination must be brought about by the concurrence of both. Should one declare itself at peace and the other refuse, the "status" would remain and a state of war would still exist. The resolution admits that fact when it employs the language "state of war * * * between the Imperial German Government and the United States." If one nation only is involved, there can be no state of war.

I hold in my hand Report No. 2680, second session, Forty-eighth Congress, prepared by John Randolph Tucker, the eminent authority on constitutional law, then chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House, in which the treaty-making power is exhaustively and elaborately treated. From that report I quote:

The status of war created by Congress may be determined by a status of peace created by treaty. Congress can not create the status of peace by repealing its declaration of war, because the former requires the concurrence of two wills, the latter but the action of one.

[Applause.]

Mr. J. I. C. Hare, in his treatise on American Constitutional Law (Boston, 1889, pp. 171–172), first contrasts the systems of government in the United States and England, and then with reference to the President of the United States he adds:

He is as much the representative of the entire people of the United States as any Member of Congress can be of his district, and should therefore exercise the discretionary powers confided to him by the Constitution in the way that he may deem best calculated to promote the welfare of the country, which may not be the way deemed best by Congress. Take, for instance, the case of a war which Congress thinks unnecessary or unjust, and wishes to close on terms that the enemy is willing to accept. Still, it is the right of the President, and not of Congress, to determine whether the terms are advantageous, and if he refuses to make peace the war must go on.

In the preamble of the resolution an effort is made to predicate its action on the claim that the President has stated to Congress that the war is at an end. That ridiculous contention and the question of the "conclusion of the war" were raised in the recent case of Hamilton against Kentucky Distillery Co., in which the Supreme Court on December 15, 1919, in passing upon the validity of the war-time prohibition act, said:

In the absence of specific provisions to the contrary the period of war has been held to extend to the ratification of the treaty of peace or the proclamation of peace. (Hijo v. United States, 194 U. S., 315–323; the Protector, 12 Wall., 700–702; United States v. Anderson, 9

Wall., 56–70.) From the fact that other statutes concerning war activities contain each a specific provision for determining when it shall cease to be operative, and from the alleged absence of such a provision here, it is argued that the term "conclusion of the war" should not be given its ordinary legal meaning; that instead it should be construed as the time when actual hostilities ceased; or when the treaty of peace was signed at Versailles on June 28, 1919, by the American and German representatives; or more generally, when the actual war emergencies ceased by reason of our complete victory and the disarmament of the enemy, coupled with the demobilization of our Army and the closing of the war activities; or when the declared purpose of the act "conserving the man power of the Nation, and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy" shall have been fully satisfied. But there is nothing in the words to justify such a construction. "Conclusion of the war" clearly did not mean cessation of hostilities. * * * The "date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President" is a phrase so definite as to leave no room for construction. This requirement can not be satisfied by passing references in messages to Congress, nor by newspaper interviews with high officers of the Army or with officials of the War Department. When the President mentioned in his veto message the "demobilization of the Army and Navy" the words were doubtless used in a popular sense, just as he had declared to Congress, on the occasion of the signing of the armistice, "The war thus comes to an end."

Discussing the end of the War with Spain, it is said in Hijo v. United States (194 U. S., 323):

A state of war did not in law cease until the ratification in April, 1899, of the treaty of peace. "A truce or suspension of armies," says Kent, "does not terminate the war, but it is one of the commercia belli which suspends its operations—at the expiration of the truce hostilities may recommence without any fresh declaration of war."

Though no warrant can be found in the Constitution, ingenious minds may suggest, and, in fact, the report of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs has already suggested, that upon some principle of international law a valid argument in behalf of congressional termination of war may be hung.

As to the methods by which a war may be terminated, authorities on international law are in substantial accord.

Oppenheim says:

SEC. 261. Be that as it may, a war may be terminated in three different ways: Belligerents may, first, abstain from further acts of war and glide into peaceful relations without expressly making peace through a special treaty. Or, secondly, belligerents may formally establish the condition of peace through a special treaty of peace. Or, thirdly, a belligerent may end the war through subjugation of his adversary.

SEC. 262. The regular modes of termination of war are treaties of peace or subjugation, but cases have occurred in which simple cessation of all acts of war on the part of both belligerents has actually and informally brought the war to an end. Thus ended in 1716 the war between Sweden and Poland, in 1720 the war between Spain and France, in 1801 the war between Russia and Persia, in 1867 the war between France and Mexico. And it may also be mentioned that, whereas the war between Prussia and several German States in 1866 came to an end through subjugation of some States and through treaties of peace with others, Prussia has never concluded a treaty of peace with the Principality of Lichtenstein, which was also a party to the war. Although such termination of war through simple cessation of hostilities is for many reasons inconvenient and is therefore as a rule avoided, it may nevertheless in the future, as in the past, occasionally occur.

In Hall on International Law, sixth edition, page 553, it is stated:

War is terminated by the conclusion of a treaty of peace, by simple cessation of hostilities, or by the conquest of all or a part of all of the belligerent States by the other.

Halleck on International Law states that there are three methods by which war may come to an end—by subjugation, by de facto cessation of hostilities, or by a treaty of peace.

Fiore on International Law, Borchard's edition, September 1, 1917, states (sec. 1953):

A war between two or more States can only be considered as legally ended by the conclusion of peace stipulated in a final treaty of peace. * * *

If Congress possesses the power under the public law of nations to bring a war to an end it must do so in one of the three methods indicated. That it can not terminate the war by making a special treaty of peace with Germany will be conceded. It can not now establish the condition of peace by subjugating Germany, because it is not commander of the armies, and the Army has been demobilized. By the same token it can not end the war by ceasing military operations because it does not control military operations. The prosecution of war being in the Executive, the Commander in Chief of the armies, necessarily Congress is expressly excluded and has no control over the movements of the armies or the Navy and can exercise no command to either advance or retreat. It may, of course, deny supplies or money, but there its authority ends. The President can terminate hostilities by ordering the armies to cease firing, just as he did on November 11 under his power as Commander in Chief, and from such mutual and continued cessation of hostilities might in time flow impliedly a state of peace, but this state would in no wise be attributable to any act on the part of Congress. Such a state would arise not from an express peace but from a presumption arising from the lapse of time.

I hold that if the Congress now possesses the power to make peace or to terminate the war by the means proposed it had that power in the spring of 1918 when the German armies in their final drive at the heart of France were bending almost to breaking the allied lines and when many weak hearts despaired; if it now possesses such a power it could have exercised it in the midst of the St. Mihiel operation; if within that body it is now lodged it subsisted all through the great Argonne drive from September 26 to November 11, 1918; if there now inheres in Congress the strength to end the war, it could, before its purposes were accomplished, have brought it to a premature and untimely end.

Routed from their first and second lines of defense it will probably be contended by gentlemen on that side of the House that the War between the States was terminated by act of Congress. This contention can not be maintained in fact, and if so maintained has no application to the matter now in hand. The Federal courts in a number of decisions have held that the proclamations of the President of April 2, 1866, and August 20, 1866, fixed the termination of the Civil War. It is true Congress fixed by a statute such date as being the time from which the operation of certain laws should be computed. However, the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States v. Anderson (9 Wall., p. 56), clearly distinguishes that case from the present one in the following language:

In a foreign war a treaty of peace would be the evidence of the time when it closed, but in a domestic war, like the late one, some public proclamation of legislation would seem to be required to inform those whose private rights were affected by it of the time when it terminated, and we are of the opinion that Congress did not intend that the limitation in this act should begin to run until this was done.

At the end of the War between the States the gallant armies of the Confederacy had been overwhelmed and disbanded; the president and other civil officers were either in prison, in flight, or in exile. The Confederate States, whose intrepid soldiers had dazzled the whole world by the brilliance of their achievements on the battle field and thrilled with admiration their enemies, and whose civil institutions had proved amazing in their resourcefulness and energy, had now crumbled and fallen apart. The Union had never recognized that the Confederacy constituted a government, but from the beginning treated the secession of the Southern States as rebellion; that the War between the States was merely an insurrection and not a conflict between two nations. Whether it be considered from the Northern standpoint as merely an insurrection or from the Southern standpoint that it was a war between two independent nations, the practical result and method of treatment are the same. In the latter case it was terminated by the entire subjugation of the Southern States, and as has already been pointed out, no treaty was necessary. The Confederacy and its government were absolutely extinguished and their dust scattered to the winds. There was no recognized agency with which the Federal Government could or would treat.

I submit that a review of the transactions of the Constitutional Convention and the whole scope of the law by a candid and impartial mind will absolutely compel the conclusion that, wherever the power "to declare peace" may reside, it does not reside in the Congress.

Coming to section 2, it may be affirmed without hesitation that Congress may repeal or fix the time for the termination of war-time legislation. Such is purely a legislative function. The Congress now has, and has ever had since enactment, the undisputed authority to terminate any or all of the emergency acts. It is in no way dependent on the state of war. The majority party has been in control since May, 1919, during the entire life of the Sixty-sixth Congress, and could have repealed any act at its election. It easily can be demonstrated that the only legitimate objects of the resolution are embraced in section 2, if the section can be considered as properly drawn, to effectuate the repeal of legislation, but being connected and intertwined with the unlawful sections will be invalid and ineffective. It may be observed, however, that those features of war legislation which affect the status of alien property in the custody of the United States and that of the German ships ought not to be repealed or terminated at this time, until through orderly processes a settlement regarding them can be had with Germany. I am in hearty sympathy with the repeal of restrictive measures. But it would seem much better that a substitute should be adopted, and one will be offered, providing for the termination of emergency legislation, but preserving such as those indicated. Further than this we are powerless to go.

Our examination now leads to section 3, which should properly be considered in connection with section 5.

Those of us who oppose, insist that these sections, taken together with the treaty of Versailles, constitute the terms and stipulations of a treaty which is sought to be established. Gentlemen, on that side of the House, will with vehemence seek to answer all of the argument and authority which may be adduced in denial of the authority of Congress to treat or contract with a foreign power by boldly and bluntly maintaining that a treaty is not to be made. That the subject may be approached in logical and appropriate sequence, let us first inquire "what is a treaty," then analyze the facts as to whether a treaty is contemplated and then inquire "has Congress the power to make a treaty."

Webster defines a treaty as "An agreement between two or more independent States."

A treaty may be defined to be a compact between nation and nation. (Tucker on the Constitution.)

Treaty is international compact. The root of the word indicates negotiation between two or more. In itself, treaty is a bargain, not law. (Tucker.)

A treaty is primarily a contract between two or more independent nations and is so regarded by writers on public law. (Whitney v. Robertson, 124 U. S., 194. Head Money Cases, 112 U. S.)

A contract or compact or agreement imports a mutuality or a meeting of minds of two or more parties thereto. One party agrees to do or to forego doing some particular thing, while the other agrees to do or to forego doing some other thing. A contract or agreement may be evidenced by one written instrument, or it may be evidenced by two or more instruments, such as an interchange of letters or diplomatic notes, or a contract in the common acceptation may arise through words spoken or acts done. Every layman knows that by a letter he may make a proposal to another party, which, when accepted by another letter, rises to the dignity of a contract whose terms are defined by construing the two letters together. A contract may likewise be consummated by an exchange of telegrams. An order for goods may be forwarded by mail or telegraph, to which no reply may be made by the recipient other than by promptly shipping the goods, but a contract or agreement immediately arises.

These principles apply generally to all contracts and agreements. Whenever the minds of the parties concur or agree a contract or compact comes into being.

May we not dissect these sections and determine whether or not reciprocal action is expected by two Governments, and whether or not it is intended that each shall govern its conduct by the conduct of the other, predicated upon this resolution. For a moment look beyond the specious and seductive appearance of its fair-sounding terms; pull aside the diaphanous veil that cloaks the bronze that lies at the heart of these sections. [Applause.]

A proposal is made to Germany "that unless within 45 days from the date when this resolution becomes effective the German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States, and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles"—certain things may happen. She is given the option to accept or reject the proposal. She may exercise complete liberty of action; she may agree to the contract, but if she fails to do so "the President of the United States shall have the power, and it shall be his duty, to proclaim the fact that the German Government has not given the notification hereinbefore mentioned, and thereupon, and until the President shall have proclaimed the receipt of such notification, commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany, and the making of loans or credits, and the furnishing of financial assistance or supplies to the German Government or the inhabitants of Germany, directly or indirectly, by the Government or the inhabitants of the United States shall, except with the license of the President, be prohibited."

It has already been pointed out that a party to a contract may agree to forego the doing of an act in consideration of the doing of an act by the other party. Assuming that we have the power and the right to absolutely cut off Germany from all intercourse, is it not proposed that if Germany will consent to the terms of the treaty of Versailles, so far as it may confer advantages on the United States and its nationals, that as a consideration for such agreement, as its price, we shall forego the exercise of the right which we possess to deny to her intercourse and remove from her the threat which is so bravely asserted? Can there be any dispute that the real purpose is either to induce or require the German Government to do an affirmative act—the acknowledgment of its obligation under the treaty—in barter, in bargain, and in exchange, for the promise voiced in the resolution that the United States will forego the destruction of German commerce with the United States? Suppose for a moment that at the peace table the same proposition should have been made to Germany—"sign the treaty or we shall commercially destroy you"—and she had signed, or admitted its obligations, would this not have constituted a treaty, an agreement? It will be borne in mind that the whole contract or agreement need not be expressed in the same instrument. So, in this instance, the proposal is contained in the resolution; the acceptance will be the acceptance by Germany of the treaty which she has already signed and a copy of which is in our possession.

Most treaties of peace are dictated by force—the vanquished usually assumes all of the obligations, while the victor merely refrains from further military pressure and makes no promises conferring benefits on the conquered. It is not competent to say that because the United States does not assume any obligations under the treaty of Versailles that it, when accepted by Germany under this resolution, is not a treaty. If there be any terms in the original treaty imposing obligations on the United States, eliminate them, and the remainder of the treaty, so far as it affects Germany and the United States, taken together with this resolution, constitute not the old treaty but a new and entire treaty or agreement or compact between two independent nations. It can not be said that it will not eventuate in a treaty because Germany may not accept. If that eventuality is contemplated, nevertheless it is a negotiation for a treaty, which is as much beyond our province as the making of a treaty. It will be noted that the act requires no act by the President in negotiating with Germany; all he is to do is to inflict the penalty.

Is there any substantial difference between holding Germany by the throat with an army and saying, "Sign here," and threatening her with the starvation of her people and the destruction of her commerce as proposed, and saying, "You must acknowledge the obligations in so far as they are beneficial to the United States"? Does not this constitute a compact or contract between nations, just as though negotiated and agreed upon by diplomats across a table? There are present the elements of mutuality—the action of one contingent on the promise of another. The essentials of bargain, trade, and barter are at the very surface of the resolution, whose force and purpose are based and predicated on a promise and action thereunder by one particular and denominated foreign power, whose promise and anticipated action, in turn, are to be based and predicated upon action taken or threatened and defined in the terms of this act. Can there be anyone so brazen or ingenuous as to assert that the genuine purpose is not to accomplish an agreement with Germany?

To those who say that no treaty is to be made let me inquire. The treaty of Versailles, if ratified by the United States, would be a binding and legal treaty, would it not? But hereafter, so far as Germany's obligations to the United States are concerned, it is to be as binding as though ratified. Then, will it not be a treaty between the United States and Germany? To whom will the obligations which Germany may assume be due—to the United States? Where are those obligations defined? In the treaty of Versailles. Suppose Germany violates the rights of some American citizen, where will you look to find the character of obligation which Germany violated? Will you simply look to this act, or must you not look to the treaty of Versailles. [Applause.]

The very fact that this act proposes to induce or compel Germany to avow her willingness to observe the treaty imports the expectation of benefit to be derived therefrom by the United States. If the treaty of Versailles were now a treaty between the United States and Germany, the fact that the United States will be released from obligation under it will not change the fact that it will remain a treaty upon Germany assenting to the amendment. The contract may consist in part of this act and in part of the treaty, just as it might consist of two diplomatic notes exchanged between us. We send Germany by cable this resolution; she sends back acceptance of the treaty of Versailles. Is there not a meeting of the minds; is not an agreement created whose terms are defined by the two instruments?

It is not a question of the degree of obligation or the extent of benefit; all of the one may be in one party and all of the other in the remaining party. As has heretofore been observed, an agreement may place all of the obligations on one party. An ordinary promissory note is a familiar example; it is only signed by the maker, but is construed to be a written contract enforceable between the parties. In the present instance our armies are now on German soil. By this resolution we agree to end the war with Germany, and there of course arises implied obligation on our part to withdraw our troops. The test is whether there is an agreement between two nations; the fact that the obligations imposed are owing by one to the other, and that to determine the character of rights conferred or duties enjoined recourse must be had to such agreement. Measured by this standard there certainly will be a treaty. If it be not a treaty—no agreement—then Germany, not being bound, could withdraw at any time. Will anyone claim that she could do so without violating a treaty? If an American right should be violated, the United States would demand redress of Germany. Suppose Germany should deny liability. Our reply would be, "You agreed to abide by the treaty." If she should then assert that this resolution and her agreement is not a treaty, we should, of course, answer, "Whether you call it a treaty or a resolution or legislation, you 'agreed and contracted' to observe the treaty, and you are bound. If you break your promise, you will justify a renewal of the war by the United States." Will anyone longer deny what is so plain? If not a treaty, it is nothing—a vain thing, a fraud, a pretense, a hypocritical deception, and a deliberate delusion. [Applause.]

If the authors of the resolution would but come out in the open and not seek longer to dissemble, we might proceed mutually to inquire, Has Congress the power to make a treaty? But they refuse to go beyond a denial that a treaty is contemplated. Believing, however, that the country is more candid and is not actuated by the motives and necessities that compel the majority party, I shall hope to here set down the answer to that question.

At the very threshold I invite attention to the debates in the Constitutional Convention. Madison's Journal on September 7, 1887, relates that—

> The fourth section, to wit, "The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall have power to make treaties," etc., was then taken up.
> Mr. Wilson moved to add after the word "Senate" the words "and House of Representatives." As treaties, he said, are to have the operation of laws, they ought to have the sanction of laws also. The circumstance of secrecy in the business of treaties formed the only objection; but this, he thought, so far as it was inconsistent with obtaining the legislative sanction, was outweighed by the necessity of the latter.
> Mr. Sherman thought the only question that could be made was whether the power could be safely trusted to the Senate. He thought it could, and that the necessity of secrecy in the case of treaties forbade a reference of them to the whole Legislature.
> Mr. Fitzsimmons seconded the motion of Mr. Wilson; and, on the question—ayes 1, noes 10.

There was definitely denied to the House of Representatives participation in the making or ratification of treaties, and the question was removed forever beyond the zone of doubt.

The discussions in the Federalist papers unmistakably disclose that there existed no question concerning the exclusive grant of the treaty-making power to the President and the Senate at the time of its submission to and ratification by the States.

Tucker, in speaking of the objects to be accomplished by treaties, says:

> This object, as all those mentioned, must be the result not of the will of one nation alone, but of the concurrent will of two nations. The power to make the contract is given neither to the legislative nor to the executive department alone, but to a combination of the two, by intrusting it to the President and the Senate. (Tucker on the Constitution.)

Halleck's International Law:

> By the Constitution of the United States of America, the President has the exclusive power of making treaties of peace, which, when ratified with the advice and consent of the Senate, become the supreme law of the land—

And so forth; but observes that Congress may compel the President to make peace by refusing the means of carrying on the war.

We have heard the voices of many distinguished men who are now in the grave. It will be interesting to hear one who yet is in our midst, and who perhaps collaborated in the preparation of the resolution.

In Senate Document No. 104, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, entitled "The Treaty-Making Powers of the Senate," Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE quotes the following from Curtis's Constitutional History of the United States:

> The power to make treaties, which had been given to the Senate by the Committee of Detail, and which was afterwards transferred to the President, to be exercised with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, was thus modified on account of the changes which the plan of government had undergone, and which have been previously explained. The power to declare war having been vested in the whole Legislature, it was necessary to provide the mode in which a war was to be terminated. As the President was to be the organ of communication with other Governments, and as he would be the general guardian of the national interests, the negotiation of a treaty of peace and of all other treaties was necessarily confided to him.

The following is the language of Senator LODGE himself:

> The obvious fact that the President must be the representative of the country in all dealings with foreign nations, and that the Senate, in its very nature, could not, like the Chief Executive, initiate and conduct negotiations, compelled the convention to confer upon him an equal share in the power to make treaties.

One of the striking and among the most distinctive characteristics of the Constitution is its distribution of the powers of government. It does not vest the identical power in separate departments to be exercised by each independently of the other. The treaty-making power, vested in the President and the Senate, is vested nowhere else.

> The great powers of the Government are divided into separate departments, and, so far as these powers are derived from the Constitution, the departments may be regarded as independent of each other. (Kendall v. U. S. ex rel. Stokes, 12 Pet., 254; 9:1181.)
> The legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the Government are potentially coextensive. (Per Marshall, Ch. J. Osborn v. Bank of U. S. 9 Wheat. 738; 6:204.)

The President possesses the authority and the discretion to make or not to make a treaty as he may choose, contingent alone upon the consent of two-thirds of the Senate to such as he may make. He may be willing to conclude a treaty upon stated terms, but on other terms may be absolutely unwilling to sign. If such be the case he may decline to conclude it, and remain clearly within his constitutional prerogative. But if Congress may make a treaty by joint resolution and the President disapprove it, two-thirds of both Houses may pass the measure over his veto and thus make effective a compact violative of the will of the creator of all constitutional treaties.

How can the language, "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties," be reconciled to the making of a treaty by two-thirds of both Houses, over his protest, and in defiance of his will? The Senate can not "make" a treaty, though it may "unmake" one by withholding its consent. Its function is limited to giving or refusing its "advice and consent." Until the President negotiates the compact it can not consent. Consent does not imply initiative—it does not imply affirmative action—but merely assent or acquiescence in what has been already initiated or proposed by another.

On the other hand, if it could be maintained that Congress can by joint resolution either make or ratify a treaty, let us assume a case in which the President is anxious to secure ratification of a treaty, but can not secure the vote of two-thirds of the Senate. In that event and in the assumed case only, Congress by a bare majority of each House—perhaps a partisan majority—could ratify a treaty by joint resolution, which only requires a majority, in defiance of the Constitution, which in the most solemn and binding fashion requires the consent of two-thirds of the Senate to give validity to a treaty.

In 1795 Washington concluded the Jay treaty with Great Britain, which was ratified by the Senate. In 1796 the House of Representatives passed a resolution requesting him to lay before it the papers and correspondence pertaining thereto. His opinion was that the power of making treaties is exclusively vested in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. With some further remarks he concluded by observing that as it was perfectly clear to his understanding that the consent of the House of Representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty, as the treaty with Great Britain exhibited in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for could throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of a government that the boundaries fixed by the Constitution between the different departments should be preserved, a just regard to the Constitution and the duties of his office forbade a compliance with their request. (Message Mar. 30, 1796, and Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 5.)

It may perhaps be urged that the joint resolutions of Congress providing for the admission of Texas into the Union furnish a precedent in that by the resolution of March 1, 1845, proposals were made by Congress to the Republic of Texas for admission into the Union, and that Texas, having accepted the proposals, was admitted by resolution of December 29, 1845. The complete answer is that the treaty-making power operates on the subjects properly within its scope only to such extent as is not prohibited or qualified by some other clause or provision of the Constitution. Thus the President and Senate may not by treaty provide that slavery may be established in a State nor that a State may have other than a republican form of government nor that trial by jury shall be denied. Other clauses of the Constitution of dignity equal to that of the clause creating the treaty-making agency deny the existence anywhere of the power to do such things. Article IV, section 3, of the Constitution provides "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Thus the power to admit new States is plainly lodged in Congress. Such power, being in Congress, can only be exercised by Congress and not by the President and Senate alone. In enacting the joint resolutions of March 1 and December 29, 1845, the Congress acted within its constitutional authority; it did not pretend to act in a capacity other than that defined in section 3, Article IV. It would have been competent for the President to negotiate a treaty, but its terms could not have been put into effect except through subsequent legislation by Congress conformable thereto. As illustrative of this principle, it may be noted that the treaty with France for the cession of Louisiana was concluded April 30, 1803; ratified, October 20, 1803. Congress on October 31 passed a law authorizing the President to take charge of said territory. As to the treaty with Spain for Florida Congress, on March 3, 1819, passed a similar act. The Ashburton treaty of 1842 fixed the boundaries of Maine and Canada. The Oregon boundary in 1846 and that between Mexico and the United States were adjusted by treaty, and Congress passed acts authorizing the President to take possession. In 1867 Alaska was secured from Russia by treaty; the Philippines were similarly acquired from Spain. These territories were not added as States, but are instanced as indicating the propriety of securing territory by treaty.

It is contended that the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S.) supplies a precedent for legislation of this character. Congress passed a tariff act in which the President was authorized to "suspend" the operation of the act permitting imports under favorable conditions as to a country which should adopt restrictions on American commerce which "he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable," and so forth. An attempt will be made to demonstrate that this was tantamount to a proposal by Congress to foreign nations of terms upon which trade and commerce might mutually be carried on, and in the event of acceptance by a foreign power would amount to an agreement similar to that proposed to be accomplished by sections 3 and 5 of the present resolution. The act was attacked not upon the ground that it constituted an infringement of the treaty-making power—and that question was not involved in the decision—but on the theory that it delegated legislative power to the President to determine the existence of facts authorizing the suspension of the act and in exercising the power of suspension. But, again, let me remind gentlemen that the treaty power is qualified and limited by other clauses of the Constitution. Section 8, article 1, provides:

> The Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, etc. * * * To regulate commerce with foreign nations—

And so forth.

Congress was undertaking to exercise such power in enacting the tariff law discussed in Field v. Clark (143 U. S.). Congress was not assuming to negotiate a treaty, but was legislating. Though a treaty affecting tariff duties or foreign commerce might properly be negotiated by the President and ratified by the Senate, yet in the respects in which it might affect the authority of Congress to levy tariff duties or to regulate commerce the consent of Congress would be necessary to carry out the treaty, not in the exercise of a treaty power nor in the form of a ratification of the treaty, but in the form of supplementary legislation to carry into effect the terms of the agreement with another nation. A treaty might embrace other subjects concerning which the Congress need not be consulted, but as to those matters peculiarly within its legislative sphere its legislative but not treaty-making consent would be necessary. A treaty regularly and constitutionally concluded might provide for the payment by the United States of a sum of money, and while the treaty would be complete in itself, its undertaking could not be fulfilled until Congress, not in a treaty-making capacity but in its legislative capacity, should appropriate the money.

Congress has power to enact tariff legislation providing reciprocity clauses by which preferential duties may be allowed to countries which conform their own regulations thereto. However, there is no contractual or treaty relation established thereby. The country which adjusts its commerce to our stipulations does not "promise" or "agree" or bind itself to continue to maintain such duties, but has complete liberty to abandon such preferential tariffs or continue. On our own part, there is no contract or agreement to permit the continuance of such arrangement. Any act of legislation is always dependent for its operation upon the acts of parties who may or may not by their conduct bring themselves within the operation of the laws. The operation of criminal laws depend upon the act of individuals in bringing themselves within their scope by committing or refraining from committing prohibited acts. Civil laws operate in the same way. Congress may attach conditions or stipulations as to the entry of goods and tariff duties, within the operation of which nations may bring themselves by meeting the conditions, but there is neither privity of contract nor obligation nor agreement created whose violation would be considered a breach either of honor or of law. Legislation affecting only duties and imposts, as to which Congress has power to legislate, is quite another thing from a treaty of peace with Germany affecting termination of war, the rights and status of citizens of each country, immovable and movable property situate in each country, over none of which Congress has authority. In Altman v. United States (224 U. S.), a commercial agreement under the tariff act of 1897 is held to be a treaty, though not submitted for ratification, Congress having acted in advance, and no question having been raised as to the necessity therefor.

As the treaty-making power is limited by the power of Congress to regulate tariffs, to the extent that the President may not make a treaty, even though ratified by the Senate, affecting tariffs, without the "consent" of the House, the power of the Congress to regulate or suspend tariffs in turn is limited by the treaty "making" power to the extent that Congress can not itself "make" a treaty regarding even tariff duties. It may legislate but not make treaties. The grants are of equal force and must be construed together.

Mr. Tucker, in his work on Constitutional Law (vol. 2, p. 354), places it beyond the pale of cavil—

> For example, Congress has power to levy and collect duties; the President and Senate have power to make and contract with a foreign nation in respect to such duties. Can any other construction be given to these two apparently contradictory powers than that the general power to make treaties must yield to the specific power of Congress to levy and collect all duties; and while the treaty may prepare or contract as to duties on articles coming from a foreign nation, such an executory contract can not be valid and binding unless Congress, which has supreme authority to levy and collect duties, consents to it. If it is then asked how are you to reconcile these two powers which appear to be antagonistic, the answer is clear.
> Congress has no capacity to negotiate a treaty with a foreign power. The extent of its membership makes this impracticable. The Constitution, therefore, left the House of Representatives out of all consideration in negotiating treaties. The executory contract between the United States and a foreign nation is therefore confided to the one man who can conduct the negotiations and to a select body who can advise and consent to the treaty he has negotiated. But this executory contract must depend for its execution upon the supreme power vested in Congress "to levy and collect duties."
> It is therefore a contract not completed, but inchoate, and can only be completed and binding when Congress shall, by legislation, consent thereto and levy duties in accordance with the executory contract or treaty.

To the same effect is Foster v. Neilson (2 Pet., 314), where Judge Marshall says:

> A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, not a legislative act, and does not generally effect of itself the object to be accomplished but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument.

How comprehensive is its scope is stated in Wheaton's Elements (p. 329):

> The power "to make treaties" is, by the Constitution, general; and, of course, it embraces all sorts of treaties, for peace or war, for commerce or territory, for alliance or succors; for indemnity for injuries or payment of debts; for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law; and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may dictate in their intercourse with each other.

Some gentlemen justify a vote for the resolution by an admission that in the first instance and primarily the right to declare peace and to negotiate treaties is in the President and Senate, but aver that, such agency having failed to declare peace or to ratify the treaty, the duty to do so devolves upon Congress. The error of such a contention is easily exposed. If the organic law contemplated such a devolution, it would have so provided. The existence of such a power in the Congress would necessarily imply or draw with it the further power to judge as to when or how the President or the Senate may fail to properly exercise that or any other function; it would invest the Congress with a complete and supreme supervision over the treaty-making power, the full and unbridled discretion in one branch of the Government to review and reverse the actions of another "coordinate" branch. With equal logic each department could assert similar pretensions as to all others. Each would collide with and neutralize the activities of others. The absurdity of such a conception is obvious.

Neither judicial decision nor commentary, though multiplied, can make more perspicuous the words of the Constitution. Nothing can be added to the simple, explicit, and unequivocal text of the instrument itself. Nothing is needed to clarify that which is already clear. In the presence of its lucid and luminous language the Congress must confess its own utter impotence to either declare the war to be at an end or make peace, or make a treaty with Germany. Let us, for the moment, consider the position in which the enactment of the resolution would place the United States and their people in the event Germany should decline to accept proposals that are made. At the end of 45 days commercial intercourse between the United States and Germany becomes unlawful and those who may engage in it, without the license of the President, may be deemed guilty of crime. At this moment American beef and meat and food and cotton and other raw materials and manufactured goods are going to German markets. Trade must be stimulated and increased if we are to compete in the markets of Europe.

Great Britain and France have resumed commerce with Germany.

Is a partisan majority, to promote its political ambitions and to gratify its rancor, prepared to cut off all trade with Germany, to visit their country with such a commercial plague? Is it prepared to blight and blast the business of the United States, or will it betray the welfare of the whole people and permit England and France to preempt the entire German trade merely for the sake of a desperate and hypocritical political maneuver?

Regardless of Germany's action under section 3, it is declared in section 1 that the state of war is at an end. Should Germany decline to act under section 3 what is to become of the German ships seized and taken over by the United States? What will be the status of the millions of dollars' worth of alien property now in the custody of the United States? What will become of the property of American citizens which was taken over by the German Government and is now in its custody? Thus would be suspended, like Mohamet's coffin, these questions, between a state of war and a state of peace, unsettled and undetermined. Would the old treaty between Prussia and the United States revive or would it be no longer effective? These are problems that will rise to vex and confound our citizens if the measure should be enacted.

What will be the relations of the United States to the Allies without an agreement or convention to settle them? Obviously the United States can claim no right based solely on the treaty as against the Allies, because she has not ratified the treaty. However, the treaty is already effective between Germany and the Allies. By its terms Germany deals with the Allies as an entity. The reparations and indemnities to be paid by Germany are to be adjusted by the reparations commission and not severally by Germany and the respective States. This is but an instance of the difficulties that this resolution invites. Many others equally embarrassing could be enumerated.

There is another phase of the matter that must not be overlooked. If the state of war with Germany could be brought to an end would there then be peace? The United States is now, and has been since December 7, 1917, at war with Austria. The resolution does not seek to end that state of war, but is limited in its application to the case of Germany. This is but an illustration of the pretense and the insincerity of this resolution. Though it pretends to bring peace, by its terms it provides there shall be no peace.

Of all reasons and arguments professed by proponents of the resolution, some specious, others chimerical, others wearing the attractive garb of sophistry, but of such delicate texture as to reveal every lineament of limb and figure, none is so persuasive or potential as the one motive which has not been openly avowed—that of party expediency.

Gentlemen may delude themselves, they may beguile their own fancy, they may obfuscate their own minds, as to their powers and purposes, but they can neither deceive nor mislead the American people. The whole country, lawyer and layman alike, already is aware that the President and Senate can alone accomplish what is now demanded by the majority. One of the surest proofs lies in the fact that it has required two weeks' labor by the brightest minds and the dullest consciences in the Republican Party to draft the resolution in terms that would not provoke intellectual nausea in their own ranks. [Applause.] The people of the United States want peace. The general verdict is that the treaty of peace should have been ratified in some form—and it may be conceded that the Senate has so far failed to meet the expectations of the country that the treaty would through compromise finally be ratified with reasonable reservations and that the stubborn minds which clashed over its terms might in wisdom and patriotism have found a common ground of agreement. That does not justify the House in usurping a function that does not lie within its jurisdiction. Whatever our private or individual views as to ratification with or without reservations or as to the form of reservations or as to the whole treaty matter may be, officially and as the House they are not of our concern. They are exclusively within the domain of the Senate and the President. That agency having failed to agree on the treaty as originally drafted and having failed to agree on reservations, the responsibility rests there and must so remain. It is hoped that by this resolution the country may be hypnotized into the belief that a way has been found that leads out of the difficulty. It is sought to induce into the public mind the fiction that there is peace and that a settlement of the war's issues has been made.

Gentlemen who drafted the resolution dismissed the Constitution and the law of nations from their councils. I solemnly warn you that in times like the present—with the world seething with unrest—the Constitution is a wiser and safer counsellor than hate or revenge. Amidst the passions and storms of faction the Constitution is the only safe and sure and secure refuge. It is the only unwavering compass in the tempest of these times. Against its living light, against the opinions of its makers, against the overwhelming opinions of commentators, and the solemn judgments of the Supreme Court, gentlemen on that side of the chamber set up the opinion of their steering committee—an unofficial body that owes no allegiance save that of party—a hand-picked seven who meet behind closed doors, and drawn blinds, and with blinded eyes and whispering voices, and ears heedless to every voice save that of partisan advantage, decide and decree and issue an edict that Congress has the power to declare and to make a peace treaty with a foreign power.

Before you commit such a blunder contemplate the spectacle our country will present to the world. Confessedly we shall stand convicted by our own verdict of failure under our democratic Constitution; we shall appear in the unenviable light of renouncing every obligation of the treaty and at the same time claiming every benefit and advantage which it confers; we shall be in the attitude of starving the women and children of our beaten enemy unless she releases the United States from every provision of the compact which was dictated in part by the United States and to which Germany gave her assent, believing that we would keep the faith. Are you willing to set America so circumstanced before the judgment bar of history? [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution which crystallized its principles and wove them into the fiber of this great Government's structure epitomize our conception of democracy and free institutions. Of the former Buckle, the Englishman, exclaims:

> In 1776 the Americans laid before Europe that noble declaration, which ought to be hung up in the nursery of every king and blazoned on the porch of every royal palace.

Of the latter Mr. Gladstone once said:

> The most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man.

The obligations and the duties enjoined by and the limitations of that solemn and sacred charter we are severally sworn to observe and uphold. When we usurp a power not delegated to Congress by that instrument we exercise tyranny no less than the Executive or the judiciary when either passes beyond the limits of its authority. Congress becomes a despot the instant it crosses the boundary of its power; it sins against the people the moment it transgresses the power which the people placed elsewhere, power which, though exercised by the President and the Senate as constitutional agents, is the people's. Congress breaks its faith with the people when its arm invades a jurisdiction not its own. This has been the conviction of American statesmen from Washington until now. It was to vindicate the right of our people to live under the Constitution and to secure foreign respect for them under the law of nations that Congress declared war. This resolution transgresses both. It was to preserve their sanctity that America poured out without stint its resources and its wealth; in their name Congress summoned from their homes her best and bravest to lay down their lives on foreign soil or to wear all the way to the tomb in their maimed bodies the badge of courage; they answered the summons and across the face of Europe blazed a path of glory. On every fighting field from Cantigny to the Argonne they gathered up the richest garlands of victory, the acclaim and applause and gratitude of a world, and laid them at their country's feet.

What shall you say to the living, what shall you say at the grave of those who sleep in France, if you violate that for which they fought and died? [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, the armistice with Germany was signed November 11, 1918. The treaty with Germany was signed by the powers June 28, 1919. The treaty was presented to the Senate by the President in person July 10, 1919. It was rejected after several months' debate on November 19, 1919. After again having been taken up and further debated for many weeks it was again rejected exactly four months later, on March 19, 1920. On the same day the Senate ordered the return of the treaty to the President, with the information that it had failed to advise and consent to the ratification, being unable to obtain the constitutional majority of two-thirds.

There is now no German treaty pending before the Senate. I deeply deplore the failure of the treaty. I believe strongly that the failure is a calamity to the United States and to the world. From the point of view of this Nation we are left in a state of uncertainty; our status partakes both of war and of peace; business, and especially foreign business, is uncertain and anxious; domestic affairs generally, and the viewpoint of our people, are adversely affected because a formal peace has not yet been achieved. Furthermore, most thoughtful Americans recognize that we have an obligation to the rest of the world. They may differ as to the degree and nature of the obligation, but they are in accord as to the fact of its existence. Without the definite fixing of our rights, which can come only with the formal conclusion of the state of war, it is impossible for us to do what we might otherwise deem it our duty to do to promote the well-being of the rest of the world.

But the treaty has failed, and as far as we can now foresee, irrevocably failed. Why? The responsibility is upon the head of one man, and that man is the President of the United States. Although the Senate is, by the Constitution itself, of equal power and importance in the making of treaties, the President demanded from the outset that the Senate should ratify his treaty "without changing the dotting of an 'i' or the crossing of a 't.'" A majority of the Senate considered it its duty to attach reservations. This majority was made up of members of both the political parties in the Senate. These reservations, speaking generally, were intended to safeguard the sovereignty, the well-being, and even the existence of the United States in the new and perilous adventure involved in its membership in the League of Nations. I personally believed in the treaty, but I believed also that several of the reservations were essential to our national safety.

With the reservations attached the treaty, as we know, failed of the necessary two-thirds vote. The administration Senators, acting in accordance with the instructions of the White House, refused to accede to the reservation program. The reason for the attitude of these Senators was concisely stated by Senator OWEN, himself a loyal Democrat, just before the final vote was taken. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mar. 19, 1920, p. 4596:)

> I do not believe there is a single Democratic Senator who would not vote for this resolution of ratification if it were not for the belief of such Senators that the President of the United States desires them to defeat the resolution of ratification now pending and would regard their failure to do so as a refusal to follow his view as party leader.

Thus, in the opinion of an eminent Democratic Senator, speaking solemnly and after much reflection, the failure is solely attributable to the demands of the President for unconditional ratification, which demand was unwillingly acquiesced in by men who put party loyalty before loyalty to their country.

The result, I say, is deplorable. A comprehensive treaty of peace, with proper safeguards to this Nation—all of which would have been cordially acquiesced in by the other powers—was and is supremely desirable from the standpoint of the United States and of the world. But owing solely to the obstinacy of one man, and that man the President of the United States, our hopes for a treaty with Germany have, for the present at least, been dashed to the ground.

Now arises the question, What is the next best thing to repair the havoc that the President has wrought? After the treaty failed in November I considered, and even drew up, a resolution of peace. But because I was anxious that no possible obstacle should be raised in the path of the treaty, and because I still hoped against hope that a way out might be found, I refrained from introducing my proposal. At this moment, however, nothing is pending before the Senate; we must all sadly recognize the indisputable fact that the treaty is dead.

And so, as I say, we have sought for the next best thing, fully conscious that nothing can be so satisfactory or so normal as the conclusion of peace by formal treaty.

Even before the form in which our resolution is now cast was known even to those engaged in its preparation, we were officially informed that whatever the nature of the resolution was, it would have the bitter opposition of President Wilson. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD], ranking Democrat on the Foreign Affairs Committee, conferred with Secretary of State Colby, whose mind in this important matter certainly "goes along with" that of the President. According to press reports Mr. FLOOD said "Mr. Colby was of the decided opinion that a resolution declaring peace would be unconstitutional." Thus, before the resolution was even drafted, before anyone knew what it would contain, the administration had prejudged the case and had decided that, whatever the resolution said, it would be unconstitutional. In other words, the same mind that deliberately wrecked the treaty has now determined deliberately to wreck the next best thing. I question whether this premature verdict of opposition to any proposal whatever will commend itself to a country which is crying aloud for peace. The incident, however, is interesting as illustrating the state of mind of a person who can not tolerate anything which is not the child of his own brain, a state of mind which, in the opinion of Senator OWEN, forced many Senators to deny against their will what is supremely desirable for a war-tossed country and world.

Let us see what this resolution does. It declares at an end the state of war recognized by the joint resolution of Congress of April 6, 1917. Congress then declared that the state of war with Germany, forced upon the United States by Germany, was an existing thing. It certainly seems reasonable to assume that Congress shall have a constitutional right to terminate that which it initiated or recognized as a fact to exist. If Congress has not this right, it follows that the President may keep the country in a state of war indefinitely. Certainly no such power is vested in common sense or can be found granted to the President by the Constitution. Similarly, it seems highly reasonable that Congress should have the right to repeal that which it itself passed. And this is all that section 1 does.

But Secretary Colby—without, to be sure, having any idea exactly what was contemplated—delivers a blanket utterance that the plan is unconstitutional. He presumably bases his opinion upon the assumption, first, that a war must be terminated by a treaty of peace, and, second, that under the Constitution a treaty must be negotiated by the President and ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. If his first assumption were well founded, the second unquestionably would follow as a matter of course. The fact is, as the Secretary of State should have well known, that a war may be concluded by other means than by a treaty of peace. Hence, his second assertion falls to the ground, for the President and Senate have not power over peace as such, but only over a peace which is predicated upon a treaty.

It thus becomes important to examine the numerous precedents illustrating the ending of war without treaty. Before proceeding, however, it may be well to reiterate that a treaty of peace is unquestionably the normal and the desirable method of concluding war. I still hope that a formal treaty may in the future be ratified. It is only when for some reason a treaty of peace proves impracticable that recourse is had to other methods.

Perhaps the most interesting precedent for our purpose is the situation which arose in the sixties as a result of the war between Peru and Chile on the one hand and Spain on the other. In 1868 actual hostilities had been terminated about two years. Peru had purchased of the United States two monitors, which were awaiting delivery in New Orleans. If a state of war was still operative, it was improper for the United States, as a neutral, to make delivery. If war had ended—which was claimed, although no treaty of peace had been executed—delivery was perfectly proper. The minister from Spain to the United States protested against the delivery by us which was then anticipated, on the ground that war was still continuing. Secretary of State Seward replied, on July 9, 1868, in part, as follows:

> The situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences.

Here we have a formal recognition by an American Secretary of State of the fact that a war need not be ended by treaty.

As a matter of fact, as Secretary Seward said, history is full of such instances. Sometimes peace comes as a result of a long-continued drift from a state of war into a state of peace, the consequence either of the exhaustion of the belligerents, of distaste for the war, or of some other change of circumstances which makes the prosecution of the war impossible or undesirable. Sometimes peace comes as a result of the conquest and subjugation—often followed by annexation—of one of the powers by the other.

Historic instances of a drift into peace are the following:

1716. Sweden against Poland. (An armistice was signed when hostilities actually ended, but it was 10 years before anything like a treaty resulted.)

1720. Spain against France. (Both nations withdrew their forces.)

1801. Russia against Persia.

1825. Spain against her revolted colonies in South America. (The war of independence began about 1810; hostilities ceased about 1825. But Spain did not recognize the independence of the South American Republics or resume diplomatic intercourse with them until the decade beginning in 1840.)

1866. Prussia against Lichtenstein.

1866. Spain against Chile and Peru. (See Seward note mentioned above.)

1867. France against Mexico. (Amicable intercourse was not completely restored until 1886.)

Historic instances of the ending of war by subjugation of one of the belligerents are:

The war resulting in the third partition of Poland in 1794 and 1795.

The subjugation of Hesse-Cassel by France during the Napoleonic era.

The various subjugations by Great Britain in Heligoland, India, and, in 1885, Upper Burma.

The subjugation by Sardinia, in 1859 and 1860, of the two Sicilies, Tuscany, Parma, and Modena.

The termination of the American Civil War in 1865. (This instance may not be precisely in point, because the United States regarded the Civil War as an insurrection and not as an actual war.)

The subjugation by Prussia in 1866 of Hanover, Nassau, Hesse-Cassel, and the free city of Frankfort.

Some of the campaigns of Russia in central Asia resulted in annexation of certain areas there without a treaty of peace of any kind.

The most recent instance is that of the conquest, subjugation, and annexation by Great Britain of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal, as a result of the Boer War in the early part of this century.

The foregoing instances, then, are illustrative of wars which have been ended without a treaty. International lawyers and jurists have recognized for centuries that a war may be so ended. As Secretary Seward stated in his note:

> What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

The facts in the particular case now before us are very extraordinary and conclusive. A year and one-half has elapsed since the armistice. At that time President Wilson advised Congress: "The war thus comes to an end; * * * it will be impossible for the German command to renew it." The armistice has been complied with. The war in which we were engaged was not a separate war, but was war carried on by us jointly with other nations in which our armies took part in the same military operations under the same supreme command, and all of the other and associated nations have formally ended the war by treaty with Germany. Peace has been thus formally and definitively established through the entire theater of the war. There are no outstanding demands on our part against Germany or on the part of Germany against us which would warrant a resumption of hostilities. The questions which prevented our treaty-making power from ratifying the treaty of peace with Germany were not questions between the United States and Germany. The Imperial German Government, against which in terms our Congress declared war, has ceased to exist, and a republic has taken its place. The Army which Congress raised and supported for the purpose of the war has been brought home and demobilized, as stated by the President in his veto of the Volstead Act on October 27 last. Commercial relations between the people of the United States and of Germany have been resumed. Over and over again has the President in formal utterances declared to Congress that the war was ended, and, indeed, that peace had actually come.

Because of these reasons, among others, the world will agree that as a fact the war has long since ended. The President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. He has assured us and reiterated that the war is ended. Congress surely has the right and the obligation to take him at his word. Otherwise war might last forever, with no possibility of the representatives of the United States being able to terminate it. The logic of the situation is inevitable, even if Congress had not itself been responsible, in April, 1917, for the recognition that a state of war had been forced upon the United States. What Congress did it can also undo. What it began, or declared to have begun, it can terminate.

Of course, if a war could be ended only by treaty, Congress as such could not speak, because the Constitution provides another way of making a treaty. But, as we have seen, a treaty is only one way of several ways by which a war may be ended. The collateral facts which warrant in this case the conclusive presumption and recognition that war has ended are probably stronger than in any instance in the history of the world. As President Wilson put it on December 2, 1918, in his annual address to Congress, "The armistice * * * is in effect a complete submission of the enemy." Nearly a year and one-half has since elapsed. It is both the right and duty of Congress, now that the treaty of peace has failed, to declare the fact thus so compellingly and truthfully asserted by the President.

It is true that the Constitution, while it gives Congress the power to declare war, does not in terms give it the power to make peace. Indeed, this second power was expressly omitted by the framers of the Constitution, and the debates upon the question in the Constitutional Convention are very interesting in this connection. The reason for the omission is perfectly clear—that the fathers of the Government very properly recognized that a treaty of peace would be the normal method of terminating war. The wisdom of this conclusion is evident from the fact that every previous foreign war in which we have engaged has been ended by a treaty of peace. But the omission of the power in the grant to Congress is not by any means equivalent to a denial and an exclusion of the power. This is what the opponents of this resolution seem to overlook.

The proper reasoning is somewhat as follows: War, as we have seen, may be ended without treaty. Where, in our scheme of Government, does the power to end war without treaty rest? It is clearly not among the powers reserved to the States, for questions of war and peace are inherently National and Federal. It is not in the President; while he is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, he is equally commander in peace and in war, and nowhere is there the suggestion that a power of this nature should be exercised by him. It is not in the President and Senate together, for their powers are limited to treaties. We are then inevitably led to inquire whether it must not be in the Congress. Congress has the duty to raise and support armies; to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations; to declare war; to provide and maintain a Navy; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; to define and punish offenses against the law of nations; and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

These are extraordinarily broad powers. In the absence of an expressed prohibition in the Constitution, it follows by necessary implication that the constitutional grant of power to declare war carries with it power to declare an end of war. This power must necessarily rest with Congress, just as the power to lay a tax implies the power to abolish the tax; just as the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies implies the power to repeal all laws relating to bankruptcy. There is no one but Congress who can determine the question. The President can not determine it, because he can not overrule the act of Congress declaring war. If Congress has not the power we should have to admit the existence of an irrepealable resolution of Congress, which is, almost in terms, an absurdity.

To sum up this phase of the argument my conclusion is derived from the following circumstances:

War may end without a treaty. The power thus to end it must vest in some agency of the United States. It is not in the President alone, or in the President and Senate. The natural place is Congress, first, because of the extraordinarily broad powers given to Congress by the Constitution; and, second, because Congress creates or recognizes the status of war. Unless it is expressly denied to Congress by the Constitution, common sense and legal reasoning combine to make it certain that the power to end the state of war is vested in Congress. The argument becomes absolutely conclusive when we find that the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy has told Congress that the war has, in fact, ended. We are simply, through constitutional means, giving legal recognition to a fact which we know to exist, and of which we have been informed by the Executive.

So much for section 1, which Secretary Colby, before it had been drafted, airily declared to be unconstitutional. No one who has even perfunctorily examined the precedents or considered the question in the light of reason or good sense will agree with him. No one who is not blinded by partisan considerations will venture to vote against a resolution which simply declares a notorious and long-continued fact.

Section 2 simply substitutes the date when this resolution becomes effective for the date of the proclamation by the President of the treaty of peace, in connection with the various grants of war powers to the President in the two or three score war measures passed by Congress since April, 1917. Of this I need say little. As early as December 2, 1918, in his annual address to Congress, President Wilson intimated that there would not be much need for the continuance of these powers after a few weeks from that date. To use his words, "The moment we knew the armistice to have been signed we took the harness off. * * * Restraints are being relaxed as much as possible and more and more as the weeks go by." Nearly a year and one-half has since elapsed. It is time to start the period running at the end of which the war powers of the President shall cease and conditions of peace shall be substituted for the numerous restrictive measures suitable and even permissible only in days of war and stress. Even the Democrats on the Committee on Foreign Affairs voted "present" on this section, which was perhaps as far as they dared to go in view of the warning served by Secretary Colby.

Section 3 is obviously desirable because it leads the way to a formal recognition on the part of Germany that it also accepts the state of peace and recognizes our rights under the treaty of Versailles. Both admissions are desirable for the welfare of the United States and its citizens, for they will pave the way toward a settling of business conditions and toward the resumption of unhampered trade.

But the suggestion is occasionally heard that in some unexplained way this involves the making of a treaty; some critics calling it a treaty of peace, others calling it a treaty of trade. Of course, it is neither in fact.

It is not a treaty of peace because it involves a mere recognition on the part of Germany that the undoubted status of peace is admitted and accepted by her as a fact.

Nor is it a treaty of trade or commerce. In substance, it provides that if Germany does not send the requisite notification within the stipulated period the President shall proclaim that fact and thereupon commercial intercourse shall cease, except, in effect, under such a system of licenses as are now in effect under the trading with the enemy act.

The fallacy fallen into by the critics of this section results from their failure to recall that by no means all international arrangements, whether simple or complex, important or trivial, constitute treaties and hence involve the necessity of Executive and senatorial concurrent action. The Executive alone may effect many international arrangements. He may negotiate a protocol; President McKinley, for example, negotiated the original peace protocol with Spain in 1898. Similar protocols were negotiated with Costa Rica and Nicaragua in connection with the Interoceanic Canal and at the conclusion of the Boxer troubles in China in 1901. In like manner the President alone may negotiate a modus vivendi or by a simple exchange of notes may conclude a diplomatic agreement with another country. The international postal conventions of 1891 and 1897 were concluded by the Executive without submission to the Senate.

Many acts of Congress, some of them dating almost from the beginning of the Government, others as recent as the Underwood Tariff Act, provide that if other nations do or do not do certain things the President shall have the power to do certain other things. These acts have been questioned, first, because they are in reality treaties, and hence beyond the powers of Congress as such, and second, because they involve the delegation of legislative power by Congress to the President. The great case of Field against Clark, decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1891, put an end to these objections for all time. The President's power under this section does not involve the exercise of legislative authority. It simply requires him to find a fact, upon the ascertainment of which certain things follow. It is not a delegation of power, it is not the making of a treaty; it is simply a trade arrangement. As such it is in line with many established precedents and is squarely under the authority of Field against Clark.

In conclusion, I repeat my regret and chagrin that peace has not been attained through the normal and far preferable medium of a treaty. But the treaty having failed because the President demanded its adoption without reservations, we must do the best we can. This resolution ends the war; it safeguards the interest of the United States and its citizens; it paves the way for the resumption of a peace status and of peaceful trade relationships, and it will rid the United States and the world of the hateful continuance of a technical war. The measure is constitutional, and I believe it to be essential. It is framed in no spirit of hostility to any man, any party, or any nation. I call upon the Democrats of the House not to be bound by the dictation of any man, but to vote for this resolution as their duty to their country imperatively demands.

ANNEX A.

EXTRACTS FROM MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TO CONGRESS INDICATING THAT IN THE OPINION OF THE COMMANDER IN CHIEF OF THE ARMY AND NAVY THE WAR WITH GERMANY HAS ENDED.

(1) November 11, 1918 (Armistice Day), the President, after reciting the armistice terms that morning signed by Germany, said:

The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it. It is not now possible to assess the consequences of this great consummation. We know only that this tragical war, whose consuming flames swept from one nation to another until all the world was on fire, is at an end and that it was the privilege of our own people to enter it at its most critical juncture in such fashion and in such force as to contribute, in a way of which we are all deeply proud, to the great result. We know, too, that the object of the war is attained; the object upon which all free men had set their hearts; and attained with a sweeping completeness which even now we do not realize.

(2) The President's address to the Congress December 2, 1918, refers to "the great processes by which the war was pushed irresistibly forward to the final triumph"; "the war could not have been won or the gallant men who fought it given their opportunity to win it otherwise" if those at home had not done their duty. After Chateau-Thierry "it was only a scant four months before the commanders of the Central Empires knew themselves beaten; and now their very Empires are in liquidation." "If the war had continued," certain taxation would have been necessary in 1919. The Government must have operated the railroads "so long as the war lasted."

(3) On July 10, 1919, when the President presented the treaty to the Senate, he said "the war ended in November, eight months ago." In his message on the high cost of living, August 8, 1919, he said "the world has just destroyed the arbitrary force of a military junta."

(4) In his veto of the Volstead Prohibition Act on October 27, 1919, he said:

I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress. Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal.

It will not be difficult for Congress in considering this important matter to separate these two questions and effectively to legislate regarding them, making the proper distinction between temporary causes which arose out of war-time emergencies and those like the constitutional amendment of prohibition which is now part of the fundamental law of the country.

(5) In his annual message to Congress on December 2, 1919, the President refers to "the recent war" and to some of the questions "resulting from the war." He also mentioned the farmer who "indispensably helped to win the war," and referred to "the terrible tragedy of war which has just ended."

(6) In some of his utterances the Commander in Chief has also mentioned the coming of peace. In the December 2, 1919, message he said:

And now we are sure of the great triumph for which every sacrifice was made. It has come, come in its completeness, and with the pride and inspiration of these days of achievement quick within us we turn to the tasks of peace again—a peace secure against the violence of irresponsible monarchs and ambitious military coteries and make ready for a new order, for new foundations of justice and fair dealing.

We are about to give order and organization to this peace not only for ourselves but for the other peoples of the world as well, so far as they will suffer us to serve them. * * * So far as our domestic affairs are concerned the problem of our return to peace is a problem of economic and industrial readjustment. * * * It is surprising how fast the process of return to a peace footing has moved in the three weeks since the fighting stopped.

(7) In his August 8 message he pointed out that America "saved Europe by her action in arms; she must now save it by her actions in peace," and said that our people "will address themselves to the tasks of peace" with devotion.

ANNEX B.

TERMINATION OF WAR WITHOUT TREATY.

I print Chapter I of Phillipson's Termination of War and Treaties of Peace.

Chapter I. Termination of war by reciprocal intermission of hostilities.

MODES OF TERMINATING HOSTILITIES.

There are three ways of terminating hostilities between belligerent States, namely: (1) By a mere cessation of hostilities on both sides without any definite understanding supervening; (2) by the conquest and subjugation of one of the contending parties by the other, so that the former is reduced to impotence and submission; (3) by a mutual arrangement embodied in a treaty of peace, whether the honors of war be equal or unequal.

Under the first mode the relationships between the parties remain in a condition of uncertainty, and owing to the numerous difficulties involved combatant States have very seldom resorted to this method of withdrawing from the war without arriving at some definite and intelligible decision. Of the second mode history presents a larger number of instances, especially in earlier times when, on the one hand, might predominated over or was synonymous with right, and, on the other, when inequality of civilization and less settled national life conduced to territorial expansion and absorption. The third is the more usual mode of putting an end to hostilities and offers the largest number of examples. Let us take each of the methods in turn and examine its application and effects as illustrated by the leading instances of modern times. First as to the de facto cessation of hostilities and the de facto revival of peace relations.

For our present purpose there is no need to go back further than the eighteenth century for examples. Thus in 1716 the war between Charles XII, of Sweden, and Frederick Augustus, King of Poland, came to an end in this manner: An armistice was concluded, whereby the actual fighting was suspended, but the state of war between the two countries remained. For no less than 10 years did this precarious condition continue, neither side being disposed to resume military operations against the other. Finally a state of peace was declared, and therefore recognized de jure, by means of letters exchanged between the two monarchs.

DE FACTO CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

This example, however, is not an entirely satisfactory one, owing to the various exceptional features that characterized the conflict. As a result of the victories of Charles XII at Cracow and Warsaw in 1702, Frederick Augustus abdicated, and Stanislas, a nominee of the victor, ascended the throne of Poland. In 1709, however, the Swedish sovereign was defeated at Pultawa, and Stanislas was deposed. This marked a de facto, but not necessarily a de jure, cessation of hostilities. Moreover, Frederick Augustus had taken up arms against Sweden contrary to the decision of the Polish Diet, so that some doubt has been expressed as to whether the war was a justum bellum at all, and hence whether it furnished a legitimate precedent. (Cf. Sir R. Phillimore, Commentaries upon International Law, 3d ed., 4 vols. (London, 1879–1889), vol. iii, sec. 511; A. W. Heffter, Das Europäische Völkerrecht der Gegenwart (Berlin, 1882); French ed. (Paris, 1883), sec. 176.)

In 1720 the war between Spain and France was terminated by the mere withdrawal of their respective forces.

In 1801 the Russian war with Persia, which was begun by Catherine II, was similarly ended by Paul I.

The conflict between Spain and her revolted South American colonies offers a further instance. It was in 1810 that the war of independence began; hostilities did not actually cease till 1825, but a state of peace was not formally established until some 20 years had elapsed, when diplomatic relations were instituted. With the victory of Bolivar at Carabolo in 1820, Venezuela acquired her independence, which was not, however, formally recognized by the mother country till 1850. After the battle of Pichincha, 1822, Ecuador asserted her freedom, but not before 1840 was shipping of the new Republic permitted to enter Spanish ports. In 1843—that is, nearly 20 years after the de facto cessation of hostilities—the independence of Chile was formally acknowledged by Spain.

Again, in 1866, in the war between Prussia and the German States, Prussia did not reduce to submission or conclude peace with the principality of Lichtenstein, though hostilities were terminated with some of the States by conquest and subjugation and with others by means of treaties of peace.

Finally, in 1867, the war between France and Mexico came to an end by the withdrawal of the French troops, effected at the instance of the United States Government. A considerable length of time passed by before diplomatic relations were resumed between the former belligerent countries; at first Mexico appointed only commercial agents in France. However, with the fall of Napoleon III the ill feeling between the two States disappeared, though it is noteworthy that in 1878 France did not invite Mexico to take part in the universal exhibition held in Paris. After a good deal of negotiation an agreement was arrived at whereby both parties engaged to waive their respective claims; in November, 1880, their international reconciliation was formally signalized by a diplomatic instrument, and in November, 1886, it was confirmed and completed by a treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation. (Cf. D'Estournelles de Constant, "Relations extérieures" [of Mexico], in Le Mexique au début du XX siècle. By several writers (Paris, n. d.), vol. ii, p. 304.)

RESULTING DIFFICULTIES.

The above examples of the reciprocal intermission of hostilities show that there are several serious difficulties that attend this mode of procedure. In the first place, the relationships between the Governments in question remain uncertain; secondly, their subjects, so far as commercial intercourse is concerned, are in a doubtful position; thirdly, the relationship between the two Governments and third Governments give rise to some embarrassment. When the belligerent operations cease and the forces engaged are tacitly withdrawn, do third States remain neutrals, subject to the various obligations of neutrality, until a formal declaration of peace has been made? And what is their position should such declaration be deferred for a considerable length of time? On this point reference may be made to an American pronouncement which, notwithstanding its expression in general terms, furnishes a satisfactory answer to the questions raised. "It is certain," observed the American Secretary of State in 1868, "that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances." With regard to the affairs of Spain and Chile, he maintained that if either power claimed that the war between them still existed—seeing that active hostilities had long ceased—it would be obliged to substantiate its claims. "Peru, equally with Spain, has an absolute right to decline the good offices or mediation of the United States for peace as either has to accept the same. The refusal of either would be inconclusive as an evidence of determination to resume or continue the war. It is the interest of the United States, and of all nations, that the return of peace, however it may be brought about, shall be accepted whenever it has become clearly established. Whenever the United States shall find itself obliged to decide the question whether the war still exists between Spain and Peru, or whether that war has come to an end, it will make that decision only after having carefully examined all the pertinent facts which shall be within its reach, and after having given due consideration to such representations as shall have been made by the several parties interested." (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. Goñi, Spanish minister, July 22, 1868; Diplom. Corr., 1868, vol. 2, pp. 32, 34; J. B. Moore, Digest of International Law, 8 vols. (Washington, 1906), vol. 7, pp. 336–337.)

CLAIMS OF THE CONTENDING PARTIES.

Another difficulty that arises concerns the claims of the contending parties. When they merely discontinue de facto their armed contention, are their claims to be regarded as being dependent on the principle of the status quo ante bellum or on that of the uti possidetis; that is, the status quo post bellum. In other words, are they put back into the position in which they were before the outbreak of war, or is their position in which they find themselves on the termination of active hostilities to be considered their definitive legal position?

PRINCIPLE OF UTI POSSIDETIS.

There is a difference of opinion on this question among publicists and jurists. The majority hold the second alternative—that the position of the States in question is to be considered that which exists at the time hostilities have actually terminated. On principle this is the more reasonable view. The fact that the war has ceased and that neither party is disposed to prosecute hostilities further in order to obtain a more decisive solution, may justifiably be interpreted to mean that they are willing to let matters rest where they are, and to remain satisfied with their relative positions, and with their respective positions in regard to third States. This is the status, then, that may be held to be the point of departure for their future relations. But a final rule to cover all possible cases can not be laid down. The circumstances of each case have to be considered. Thus it may well be that soon after an aggrieved State has taken up arms against another State for the purpose of obtaining redress, it decides to postpone its enterprise, but expressly and openly reasserts its claims which, it is manifest, it intends to exact afterwards by warlike means. In such a case the general principle of uti possidetis can scarcely be supplied as the determining criterion. War is the final method—the ultima ratio—for settling international disputes; but in the absence of a definite decision in the clash of arms, the previous dispute can not, obviously, be considered to have been settled. But some qualification is necessary to this statement, if the war has gone on for some length of time, and the aggrieved belligerent has withdrawn from the conquest, allowed its grievances to drop, and has not manifested any intention to seek further reparation. The intention is the vital consideration, and the intention of the withdrawing State is to be gathered from its conduct and its attitude.

STATUS QUO ANTE BELLUM.

However this may be, to adopt as a general rule the principle of the status quo ante bellum—as does, for example, Sir R. Phillimore (Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 511: "In such a state of things the presumption of law would be that both parties had agreed that the status quo ante bellum should be revived")—would be fraught with greater difficulties, especially with regard to third States. If, after a period of hostilities, one of the belligerent States takes possession of property—say, a certain portion of territory or a vessel—belonging to the other, and then, though not fully satisfied in respect of its grievance, withdraws from the war for the time being, without implying that it will not renew active hostilities, it is clearly more reasonable for third States to consider the then position—namely, the status quo post bellum—as the basis for future international relationships. It is impossible to hold that third States should refuse to recognize the captured territory or vessel as the captor's legitimate possession and expect it to be restored to the dispossessed State before normal relationships can be resumed between those third States and each of the contending powers. Where there are such claims as have not been settled or affected by the actual condition of affairs existing at the time the warlike enterprise was abandoned, it is, of course, open to the parties to come to a mutual agreement on them. But if within a reasonable length of time after the termination of hostilities no steps are taken to come to an agreement on or to assert by force the prior claims, it is a justifiable presumption that such claims have been waived, and that the principle of uti possidetis—and not that of the status quo ante bellum—is to determine the starting point of future relationships.

In any case, it is desirable that a formal declaration of the resumption of peace should be made by the belligerents. Their subjects will then know when they are entitled to recommence commercial intercourse with each other, and third States will ascertain at what date they cease to be neutrals and become again members of a normal society of nations.

PUBLIC PROCLAMATION NECESSARY.

A public proclamation is, similarly, desirable when a civil war is brought to a conclusion. The observations of Mr. Bayard, the United States Secretary of State, may be here referred to on this point, as well as by way of supplementing what has been said above. In reference to the American Civil War he wrote in 1886 in a dispatch to the Spanish minister:

"I have yet to learn that a war in which the belligerents, as was the case with the late Civil War, are persistent and determined, can be said to have closed until peace is conclusively established, either by treaty when the war is foreign or, when civil, by proclamation of the termination of hostilities on one side and the acceptance of such proclamation on the other. The surrender of the main armies of one of the belligerents does not of itself work such termination, nor does such surrender, under the law of nations, of itself end the conqueror's right to seize and sequestrate whatever property he may find which his antagonist could use for a renewal of hostilities. The seizure of such property, and eminently so when, as in the present case, it is notoriously part of the war capital of the defeated Government, is an act not merely of policy and right but of mercy, in proportion to the extent to which the party overthrown is composed of high-spirited men who are ready to submit only when their military resources are wholly exhausted, and not until then. This, in the summer of 1865, was the condition of things in the Southern and Southwestern States of this Nation. The period was one in which the maintenance of military rule and the taking into the possession of the United States of all the property capable of use as military resources of those States was essential to the permanent restoration of order, peace, and a common municipal law. This was so from the nature of things, and such was the course of public action. It is in accordance with this principle that the Supreme Court of the United States has formally decided that the late Civil War terminated in the particular sections of the United States at the period designated in the proclamations of the President of the United States." (Brown v. Hiatts (1872), 15 Wall., 177; Adger v. Alston (1872), 15 Wall., 555; Batesville Institute v. Kauffman (1873), 18 Wall., 151.)

And by the President's proclamation of April 2, 1866, "the insurrection which heretofore existed in the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Florida is at an end, and is henceforth to be so regarded. Up to and before that date the insurrection in those States was held to exist. After that date it was held to be at an end." (Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, to Mr. Muruaga, Spanish minister, Dec. 3, 1886, Foreign Relations of United States (1887), pp. 1015, 1019; Moore Digest, vol. 7, pp. 337–338.)

I also print a translation of three sections of Bonfils' work on international law:

1692. The only real methods of terminating war, says Hefter (op. cit., 176), are: A general cessation of hostilities and the reestablishment of the prior friendly relations between the States; the absolute surrender of one of the belligerent States to the other; the conclusion of a formal treaty of peace. This is the method most used and the most normal.

1693–A. The belligerents can, by a tacit agreement, stop hostilities and establish between themselves reciprocal friendly relations. The status quo accepted by the belligerent States at the time of the general cessation of hostilities will be the base upon which peace relations will be established. History cites a few examples of wars terminated in this manner, without the conclusion of a formal treaty of peace. Thus ended, in 1720, the war between France and Spain. The Czar, Paul I, suspended, in 1801, the war begun against Persia by Empress Catherine II. By a cessation of hostilities, without a treaty of peace, also ended the war between Spain and her colonies who had revolted (No. 200). In the same manner ended the war between Spain and Chile and that between France and Mexico (1862 to 1866). Between the two latter countries diplomatic relations were reestablished only in 1881.

The state of affairs created by such a proceeding is subject to many difficulties. The relations of the two adversaries and those of their subjects remain unsettled and confused. Embarrassing also are the relations with other countries. Are the latter, still neutral, responsible for the performance of certain duties? Also, will a formal declaration of peace always be useful? Only such a declaration can set forth the agreement reached on the litigation which caused the war and fix clearly the new status of the various States, neutrals or ex-belligerents. The complete surrender of one of the belligerents to the other puts an end to the war by the complete political annihilation of one of the adversaries. It is one of the States which disappears, which dies, as a judicial entity, such as Hanover and Hesse in 1866. Also the Republic of Transvaal and the State of Orange, which, in 1902, were annexed to Great Britain; the act of capitulation of 1902 confirmed the surrender. Since, by the act of August 21, 1909, the Transvaal and Orange form, with the Cape and the Natal, a confederate State—the Union of Austral Africa, the constitution of which became operative on May 31, 1910. Between civilized countries such a conquest, says Geffcken, is title to property in the least desirable manner, as it rests merely on strength.

1695. Treaties of peace are diplomatic conventions by which the belligerent States declare the termination of hostilities and fix the conditions upon which friendly relations are reestablished. Treaties of peace, says Messrs. Funck-Brentano and Sorel, are the acts by which the belligerents figure out the state of their strength and settle from the results of the war their respective claims and the conversion of their rights.

CHAPTER IX. TERMINATION OF WAR.

SEC. 197. War is terminated by the conclusion of a treaty of peace, by simple cessation of hostilities, or by the conquest of one, or of part of one, of the belligerent States by the other.

SEC. 198. The general effect of a treaty of peace is to replace the belligerent countries in their normal relation to each other. The state of peace is set up, and they enter at once into all the rights and are bound by all the duties which are implied in that relation. It necessarily follows that, so soon as peace is concluded, all acts must cease which are permitted only in time of war. Thus if an army is in occupation of hostile territory when peace is made, not only can it levy no more contributions or requisitions during such time as may elapse before it evacuates the country, but it can not demand arrears of those of which the payment has been already ordered. It is obviously not an exception to this rule that an enemy may be authorized by the treaty of peace itself to do certain acts which, apart from agreement, would be acts of war, such as to remain in occupation of territory until specific stipulations have been fulfilled or to levy contributions and requisitions if the subsistence of the troops in occupation is not provided for by the government of the occupied district; a State may, of course, always contract itself out of its common-law rights. It can also hardly be said to be an exception that although prisoners of war acquire a right to their freedom by the simple fact of the conclusion of peace, it is not necessary that their actual liberation shall instantaneously take place; their return to their own country may be subordinated to such rules and they may be so far kept under military surveillance as may be dictated by reasonable precaution against misconduct or even by reasonable regard for the convenience of the State by which they have been captured. (Vattel, liv. iv, ch. ii, sec. 19; Halleck, sec. 265; Bluntschli, secs. 708, 716, 717; Calvo, secs. 3147, 3148.) [Hague Regulations, art. 20.]

By the principle commonly called that of uti possidetis it is understood that the simple conclusion of peace, if no express stipulation accompanies it, or in so far as express stipulations do not extend, vests in the two belligerents as absolute property whatever they respectively have under their actual control in the case of territory and things attached to it, and in the case of movables whatever they have in their legal possession at the moment; occupied territory, for example, is transferred to the occupying power, and movables, on the other hand, which have been in the territory of an enemy during the war without being confiscated, remain the property of the original owner. The doctrine is not altogether satisfactory theoretically, but it supplies a practical rule for the settlement of such matters relating to property and sovereignty as may have been omitted in a treaty, or for covering concessions which one or other party has been unwilling to make in words. This advantage could evidently not be claimed by the necessarily alternative doctrine that, except in so far as expressly provided, all things should return to their state before the war. (Vattel, liv. iv, ch. ii, sec. 24; Heffter, sec. 181; Phillimore, iii, sec. dlxxxvi; Bluntschli, sec. 715; Nuestra Senora de los Dolores (1809), Edwards, 60.)

When a stipulation to the latter effect is made, it is to be understood, if couched in general terms, to mean only that any territory belonging to one party, which may be occupied by the other party, with the buildings, etc., on it, is to be handed back with no further changes than have been brought about by the operations of war, or by acts legitimately done during the course of hostilities. The clause covers neither property which has been appropriated, nor property which has been destroyed or damaged, in accordance with the laws of war. (Vattel, liv. iv, ch. ii, sec. 22, and ch. iii, sec. 31; Phillimore, iii, sec. dlxxxiv.)

Section 199. Notwithstanding that treaties only become definitely binding on the States between which they are made on being ratified (The Eliza Ann (1813), 1 Dodson, 244), a treaty of peace, whether it be in the form of a definitive treaty or of preliminaries of peace (preliminaries of peace are an agreement intended to put an end to hostilities at an earlier moment than that at which the terms of a definitive treaty can be settled. They contain the stipulations which are essential to the reestablishment of peace, together sometimes with arrangements having a temporary object; minor points which lie open to discussion or bargain, and details for the settlement of which time is required, being held over for more leisurely treatment. Preliminaries thus constitute a treaty which is binding in every respect so far as it goes, but which is intended to be superseded by a fuller arrangement, and is so superseded when the definitive treaty is signed. For an example of preliminaries and of a definitive treaty of peace, see the preliminaries of Versailles and the definitive treaty of Frankfort in D'Angeberk, Nos. 1119 and 1179), is so far temporarily binding from the date of signature, unless some other date for the commencement of its operation is fixed by the treaty itself, that hostilities must immediately cease. It acts as an armistice, if no separate armistice is concluded. (It is the practice to conclude an armistice before signing a treaty of peace; the above rule could therefore seldom, if ever, come into operation, unless as the result of accidental circumstances. [The conclusion of peace between Russia and Japan in 1905 preceded an armistice pending the ratification of the treaty, see N. Arlga, La Guerre Russo-Japonaise, chap. xx.])

The rule is obviously founded on the fact that the chance in any given case that ratification will be refused is not sufficient to justify fresh attempts on the part of either belligerent to secure a better position for himself at the cost of effusion of blood, and of infliction of misery on the population inhabiting the seat of war.

The exceptional case that a future date is fixed by a treaty for the commencement of peace occurs when hostilities extend to regions with which immediate communication is impossible. Under such circumstances it is usual to make the termination of hostilities depend upon the length of time necessary for sending information that a treaty has been concluded and to fix accordingly different dates, after which acts of war become illegal in different places. When in such cases duly authenticated information reaches a given place before the time fixed for the cessation of hostilities, the question arises whether further hostilities are legitimate, or whether, as a margin of time is only given in order that knowledge may be obtained, they ought at once to be stopped. The latter and reasonable doctrine seems now to be thoroughly accepted in principle; but its value is somewhat diminished by the reservation, which is perhaps necessarily made, that a naval or military commander is not obliged to accept any information as duly authenticated, the correctness of which is not in some way attested by his own government. In the case of the English ship Swincherd, for example, a vessel provided with letters of marque sailed from Calcutta for England before the end of the period of five months fixed by the treaty of Amiens for the termination of hostilities in the Indian seas, but after the news of peace had reached Calcutta, and after a proclamation of George III, requiring his subjects to abstain from hostilities from the time fixed and therein mentioned, had been published in a Calcutta paper. The Swincherd had a copy of this proclamation on board. She was captured by the Bellone, a French privateer, without resistance, there being only enough powder on board for signaling purposes. The Bellone had been informed by a Portuguese vessel bearing a flag of truce, which had put into the Mauritius, by an Arab vessel, and by an English vessel which she had captured that peace was concluded; her commander was shown the proclamation in the Gazette extraordinary of Calcutta, and he could see for himself that a privateer, which by the date of the Gazette must have sailed lately from Calcutta, was without powder; so that there was no room to doubt the accuracy of the information given or the good faith of the statement that the intentions of the Swincherd herself were peaceful. The vessel was nevertheless condemned in France as good prize. In a case like this, in which the fact that peace had been concluded was established beyond all possibility of question, the rule that an officer in command of armed forces of his State may disregard all information which is not authenticated by his own government operates with extreme harshness, and though the right of seizure could scarcely be abandoned there seems to be no reason for not subsequently restoring ships captured after receipt of information which should turn out in the end to be correct. For most purposes of war, however, the rule must be a hard and fast one. The consequences of suspending hostilities upon erroneous information might easily be serious, and if it were once conceded that commanders were ever bound to act upon information not proceeding from their own government it would be difficult to prevent them from being sometimes misled by information intentionally deceptive. (Kent, Comm. I, 172; Wheat. Elem. pt. iv, ch. iv, I 5; Heffter, sec. 183; La Bellone contre le Porcher, Potoye et Davenly, I 149.)

SEC. 200. A treaty of peace has the following effects with reference to acts done before the commencement of the war which it has terminated:

1. It puts an end to all pretensions and draws a veil over all quarrels out of which the war has arisen. It has set up a new order of things, which forms a fresh starting point and behind which neither State may look. War consequently can not be renewed upon the same grounds.

2. It revives the execution of international engagements of a certain kind when such execution has been suspended by one or both of the parties to a war. (See ante, p. 399.)

3. In a general way it revives all private rights and restores the remedies which have been suspended during the war; contracts, for example, are revived between private persons if they are not of such a kind as to be necessarily put an end to by war (see ante, p. 403), and if their fulfillment has not been rendered impossible by such acts of a belligerent government as the confiscation of debts due by subjects to those of its enemy; the courts also are reopened for the enforcement of claims of every kind. (Wheaton, Elem., pt. 4, ch. 4, sec. 3; Heffter, sec. 180.)

SEC. 201. As between the contracting States a treaty of peace is a final settlement of all matters connected with the war to which it puts an end. If, therefore, any acts have been done during the course of hostilities in excess or irrespectively of the rights of war under the authority of one of the belligerent States, the enemy State can not urge complaints or claims from the moment that a treaty is signed, either on its own behalf or on behalf of its subjects.

It is possible, however, that ordinary acts of war may have been done without sufficient authority, that wrongful acts may have been done wholly without authority, and that subjects of one of the two belligerent States, without having committed treason, may yet have compromised themselves with their own Government by dealing with the enemy. In order to bury the occurrences of the war in oblivion, and to prevent ill-feeling from being kept alive, in order also to protect men who may only have been guilty of a technical wrong, or who may at any rate have been carried away by the excitement of hostilities, and finally in the common interests of belligerents who may be in occupation of an enemy's country, it is understood that persons acting in any of the ways above mentioned are protected by the conclusion of peace from all civil or criminal processes to which they might be otherwise exposed in consequence of their conduct in the war, except civil actions arising out of private contracts, and criminal prosecutions for acts recognized as crimes by the law of the country to which the doer belongs, and done under circumstances which remove them from the category of acts having relation to the war. [By article 3 of The Hague convention on land warfare, 1907, it is expressly agreed that a party which violates the provisions of the regulations annexed to it shall, if the case demands, be liable to make compensation, and that the State shall be responsible for all acts of persons forming part of its armed forces.] Actions, for example, can be brought on ransom bills; if a prisoner of war borrows money or runs into debt, he may be sued; or if a prisoner of war or a soldier on service commits a common murder, he may be tried and punished. The immunity thus conceded is called an amnesty.

Usually, but far from invariably, the rule of law is fortified by express stipulation, and a clause securing an amnesty is inserted in treaties of peace. Though unnecessary for other purposes, it is required as a safeguard for subjects of a State who, having had distinctly treasonable relations with an enemy, are not protected by an amnesty which is only implied. (Halleck, i. 337; Bluntschli, secs. 710–12; Calvo, secs. 3145–48; Lord Stowell in the Molly (1814), 1 Dodson, 396; Crawford & Maclean v. The William Penn (1815); 3 Washington, 491–93, and the cases there cited; and for examples of amnesty clauses see the Treaties of Tilsit (De Martens, Rec. viii, 640 and 666), and that of Paris in 1856 (Hertslet, 1254). Some writers, e. g., Vattel (liv. iv, ch. ii, secs. 20, 22), Wheaton (Elem. pt. iv, ch. iv, sec. 3), and Heffter (sec. 180), treat an amnesty as applying to conduct of one belligerent State toward the other, and the language of some of the older treaties stipulates for oblivion of all acts done on the two sides, respectively; see, e. g., the Treaty of Teschen (De Martens, Rec. ii, 663).)

SEC. 202. Acts of war done subsequently to the conclusion of peace, or to the time fixed for the termination of hostilities, although done in ignorance of the existence of peace, are necessarily null. They being so, the effects which they have actually produced must be so far as possible undone, and compensation must be given for the harm suffered through such effects as can not be undone. Thus, territory which has been occupied must be given up; ships which have been captured must be restored; damage from bombardment or from loss of time or market, etc., ought to be compensated for; and it has been held in the English courts, with the general approbation of subsequent writers, that compensation may be recovered by an injured party from the officer through whose operations injury has been suffered, and that it is for the Government of the latter to hold him harmless. It is obvious, on the other hand, that acts of hostility done in ignorance of peace entail no criminal responsibility. (Hallock, II, 341–343; Phillimore, III, sec. 518; Bluntschli, sec. 709; Calvo, sec. 3155.) In the case of The Mentor, which was an American ship captured off the Delaware by English cruisers, all parties being ignorant that a cessation of hostilities had taken place, Lord Stowell said, "If an act of mischief was done by the King's officers, through ignorance, in a place where no act of hostility ought to have been exercised, it does not necessarily follow that mere ignorance of that fact would protect the officers from civil responsibility. If by articles, a place or district was put under the King's peace, and an act of hostility was afterwards committed therein, the injured party might have a right to resort to a court of prize, to show that he had been injured by this breach of the peace, and was entitled to compensation; and if the officer acted through ignorance his own Government must protect him"; * * * he is to be "borne harmless at the expense of that Government." (The Mentor (1799), I. C. Rob, 183.) It was held by the Japanese prize courts in 1905 that the right of capture ceases on the restoration of peace, but captures made previously are not affected by it. A prize court, unless bound by some special treaty or ordinance, is entitled, even after the conclusion of peace, to decide whether the captured property, neutral or belligerent, is to be condemned or not. (The Australia, Russ. and Jap. Prize Cases, II, 373; The Montara, ib., II, 403; Cf. Oppenheim, II, sec. 436. (The treaties of Zurich, 1859; Vienna, 1864; and Frankfort, 1871, provided for the restoration of captured vessels which remained uncondemned at the conclusion of peace).)

SEC. 203. The termination of war by simple cessation of hostilities is extremely rare. Possibly the commonly cited case of the war between Sweden and Poland, which ceased in this manner in 1716, is the only unequivocal instance; though it is likely that if anything had occurred to compel the setting up of distinct relations of some kind between Spain and her revolted colonies in America during the long period which elapsed between the establishment of their independence and their recognition by the mother country, it would have been found that the existence of peace was tacitly assumed. No active hostilities appear to have been carried on later than the year 1825, and no effort was made to hold neutral States or individuals to the obligations imposed by a state of war; but it was not till 1840 that intercourse with any of the Central or South American Republics, except Mexico, was authorized by the Spanish Government. In that year commercial vessels of the Republic of Ecuador were admitted by royal decree into the ports of the kingdom, and at various subsequent times like decrees were issued in favor of the remaining States. It was only, however, in 1844, three years after commercial relations had been established, that Chile, which was the earliest of the Republics, except Mexico, to receive recognition, was formally acknowledged to be independent; and Venezuela, which was the last, was not recognized till 1850. (Lawrence Commentaire, II, 327. (For some other instances see Oppenheim, II, sec. 262).)

The inconvenience of such a state of things is evident. When war dies insensibly out the date of its termination is necessarily uncertain. During a considerable time the belligerent States and their subjects must be doubtful as to the light in which they are regarded by the other party to the war, and neutral States and individuals must be equally doubtful as to the extent of their rights and obligations. Nevertheless a time must come sooner or later at which it is clear that a state of peace has supervened upon that of war. When this has arrived the effects of the informal establishment of peace are identical with those general effects flowing from the conclusion of a treaty which are necessarily consequent upon the existence of a state of peace. Beyond this it is difficult to say whether any effects would be produced. It is at any rate certain that the pretensions which may have given rise to the war can not be regarded as abandoned, and that the quarrel can not be assumed to have been definitively settled. It would always be open to either side to begin a fresh war upon the same grounds as those which supplied the motive for hostilities in the first instance.

SEC. 204. Conquest consists in the appropriation of the property in, and of the sovereignty over, a part or the whole of the territory of a State, and when definitively accomplished vests the whole rights of property and sovereignty over such territory in the conquering State.

As in the case of other modes of acquisition by unilateral acts, it is necessary to the accomplishment of conquest that intention to appropriate and ability to keep shall be combined. Intention to appropriate is invariably, and perhaps necessarily, shown by a formal declaration or proclamation of annexation. Ability to keep must be proved either by the conclusion of peace or by the establishment of an equivalent state of things; the conqueror must be able to show that he has solid possession, and that he has a reasonable probability of being able to maintain possession, in the same way and to much the same degree as a political society which claims to be a State must show that it has independence and a reasonable probability of maintaining it. A treaty of peace by which the principle of uti possidetis is allowed to operate affords the best evidence of conquest, just as recognition of the independence of a revolted Province on the part of the mother country is the best evidence of the establishment of a new State; but possession which is de facto undisputed, and the lapse of a certain time, the length of which must depend on the circumstances of the case, are also admitted to be proof when combined; and recognition by foreign States, though in strictness only conclusive, like all other unilateral acts, against the recognizing States themselves, affords confirmation which is valuable in proportion to the number and distinctness of the sources from which it springs.

Notwithstanding the necessary uncertainty in the abstract of evidence supplied by possession and recognition, the fact of conquest is generally well marked enough to be unquestioned. One instructive modern case, however, exists in which the conclusiveness of an alleged conquest was disputed. In the beginning of the nineteenth century the elector of Hesse-Cassel held as private property domains within his own territory and sums lent on mortgage to subjects of other German States. Shortly after the Battle of Jena he was expelled from his dominions by French troops, and he did not return until French domination in Germany was put an end to by the Battle of Leipzig. For about a year after its occupation Hesse-Cassel remained under the immediate government of Napoleon; it was then handed over by him to the newly formed kingdom of Westphalia, the existence of which was expressly recognized by Prussia and Russia in the treaty of Tilsit, and, through the maintenance of friendly relations, by such other European States as were at peace with France and its satellites. Napoleon intended to effect a conquest; he dealt with the territory which he had entered as being conquered, and was acknowledged by a considerable number of States to have made a definitive conquest. One of his acts of conquest effected before the transfer of the territory to the Kingdom of Westphalia was to confiscate the private property of the elector, which, as the latter after his expulsion had taken service in the Prussian Army, was seized apparently as that of a person remaining in arms against the legitimate sovereign of the State. However revolting it may be morally that Napoleon should have taken advantage of the position which he had acquired through his own wrongdoing to inflict further injury upon a man whom he had already plundered without provocation, there can be no doubt that if his conquest was complete he was within his strict legal rights. Was then his conquest a complete one? The question was first raised in a suit brought by the elector after his return before the Mecklenburg courts as creditor of the estate of a certain Count Hahn-Hahn. The count had borrowed money on mortgage from the elector before his expulsion and had obtained a release in full from Napoleon on payment of a portion of the debt. The elector contested the validity of the discharge. The Mecklenburg court appears not to have given judgment, but to have remitted the matter to the University of Breslau, whence it was successively carried by way of appeal to two other German universities. The ultimate judgment affirmed the legality of the act of confiscation on the grounds—

1. That the restored government of the Elector could not be regarded as a continuation of his former government, because he had not been constantly in arms against Napoleon during his absence from Hesse-Cassel and because he had been treated by the peaces of Tilsit and Schönbrunn as politically extinct, the Kingdom of Westphalia having been recognized as occupying the place of the electorate.

2. That Napoleon had in fact effected a conquest and consequently had a right as sovereign to confiscate the property of an active enemy of the State.

3. That even if the property of the Elector could have been held to revert with the conclusion of peace, a restored owner, "according to the letter of the Roman law," must take his property as he finds it, without compensation for the damage which it may have suffered in the interval. (Phillimore, pt. 12, ch. 6.)

The above judgment appears to have met with very general approval, and though the congress of Vienna refused to interfere to prevent the resumption by the Elector of alienated domains within the electorate, there is nothing to show that any of the powers represented there considered his action to be right under the circumstances of the particular case; Prussia pronounced herself adversely to it. (Sir R. Phillimore points to the fact that "Austria, Prussia, Russia, the Bourbon sovereigns in France and Italy, Sardinia, and the Pope" left undisturbed titles acquired through the intrusive rulers of territory which they had lost during the revolutionary and Napoleonic wars, as confirmatory of the view that the conduct of the Elector was wrong. The conduct of the Elector was no doubt wrong, but the case against him is not made stronger by suggesting inexact analogies. Possession of the territory wrested from Austria, Prussia, and Russia was in all cases confirmed by treaty; the alienations made in France were the result not of foreign conquest but of internal revolution; and though the case of the Italian States is very much nearer to that of Hesse, it is prevented from being identical by the much greater duration of the foreign intrusion to which they were subjected. The government of Hanover, which was in exactly the same position as Hesse, acted in the same manner as the Elector.) There can, indeed, be no doubt that the title which Napoleon assumed himself to have acquired by conquest became consolidated by lapse of time, and that alienations made in virtue of it were consequently good. It does not follow from this that the confiscation was in the first instance valid. It took place immediately after the conclusion of the treaties of Tilsit. Although it was impossible to suppose that Hesse-Cassel would ever be able to shake off the yoke of France for herself, there was nothing in the aspect of Europe to induce the belief that the settlement Germany then made was a final one; war still continued with England; it was certain that war would sooner or later be renewed on the Continent, and it was necessarily uncertain how soon it might arrive; finally most of the recognitions given to the Kingdom of Westphalia were of little value, because they were given by States which were hardly free agents in the matter.

In such a state of things time was absolutely necessary to consolidate the conquest. At first Napoleon and those who derived their title from him were merely occupiers with the pretensions of conquerors. But with the lapse of time the character of occupier insensibly changed into that of a true conqueror; and when the fact of conquest was definitively established, it validated retroactively acts which the conqueror had prematurely done in that capacity. It would be idle to argue, in all the circumstances of the case, that possession had not hardened into conquest during the interval between 1806 and 1813. (It is sometimes not only very difficult to be sure whether a conquest has in fact been effected, but also to determine what view of the facts, which may be supposed to have constituted a conquest, has in the long run been taken by States interested in forming an opinion, and by the occupied or conquered country itself, after it has been freed from the control of its enemy. The Kingdom of the Netherlands offers a singularly confused instance of this kind. In 1795 the Republic of the United Netherlands was overrun by French troops, and a republic of the French type, practically dependent on France, was substituted for the government previously existing; in 1806 the Republic was converted into a kingdom under Louis Bonaparte; and in 1810 the country was forcibly annexed to France, to which it remained attached until 1814. Whether in the then condition of Europe these four years of union sufficed to effect a conquest in the absence of treaties confirming it may be doubtful; but in 1815 the Netherlands regarded the political existence of Holland as having ended at the date of the annexation; and though the identity of a State is not usually affected by a change of government, it would have been reasonable in the special circumstances of the case to argue that Holland had so lost her separate life at the accession of King Louis as to make it fair to assume that date instead of 1810 as the commencement of French possession. In 1814, however, this view was not taken by the four great powers. Article 6 of the general treaty of peace placed Holland under the sovereignty of the House of Orange, and provided that it should receive an "increase of territory"; and the Congress treaty of the 9th June, 1815, provided that the "ancient United Provinces of the Netherlands" and the late Belgic Provinces shall form the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Holland was regarded as a State already in existence, which was merely to receive enlargement and a new form of government, and which was to resort to its former name so far as it could do so consistently with its new position as a kingdom. But at the very moment that Holland was reconstituting itself in this manner under the sanction of Europe, it denied the continuity of its existence by regarding a treaty made before the French Revolution as annulled by subsequent events. So early as February, 1815, the Dutch minister at Washington was instructed to open negotiations for a new treaty of commerce upon the basis of the treaty of 1782, and it is clear from two notes written by Mr. Monroe to him, that he stated the treaty in question to be, in the opinion of the Dutch Government, no longer in force. Subsequently the American Government, in order to claim compensation for the seizure and confiscation of vessels and cargoes belonging to subjects of the United States under the reign of Louis Bonaparte, urged that the identity of the State had not been changed; and it appears from a dispatch of Mr. Adams of the year 1815, that both States at that time were acting on the supposition that the treaty of 1782 was binding upon them. The Government of the Netherlands, in order to meet the American demands, reverted to the view that the treaty had been annulled; and argued that the identity of the State had been destroyed by its incorporation into France. The United States yielded, and abandoned their claims, but without admitting the validity of the argument from incorporation. They simply took the fact that the Kingdom of the Netherlands repudiated the continued identity of the State, together with the further facts that the form of government was different, and the territory enlarged, as sufficient ground for supposing that a new State had been created. Hertslet, map of Europe by treaty; Wharton, Digest, sec. 137.)

SEC. 205. The effects of a conquest are:

1. To validate acts done in excess of the rights of a military occupant between the time that the intention to conquer has been signified and that at which conquest is proved to be completed. (Halleck, ii. 1505; Calvo, sec. 2465.)

2. To confer upon the conquering State property in the conquered territory, and to invest it with the rights and affect it with the obligations which have been mentioned as accompanying a territory upon its absorption into a foreign State. (See antea, secs. 28 and 29, and compare also sec. 27.)

3. To invest the conquering State with sovereignty over all subjects of a wholly conquered State and over such subjects of a partially conquered State as are identified with the conquered territory at the time when the conquest is definitively effected, so that they become subjects of the State and are naturalized for external purposes, without necessarily acquiring the full status of subject or citizen for internal purposes. (Dana, note to Wheaton's Elem. No. 169; Lord Mansfield in Campbell v. Hall (1774) Cowper, 208. For the position of the inhabitants of a country conquered by the United States, see antea, p. 253, note. For French law and practice, see Fœlix, sec. 35, and Cogordan, La Nationalité, 2de éd. For the action of the allied powers in 1814, see Lawrence, Commentaire, iii. 192. "A rule of public law," it is laid down in an American case, "is that the conqueror who has obtained permanent possession of the enemy's country has the right to forbid the departure of his new subjects or citizens from it, and to exercise his sovereign authority over them." United States v. De Repentigny (1866) 5 Wallace, 260.) The persons who are so identified with conquered territory that their nationality is changed by the fact of conquest, are, of course, mainly those who are native of and established upon it at the moment of conquest; to these must be added persons native of another part of the dismembered State, who are established on the conquered territory, and continue their residence there. Correlatively persons native of the conquered territory but established in another part of the State to which it formerly belonged ought to be considered to be subjects of the latter.

SEC. 206. In strictness, the effects of a cession, of a treaty concluded on the basis of uti possidetis, and of conquest, upon the inhabitants of territory which changes hands at the conclusion of a war are identical, though for somewhat different reasons in the three cases. In each case the population is subjected to the sovereignty of the State by which the territory is acquired; but while in the cases of bare conquest and of conquest confirmed by a treaty grounded on the principle of uti possidetis the sovereignty is simply appropriated by the conquering State, in that of express cession a transfer of it is effected through an act of the State making the cession, by which the members of that State are bound.

It has, however, been usual in modern treaties to insert a clause securing liberty to inhabitants of a ceded country to keep their nationality of origin. (Like provisions sometimes appear in older treaties, e. g., those of Ryswick and Utrecht.) In the case of persons native of, and established in, the ceded territory, and even in the case of persons who are established in, without being natives of, the ceded territory, this liberty is commonly saddled with the condition that they shall retire within the territory remaining to their state of origin, a certain time being allowed to them to arrange their affairs and dispose of landed and other property which they may be unable to take with them. (The treaties of Vienna in 1809 (De Martens, Nouv. Rec. i. 214), of Paris in 1814 (id. ii. 9), and of Vienna in 1864 (Nouv. Rec. Gen. xvii. ii. 482) gave six years, that of Frederikshamm in 1809 gave three years (Nouv. Rec. i. 25), and those of Zurich in 1859 (Nouv. Rec. Gén. xvi. ii. 520), of Turin in 1860 (ib. 540), and of Vienna in 1866 (id. xviii. 409) afforded one year. The treaty of Frankfurt in 1871 conceded liberty of emigration until October 1, 1872 (Nouv. Rec. Gén. xix. 689). Halleck (ii. 506–7) and Calvo (sec. 2467) think that inhabitants of a ceded country have a right of keeping their old allegiance if they choose to emigrate. It is unquestionable that to prevent them from doing so would be harsh and oppressive in the extreme, but as the possession of such a right is inconsistent with the general principles of law, it could only have been established by a practice of which there is certainly as yet no reasonable evidence. In the United States v. De Repentigny, already cited, it was expressly laid down that persons choosing to adhere without permission to their former state "deprive themselves of protection to their property" situated within the conquered portion; and the alienation of the property of the Elector of Hesse-Cassel (antea, p. 607), which, on the assumption that a conquest was effected, has universally been held to be good, would have been illegal if persons have a right to withdraw themselves from an allegiance imposed by conquest, and therefore a fortiori by cession. It is, of course, not to the point that, as between persons adhering to their former State, and removing into it, and that State, the national character of origin is always preserved; the State of origin has no reason for rejecting them or for refusing them the rights of subjects. It is to be remarked that as the individual has no right of keeping his old allegiance, irrespective of treaty, he may find that the sovereign, for whom he would wish to elect, declines to accept him as a subject, if the treaty merely gives a right to emigrate and contains no specific stipulation providing for choice of nationality. After 1814 and 1815 the restored monarchy of France considered that "les habitants des pays annexés à l'Empire Napoléonien n'avaient pas été plus légitimement Français que l'Empereur n'avait été légitimement souverain de la France." It was unwilling to add to the Napoleonic element in the population. Accordingly persons emigrating from the restored Provinces into France were required to obtain naturalization as ordinary foreigners. (Cogordan, La Nationalité, 2de éd., 333.)

In a recent treaty of cession a more liberal treatment was accorded; natives of Alsace and the ceded districts of Lorraine, who chose to retain their French nationality, though compelled to emigrate, were allowed by the treaty of Frankfurt to keep their landed property within the ceded territory. (It may be pointed out that the treaties usually fail to deal with all the classes of persons which are affected by them and that their language is often insufficiently precise. Thus the treaty of Turin left open the position of minors and natives of Savoy and Nice residing outside their own country, and many delicate questions have arisen upon the construction of the treaty of Frankfurt. (See Cogordan, ch. 7, secs. 5 and 8.)

Residence in foreign countries being a frequent incident of modern life, withdrawal from a ceded district is not conclusive of the intention of the person withdrawing to reject the nationality of the conquering State. It is therefore usual to exact an express declaration of intention as a condition of preservation of the nationality of birth from persons against whom there is a presumption of changed nationality; that is to say, from persons born within the territory and living there and from persons born within the territory but absent at the date of annexation. There being no such presumption against persons born in another part of the State making the cession, the simple fact of withdrawal is in their case sufficient.

Also a paragraph of Lawrence's The Principles of International Law:

THE TERMINATION OF WAR.

It has sometimes happened that the belligerents have exhausted themselves and tacitly ceased from further operations, but there are no recent instances of such a termination to hostilities in a struggle of any consequence, except the withdrawal of the French troops from Mexico in 1867, at the instigation of the United States. Wars may come to an end through the destruction of one of the communities engaged in them, as Poland was destroyed by the third partition or as the Southern Confederacy fell after four years of strenuous conflict. In such cases no treaty is possible, because there is no body politic left for the victor to treat with. Great Britain, however, strained a point in 1902 because of the special circumstances of the Boer War and consented to negotiate with the leaders of the Boer commandoes still in the field against her, though the governments in whose name they waged war had ceased to govern and no longer exercised any powers of sovereignty over definite territorial areas.

I also print a note, several times mentioned in the text of my remarks, sent by Secretary of State Seward to the Spanish minister at Washington on September 9, 1868. Extracts from this letter will be found in the seventh volume of Moore's Digest of International Law (337–338). It is printed in full in Diplomatic Correspondence, 1868, volume 2, pages 32–34:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 9, 1868.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note from Mr. Goni, minister plenipotentiary of Her Catholic Majesty, written on the 30th of June last, in which Mr. Goni directs the attention of the undersigned to the affair of the monitors Catawba and Oneota. Mr. Goni mentions two circumstances which move him to insist upon the detention of those monitors, namely, first, that the minister plenipotentiary of Peru has solicited permission from the United States Government to take possession of the monitors, contending that the existing situation between Spain and Peru is no longer one of war, which assertion Mr. Goni pronounces to be entirely without foundation; and, secondly, that the monitors, now in the port of New Orleans, are not apparently sufficiently guarded to prevent them from going to sea, as the undersigned is aware of no official measures having been taken to prevent their departure.

Mr. Goni dwells upon the fact that the United States have tendered their good offices to Spain and to her antagonists, the Pacific Republics, and that while Spain has promptly expressed her disposition to accept those good offices with a view to the establishment of peace, Peru has not accepted them nor given any conclusive reply upon the subject. Mr. Goni argues from this fact that the Government of Peru can not rightfully claim that the Government of the United States shall during those overtures pronounce the state of war to be closed and the state of peace to have been reached by the silent consent and concurrence of the parties.

Upon the grounds thus mentioned Mr. Goni feels himself obliged to insist upon the adoption of peremptory measures to prevent the departure of the monitors in question. He fortifies this position by stating from common report that the vessels are not in the hands of the local authorities, and it is not known what orders have been issued about them. He begs, therefore, that immediate measures be taken to detain the monitors Catawba and Oneota.

The undersigned has the honor in reply to inform Mr. Goni, in the first place, that the Peruvian Government on its part insists that the situation of war between herself and allies on the one part and Spain on the other has practically come to an end by the cessation of all hostilities on either side since the 2d day of May, 1866.

The undersigned has further the honor to inform Mr. Goni that the Peruvian Government alleges in support of its position the fact that Chile and Spain, Chile being one of the allied belligerents and Spain the other belligerent, have in the present year voluntarily joined themselves together in peaceful and friendly concert and cooperation in waiving objections to the clearance from British ports of ships of war for the respective parties. So far as this department is informed, this statement is not controverted by the Spanish Government, and Peru insists that the proceeding is equivalent to an acknowledgment on the part of Spain of the pretensions made by Peru that the situation of war between the belligerent Republics and Spain has come to an end. Peru agrees in this respect that Spain can not claim before the Government of Great Britain to be at peace and at the same time claim before the Government of the United States to be at war with Peru and her allies, the position of the United States and Great Britain in regard to the belligerents being identical.

Mr. Goni is informed, in the third place, that the Peruvian Government distinctly proposes to the Government of the United States that, if it shall consent to the clearance of the Catawba and the Oneota, the Peruvian Government will give adequate security that those vessels shall not be employed in any hostile proceeding against Spain or any other nation on their way to the port of Callao, in the Pacific, but shall keep the peace until the vessels shall have arrived in the harbor of Callao, there to be used for purposes of domestic defense and security.

Mr. Goni is further informed, in the fourth place, that the House of Representatives, having taken the subject of the sale and proposed departure of these vessels into consideration with a view to some possible legislative action thereupon, directions have been given by the President that those vessels shall not receive clearance or be permitted to depart while the subject is engaging the attention of Congress. The vessels are for this reason detained at present, and will be so temporarily detained, whatever appearances or presumptions to the contrary may anywhere exist.

In consequence of the proceedings of the House of Representatives which have been referred to, it seems to the President that the occasion has not yet arrived when it will be necessary for him to decide the grave question which has been raised before this Government between the ministers of Spain and Peru, namely, the question whether the war which was heretofore waged between those nations has been practically brought to an end or not. Frankness, however, obliges the undersigned to say that unless some unforseen circumstances shall soon occur, the time for acting upon that question would seem to be near at hand.

The undersigned freely admits the difficulties which are likely to attend the decision of the question. It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences. What period of suspension of war is necessary to justify the presumption of the restoration of peace has never yet been settled, and must in every case be determined with reference to collateral facts and circumstances.

The proceedings of Spain and Chile which have been referred to, although inconclusive, require an explanation on the part of either of those powers which shall insist that the condition of war still exists. Peru, equally with Spain, has as absolute a right to decline the good offices or mediation of the United States for peace as either has to accept the same. The refusal of either would be inconclusive as an evidence of determination to resume or continue the war. It is to the interest of the United States, and of all nations, that the return of peace, however it may be brought about, shall be accepted whenever it has become clearly established. Whenever the United States shall find itself obliged to decide the question whether the war still exists between Spain and Peru, or whether that war has come to an end, it will make that decision only after having carefully examined all the pertinent facts which shall be within its reach, and after having given due consideration to such representations as shall have been made by the several parties interested.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

I also print an excerpt from volume 3 of the Madison papers, pages 1351–1353, quoting the debates in the Federal convention, August 17, 1787, on the power to "make war":

"To make war."

Mr. Pinckney opposed the vesting this power in the legislature. Its proceedings were too slow. It wd. meet but once a year. The Hs. of Reps. would be too numerous for such deliberations. The Senate would be the best depositary, being more acquainted with foreign affairs, and most capable of proper resolutions. If the States are equally represented in Senate, so as to give no advantage to large States, the power will notwithstanding be safe, as the small have their all at stake in such cases as well as the large States. It would be singular for one authority to make war and another peace.

Mr. Butler. The objections agst. the legislature lie in a great degree agst. the Senate. He was for vesting the power in the President, who will have all the requisite qualities, and will not make war but when the Nation will support it.

Mr. M[adison] and Mr. Gerry moved to insert "declare," striking out "make" war; leaving to the Executive the power to repel sudden attacks.

Mr. Sherman thought it stood very well. The Executive shd. be able to repel and not to commence war. "Make" better than "declare," the latter narrowing the power too much.

Mr. Gerry never expected to hear in a Republic a motion to empower the Executive alone to declare war.

Mr. Elsworth. There is a material difference between the cases of making war and making peace. It shd. be more easy to get out of war than into it. War also is a simple and overt declaration, peace attended with intricate & secret negociations.

Mr. Mason was agst. giving the power of war to the Executive, because not (safely) to be trusted with it; or to the Senate, because not so constructed as to be entitled to it. He was for clogging rather than facilitating war, but for facilitating peace. He preferred "declare" to "make."

On the motion to insert declare in place of make (it was agreed to).

N. H. no., Mas. abst., Cont. no. (On the remark by Mr. King that "make" war might be understood to "conduct" it, which was an Executive fuunction, Mr. Elseworth gave up his objection (and the vote of Cont. was changed to aye.) Mr. Butler moved to give the legislature power of peace, as they were to have that of war.

Mr. Gerry 2ds. him. 8 Senators may possibly exercise the power if vested in that body, and 14 if all should be present, and may, consequently, give up part of the U. States. The Senate are more liable to be corrupted by an enemy than the whole Legislature.

ANNEX C.

SECTION 3 OF THE RESOLUTION IS NOT OBJECTIONABLE EITHER BECAUSE IT MAKES A TREATY OR BECAUSE IT DELEGATES LEGISLATIVE POWER TO THE PRESIDENT.

There are many statutes involving trade arrangements with other countries passed by Congress since 1794 which either gave powers to the President to modify trade relationships with other countries or which allowed him to do certain things in case they did or did not do certain other things.

The act of June 4, 1794, authorized the President to lay an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States "whenever in his opinion the public safety shall so require" and under regulations, to be continued or revoked "whenever he shall think proper."

The act of Congress of June 13, 1798, suspended commercial intercourse between the United States and France, but provided that if France should disavow and refrain from certain aggressions against the United States, "it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, being well ascertained of the premises, to remit and discontinue the prohibitions" of the act "and to make proclamation thereof accordingly."

The act of February 9, 1799, supplemented the above act by authorizing the President to remit and discontinue for the time being the restraints and the prohibitions upon trade with France, "if he shall deem it expedient and consistent with the interest of the United States."

The act of April 18, 1806, as amended by the act of December 19, 1806, authorized the President to suspend its operations "if in his judgment the public interest should require it." This was an act making unlawful the importation of certain articles from Great Britain.

The act of March 3, 1815, imposed duties upon certain imports and provided for its repeal "whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the discriminating or countervailing duties of such foreign nation, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States," had been abolished.

The act of March 3, 1817, prohibited the importation of plaster of Paris from certain countries, but gave the President of the United States authority to declare the fact that any country had discontinued certain discriminating regulations and provided that the restrictions of the act should cease from the date of the proclamation.

The act of January 7, 1824, authorized the President to issue a proclamation declaring that certain foreign discriminating duties had been discontinued, whereupon the retaliatory provision of the act in question should cease. The statute of May 31, 1830, was to much the same effect. See also act of May 24, 1828.

The statute of August 5, 1854, contains a similar provision.

The act of March 6, 1866, provided for the suspension of the importation of neat cattle and hides whenever either the Secretary of the Treasury or the President deemed such importation dangerous to the cattle of the United States. A similar provision is carried in the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890.

The act of March 23, 1874, authorized the President to suspend extraterritoriality in Egypt whenever he was satisfied that American citizens in Egypt would receive impartial justice in Egyptian courts.

The act of June 26, 1884, authorized the President from time to time to suspend certain tonnage on vessels entering from certain ports.

The act of June 19, 1886, as amended by the act of April 4, 1888, vests powers in the President similar to those of 1824 and 1828, above mentioned.

The acts of 1809 and 1810 were sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of "The Brig Aurora" (7 Cranch, 382).

The McKinley Tariff Act of October 1, 1890, section 3, provided in part as follows:

That with a view to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing the following articles, and for this purpose, on and after the 1st day of January, 1892, whenever, and so often as the President shall be satisfied that the government of any country producing and exporting sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, or any of such articles, imposes duties or other exactions upon the agricultural or other products of the United States, which in view of the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides into the United States he may deem to be reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, he shall have the power and it shall be his duty to suspend, by proclamation to that effect, the provisions of this act relating to the free introduction of such sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the production of such country, for such time as he shall deem just; and in such case and during such suspension duties shall be levied, collected, and paid upon sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, the product of or exported from such designated country, as follows, namely—

In the leading case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649) the court, construing the foregoing section, said:

While some of these precedents are stronger than others in their application to the case before us, they all show that, in the judgment of the legislative branch of the Government, it is often desirable, if not essential for the protection of the interests of our people against the unfriendly or discriminating regulations established by foreign governments, in the interests of their people, to invest the President with large discretion in matters arising out of the execution of statutes relating to trade and commerce with other nations.

That Congress can not delegate legislative power to the President is a principle universally recognized as vital to the integrity and maintenance of the system of government ordained by the Constitution. The act of October 1, 1890, in the particular case under consideration, is not inconsistent with that principle. It does not, in any real sense, invest the President with the power of legislation. For the purpose of securing reciprocal trade with countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, Congress itself determined that the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, permitting the free introduction of such articles, should be suspended as to any country producing and exporting them that imposed exactions and duties on the agricultural and other products of the United States, which the President deemed—that is, which he found to be—reciprocally unequal and unreasonable. Congress itself prescribed, in advance, the duties to be levied, collected, and paid on sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides produced by or exported from such designated country while the suspension lasted. Nothing involving the expediency or the just operation of such legislation was left to the determination of the President. The words "he may deem," in the third section, of course implied that the President would examine the commercial regulations of other countries producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, and form a judgment as to whether they were reciprocally equal and reasonable, or the contrary, in their effect upon American products. But when he ascertained the fact that duties and exactions, reciprocally unequal and unreasonable, were imposed upon the agricultural or other products of the United States by a country producing and exporting sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, or hides, it became his duty to issue a proclamation declaring the suspension as to that country which Congress had determined should occur. He had no discretion in the premises except in respect to the duration of the suspension so ordered. But that related only to the enforcement of the policy established by Congress. As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation in obedience to the legislative will he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugar, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides from particular countries should be suspended in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed.

The Dingley Tariff Act of July 24, 1897, sections 3 and 5, has similar provisions, as has also the Payne law of August 5, 1909, sections 2 and 6. See also the Underwood law of October 3, 1913, section 4, subdivisions A and E.

The Canadian reciprocity law of July 26, 1911, established certain rates upon imports from Canada and provided "that the duties above enumerated shall take effect whenever the President of the United States shall have satisfactory evidence and shall make proclamation that on the articles hereinafter enumerated * * *, when imported from the United States into the Dominion of Canada, duties not in excess of the following are imposed."

A similar situation is found in the international copyright law of 1891 of the United States, which empowers the President to extend by proclamation the benefits of the law to foreigners when assured that United States citizens are allowed copyright benefits in the other State on substantially the same basis as are its own citizens or when the other State is a party to an international reciprocity copyright agreement open to the United States.

Herewith are printed three paragraphs on the same general subject from Crandall's Treaties: Their Making and Enforcement:

(1) COMMERCIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Paragraph 753: The act of March 3, 1815, declared a repeal of discriminating duties against vessels, and products imported therein, of nations in which discriminating duties against the United States did not exist, the President to determine in each case by proclamation the application of the repeal. The acts of January 7, 1824, and May 24, 1828, likewise authorized the President to suspend by proclamation discriminating duties so far as they affected the vessels of a foreign nation when possessed of satisfactory evidence that no such discriminating duties were imposed by that nation against the vessels of the United States. Section 11 of the act of June 19, 1886, as amended by the act of April 4, 1888, vests similar power in the President. A partial suspension is allowed by the act of July 24, 1897. On the authority of these statutes numerous arrangements have been reached with foreign States and made operative by proclamation. The evidence accepted by the President as sufficient may be a note or dispatch or a memorandum of an agreement. The proclamations relative to abolishing discriminating duties on trade with Cuba and Porto Rico of February 14, 1884; October 27, 1886; and September 21, 1887, were based on memoranda of agreements signed with Spain February 13, 1884; October 27, 1886; and September 21, 1887.

Section 3 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, authorized and directed the President, whenever the government of any country producing and exporting certain enumerated articles imposed duties or other exactions on the products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of the enumerated articles into the United States, were, in his opinion, unreasonable or unequal, to suspend as to that country the privilege of free importation and subject the articles in question to certain discriminating duties. Ten commercial arrangements were concluded and made effective by means of this section—January 31, 1891, with Brazil; June 4, the Dominican Republic; June 16, Spain; December 30, Guatemala; January 30, 1892, Germany; February 1, Great Britain; March 11, Nicaragua; April 29, Honduras; May 25, Austria-Hungary; and November 29, Salvador. These were all terminated by section 71 of the tariff act of August 27, 1894. Section 3 of the act of 1890 having been assailed as involving an unlawful delegation of legislative power, its constitutionality was sustained by the Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 649). Section 3 of the act of July 24, 1897, not only provides, as did section 3 of the act of 1890, for the imposition by proclamation of certain differential rates, but also for the conclusion by the President of commercial agreements with countries producing certain enumerated articles, in which concessions may be secured in favor of the products of the United States; and it further authorizes the President, when such concessions are, in his judgment, reciprocal and equivalent, to suspend by proclamation the collection on those articles of the regular duties imposed by the act and subject them to special rates as provided in the section. On the authority of this section the President has concluded and made effective the commercial agreements of May 28, 1898, with France; May 22, 1899, with Portugal (protocol making corrections signed January 11, 1900); July 10, 1900, with Germany; and February 8, 1900, with Italy.

(2) INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT.

Paragraph 754. The international copyright convention signed at Berne September 9, 1886, originally by 10 States, has been acceded to by all the principal nations except Russia, Austria-Hungary, and the United States. International copyright in the United States is regulated by the law of March 3, 1891, section 13 of which empowers the President to extend by proclamation the benefits of the law to citizens and subjects of a foreign State when assured that citizens of the United States are allowed the benefit of copyright in that State on substantially the same basis as its own citizens, or when the State is a party to an international agreement which provides for reciprocity in the granting of copyright, by the terms of which the United States may at its pleasure become a party. Under the first alternative the President has extended the benefits of the law by proclamation to subjects of Belgium, France, Great Britain and possessions, and Switzerland, July 1, 1891; Germany, April 15, 1892; Italy, October 31, 1892; Denmark, May 8, 1893; Portugal, July 20, 1893; Spain, July 10, 1895; Mexico, February 27, 1896; Chile, May 25, 1896; Costa Rica, October 19, 1899; the Netherlands and possessions, November 20, 1899; Cuba, March 17, 1903; and Norway, July 1, 1905.

(3) POSTAL CONVENTIONS.

Paragraph 755. Following the postal convention with New Granada of March 6, 1844, numerous other conventions of the same nature were concluded by the President and ratified with the consent of the Senate. By the act of June 8, 1872, the Postmaster General is given the power to enter into money-order agreements with the post departments of foreign Governments, and by and with the advice and consent of the President to negotiate and conclude postal conventions. In virtue of this act conventions of this class have been concluded by the Executive without submission to the Senate. Among these are the universal postal conventions signed at Vienna July 4, 1891, and at Washington June 15, 1897. (Crandall, Treaties: Their Making and Enforcement, 88–92.)

Under the foregoing precedents and decisions there can be no valid question raised as to the constitutionality of section 3. Section 3 is not an offer to a treaty or a delegation of legislative power. It is simply a foreign trade arrangement of a sort repeatedly enacted by Congress. Even if there were no statutory or judicial affirmation of the legality of the section it would be sustained under the clause of the Constitution which permits Congress to "regulate commerce with foreign nations," and as the section involves the regulation of exports and imports it may also be sustained by the clause which, after granting powers of taxation to Congress, provides that Congress may pass laws necessary for the general welfare. It has none of the elements of a treaty of peace, because it might equally well have been enacted by Congress if the war with Germany had already ended in the usual manner by a duly ratified treaty of peace.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, in the forepart of this debate opponents of this resolution charged that its passage would embarrass the President and that it was offered for that purpose. The latter part of this I emphatically deny. Neither do I know whether the presenting of this resolution to the President for his approval or disapproval will embarrass him. With that I must confess I am not concerned. I do know, however, that for months the American people have been more than embarrassed, because we are technically in a state of war, while the nations of the world are at peace, and that this condition the President has not cared to remove. [Applause on the Republican side.] If, then, in voting upon this resolution I must choose between embarrassing the President or embarrassing the American people, I, for one, am not going to hesitate as to whom my vote will embarrass.

After having heard from the President, Congress, on the 6th day of April, 1917, declared that a state of war existed with Germany. In the declaration Congress pledged toward the prosecution of the war "all the resources of the country."

This pledge was literally fulfilled in the legislation that followed. Laws were enacted which made available to the President our total man power and our enormous wealth. In addition, Congress, with almost a disregard of personal and property rights, conferred upon the President the powers of a virtual dictatorship. We were, in fact, "a nation at arms."

This could only result in victory.

On November 11, 1918, the President addressed Congress and submitted to it the terms of an armistice, and informed Congress that the war had ended, using this language:

The war thus comes to an end; for, having accepted these terms of armistice, it will be impossible for the German command to renew it. * * *

We know only that this tragical war is at an end.

We know that the object of the war is attained * * * with a sweeping completeness.

Armed imperialism is at an end * * * the power of the military caste of Germany * * * is discredited and destroyed.

Civilization had triumphed. Free and representative government had been saved. The whole Nation rejoiced and looked for an early resumption of peace. This was one and one-half years ago. The terms of the armistice have been complied with.

Demobilization was completed months ago. Our allies are at peace. Yet this country finds itself technically in a state of war. In fulfilling its pledge powers were conferred upon the Executive that no one would think of conferring except in times of national peril. Freedom of speech was restricted to the end that the morale of our people might not be affected by the preachers of sedition; freedom of the press was interfered with for similar reasons and so as not to disclose military plans to our enemies. In many cases private mills and factories were taken over bodily by the Government. In many other ways the rights of persons and of property were either curtailed or restricted. These powers still remain with the President. As a consequence there is uncertainty in trade and commerce and discontent generally. Among these acts still in force are the following: The food-control act, trading-with-the-enemy act, the espionage act, the Overman departmental consolidation act, an act authorizing loans to foreign Governments, the draft law, the War Finance Corporation act, and over 50 others. The powers given and the legislation enacted was with the expectation that upon the coming of peace they would cease to operate. The country wants peace at home as well as in Europe.

After the signing of the armistice there remained but the formal ending of the war. Ordinarily this is done by the belligerents agreeing to a treaty of peace. The power to make treaties under our Constitution is found in Article II, section 2, and reads as follows:

He—

shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

It will be noted that the provision is not "consent" and "submission," but "advice and consent." Heretofore treaties have been negotiated through commissioners or representatives appointed by the President. In this case the President chose to go himself. His mission was to agree with our allies as to terms of peace and to assist in the drawing up of a plan which would reduce the possibility of future wars. It was a great mission, too great to run chances of a failure.

Did he before leaving "advise" and "consult" with the Senate, his coequal? The records say no.

In three months he returned with the treaty incompleted, but with the completed draft of a constitution of a league of nations. This constitution set up a political organization which was to be a supergovernment. It would maintain peace by the use of force and power rather than by the application of the principles of justice administered by and through a court of international jurists governed by an international code of law and equity.

Upon arriving here at Boston, referring to those who questioned the wisdom of the plan, he said, "I have fighting blood in me and it is sometimes a delight to let it have scope, but if it is a challenge on this occasion it will be an indulgence." Shortly thereafter 39 Senators, being more than one-third of the membership of the Senate, informed the President in unmistakable terms that they would not consent to a treaty embodying the provisions of the constitution of the League of Nations as then framed. They thereupon "advised" him as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the negotiations on the part of the United States should be immediately directed to the utmost expedition of the urgent business of negotiating peace terms with Germany satisfactory to the United States * * * and that the proposal for a league of nations to insure the permanent peace of the world should be then taken up for careful and serious consideration.

If he had taken this advice the treaty of peace would have been signed and ratified months ago. We would have had peace in law as well as in fact months ago in this country, and Europe would not be in its present chaotic state. His answer, however, to the Senate was that there was a reason for every phrase, and that it should not be changed even so much as the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Knowing our abhorrence of war and our earnest desire for the establishment of permanent peace among the nations of the world, and also our desire to return to a peace basis at home, the President, with keen appreciation of the possibilities thereby created, determined to use this as a leverage to compel the ratification of the treaty just as it had been drawn overseas. I quote from his remarks just before sailing for Europe in March of 1919:

When that treaty comes back, gentlemen on this side—

Meaning the Senate—

will find the covenant not only in it but so many threads of the treaty tied to the covenant that you can not dissect the covenant from the treaty without destroying the whole vital structure.

In disregard of the advice of his constitutional advisers he carried out his threat and in July returned to America with the covenant closely interwoven with the treaty of peace. Again he gave similar injunctions that the treaty must be adopted without change or amendment.

At Versailles, when the treaty provisions had been fully agreed upon between the Allies, Germany was notified to send her representatives to subscribe to the treaty. These representatives suggested and demanded certain changes which the Allies refused. Germany was thereupon told to "Sign here," and Germany signed as commanded. Thus spoke the victor to the vanquished. This was the judgment of a righteous judge handing down the law to an international culprit. When the treaty was brought home to the American people who fought the war and there presented to their representatives in the Senate, the President's constitutional advisers, his mandate in effect was the same, "Sign here." But the Senate did not sign. Twice the Senate Americanized the treaty by appropriate reservations. Before the treaty had been completed in Europe Great Britain had reserved the freedom of the seas and six votes to our one in the assembly. France had reserved the Saar Basin, while Japan, with utter disregard of international morals, had reserved Shantung.

The President, however, denied to the Senate the privilege of keeping the covenant in accord with our own Constitution. [Applause on the Republican side.] Instructions were sent out from the White House to reject the treaty if Americanized. I quote from Senator OWEN, one of the President's most staunch defenders, as follows:

I do not believe that there is a single Democratic Senator who would not vote for this resolution of ratification if it were not for the belief of such Senators that the President of the United States desires them to defeat the resolution of ratification now pending.

The Senate, being unable to obtain sufficient Democratic votes in order to pass this Americanized treaty by a two-thirds vote, returned it to the President, where it now remains. In the meantime, with our imports increasing monthly and our exports decreasing monthly, must we continue on a war basis while our allies and competitors are upon a peace basis? Must we continue at war because the President insists upon the treaty as it is, while a majority of the Senate refuse their consent without Americanization reservations? Must we continue in a state of war until peace is made by a treaty?

Every recognized authority on international law agrees that war between nations can be ended in three ways: First, by complete and continued cessation of hostilities; second, by conquest and subjugation of one nation by the other; third, by negotiating a treaty of peace. This principle was acknowledged by Secretary Seward and is set forth in Moore's Digest on International Law, volume 7, page 336, and reads as follows:

It is certain that a condition of war can be raised without an authoritative declaration of war, and, on the other hand, the situation of peace may be restored by the long suspension of hostilities without a treaty of peace being made. History is full of such occurrences.

Clearly, then, war can be ended not only by a treaty of peace but through complete and continued cessation of hostilities. The more common and preferable plan is to end by treaty. To so end war does not interfere with a treaty later. This principle is clearly applicable to the present situation. Germany sued for peace and an armistice was agreed upon and signed, which brought the war to an end. That condition has continued to this day. It is true that the ending of a war in this manner necessarily involves an uncertainty as to the time when war really ended. It is easy to determine the time of the cessation of hostilities, but difficult to decide when a de facto peace ripens into a de jure peace. For the present we can not agree among ourselves about the terms of a treaty. The treaty-making power is deadlocked. Must we, then, remain at war or shall we recognize the existence of a de facto peace by formally declaring the war at an end? This, and this only, does the first paragraph of the pending resolution accomplish.

Under this method of ending war who shall declare and proclaim the fact that war has ended? Does this power rest in the President, or in the President and the Senate, or in the legislative branch of the Government? The power rests somewhere by very reason of our existence as a sovereign Nation. So far as an express grant of power to declare or proclaim peace or that war has ended, the Constitution is silent. Neither does the Constitution by express words prohibit the exercise of that power by any particular branch of the Government. It is clearly, then, an implied or incidental power. It is not a judicial function. There is absolutely no provision which can be construed into making it an Executive function. Upon reason it belongs in the policy-making branch of the Government. This is the legislative branch. Congress is the policy-making body excepting as to treaties, and this resolution is in no sense a treaty. Under the Constitution all legislative powers are vested in a Congress consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives. This is qualified by the provision granting unto the President the right and authority to approve or withhold his approval of legislative acts with the provision that in the event of his disapproval, upon reconsideration and a two-thirds vote in the affirmative from each House, the bill or resolution shall become a law without his signature. The power to legislate, therefore, is in both Congress and the President unless upon reconsideration by a two-thirds vote Congress passes a measure over his veto. In such case the legislative power is solely in Congress.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution mentions the various grants of power to Congress, including the power to declare war, and also "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The legislative branch of the Government is, therefore, made the judge of what shall constitute a cause of war, or the existence of the state of war; of all of the resources and ability of the Government to wage war; of the wisdom or expediency of applying its spiritual and material resources in waging war; in fact, of every conceivable circumstance that can in any way influence the Nation to consider the question of entering the war.

The declaration of war, therefore, is a legislative act, and can be declared by a joint resolution receiving a majority vote in both House and Senate providing it receives the approval of the President. War can be declared without the approval of the President if upon reconsideration following his disapproval it receives more than a two-thirds vote in each House.

Congress can in the same manner that it passes a law repeal it. With the approval of the President it can repeal a declaration of war by a majority vote in each House. Upon reconsideration following his disapproval it can by a two-thirds vote in each House repeal a declaration of war. There being complete and continued cessation of hostilities with Germany, and Germany having sued for peace, Congress has the power to repeal the declaration of war and thereby end the war. What Congress can do indirectly by the repeal of the declaration of war it certainly can do directly by an announcement or declaration that the war has ended. Whiting on War Powers under the Constitution says:

> As it is in the power of the legislative department to declare war and to provide or withhold the means of carrying it on, Congress also may, after hostilities shall have ceased, declare or recognize peace.

Can it be claimed that what everyone else knows and proclaims to be a fact can not be acknowledged or proclaimed by the legislative branch of the Government?

Will the gentleman contend that if the President should approve this resolution after it had been passed by both Houses that the resolution would be a nullity for lack of constitutional power upon the part of Congress to enact it? Or do you insist that it is not within the power of Congress by a two-thirds vote to pass the resolution over his veto? If so, point out to me any provision in the Constitution which expressly or impliedly restricts or qualifies the right of Congress to pass any measure over the veto of the President.

Mr. Speaker, distinguished gentlemen upon the Democratic side have argued that the power to declare the war at an end is vested solely in the President and the Senate. They confuse the power to recognize a fact and condition approved by every authority on international law, that war can be ended by the complete and continued cessation of hostilities, with the power to make or negotiate treaties of peace. The two are vastly different. One is merely an announcement by one of the belligerents of an existing and established fact. The other involves negotiations and the consent of at least two nations. If the arguments of my Democratic friends are followed this resolution could not become a law even though it should unanimously pass both Houses over the President's veto. Furthermore, even though the President might approve such a resolution and the House pass it unanimously, and a majority of the Senate vote for it, yet, for the lack of a two-thirds vote in the Senate we would continue to remain in a state of war.

Further, the President has asserted the right in the event of the ratification of the treaty by the Senate with the Americanized reservations to refuse to exchange ratification notes with Germany. That is, the President has announced the fact that if the Senate by a two-thirds vote ratified the treaty with the reservations attached he would pigeonhole it. If the gentlemen's contentions are correct and Congress has no constitutional power to pass this or a similar resolution we might some day be confronted with this situation: We are at war. The war ends. A treaty of peace ending that war was negotiated and presented to the Senate. The Senate is unanimous in changing and amending the treaty and unanimously ratifies it as amended. The President then, because of the changes, pigeonholes it. If the arguments of my Democratic friends are sound the country must nevertheless remain at war, although every Senator, every Representative, and every citizen of the United States, excepting the President, wants peace. This proposition is absurd and unthinkable. I dissent from the doctrine that the sole power of declaring peace under any and all circumstances is vested in the President, to there remain until he with two-thirds of the Senate agree. I challenge you to produce a single authority that Congress by joint resolution following a veto is powerless to declare a state of war to have ceased to exist, providing such resolution passes each House by a two-thirds vote.

You, my Democratic friends, won a presidential campaign in 1916 with the slogan "He kept us out of war." Are you now planning to conduct this coming campaign upon the slogan "He kept us in war"? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not know that right had been granted.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I can not hope to add very much light to the intricate constitutional questions which have been considered and discussed in this discussion in the short period of 10 minutes. I do desire for a minute to look at the Constitution as it is written. It is always a good plan when you go to construe a part of the organic law to look at its location in the instrument, look at the concomitants of the paragraph. Let us see where the treaty-making power is granted to the President and what it accompanies, and what is the result of the arguments made here, that when the treaty-making power fails to be exercised because of a disagreement then somebody else can step in and take up that power. Article II, section 2, paragraph 2, of the Constitution says:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—

To do what?—

> to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States—

And so forth.

Now, the learned gentleman, the leader on that side, said the other day, and the report says, that the President and the Senate having failed to make a treaty, having failed to agree, and having become deadlocked, then it became competent for the Congress to come in and declare and do what it proposes now to do.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; nobody yields in this discussion. Now, I want to ask the learned gentleman: Suppose the nominee for Chief Justice of the United States should fail because of a deadlock between the President and the Senate. Suppose the appointment of all the justices of the Supreme Court should fail because of a deadlock of the President and the Senate. Does the gentleman contend that Congress could come in here and by a joint resolution declare that Edward Douglas White shall be the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to ask you in reference to what happened in Georgia a little more than a year ago to the nomination of a judge of the district court which failed. For a year there was a vacancy. There were two appointments rejected by the Senate, and it looked as if an impasse had been reached by the President and the Senate.

Was there any Solomon found in the Republican Party who had no more sense than to rise up and say, "We can pass a joint resolution saying here that Justice Wright, nominated by the President and rejected by the Senate, shall be judge of the Circuit Court of the Southern District of Georgia"? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Does anybody contend for any such silly proposition as that? Well, you say if this Congress can not do that, nevertheless you can usurp the very same power, given by the very same clause, written by the same stroke of the pen, enacted in the Constitution of this Government by the same action and inspiration which gave him the power to make a treaty, with the advice and consent of the Senate! Now, gentlemen, there is another thing that is a good deal talked about here. They say we can declare, and the report says that we can declare, a state of peace. When we are in peace we can declare it. That is very true. If you take the first clause of your resolution, you can declare a fact, but it does nothing else. You could have saved yourself the danger of veto if you had simply taken that, because a concurrent resolution is just as good to declare a fact as a joint resolution. It would not have required the signature of the President, and is worth just as much as your joint resolution would be. But there is another principle of constitutional law you must remember, and that is when you come to construe a proposition you must construe the act as a whole and not by sections, and when you come to construe this as a whole you will see, as was unanswerably established by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that you not only undertake to declare a state of peace, but you undertake to inaugurate negotiations with Germany for a treaty of peace upon certain well-defined issues, and that being unconstitutional, it destroys the whole intent of your resolution, because nobody would be so foolish as to believe the House of Representatives would pass this resolution, which declares that a state of peace existed, without section 3, which undertakes to negotiate with Germany.

You have got to make arrangements for our people to trade.

Now, I want to cite for just one minute a very distinguished authority, also cited by Mr. CONNALLY, of Texas, a while ago, on the question that has been so often reiterated here. One gentleman said that common sense is law, and that it is common sense that if we can declare war we can declare peace. But common sense can not override the Constitution. I want to cite you to the report of the Judiciary Committee of the Forty-ninth Congress, made by John Randolph Tucker, approved by this House, and found amongst its reports to-day, in which he says:

> Some stress is laid upon the power of a treaty of peace to repeal a declaration of war. It is conceded that this may be true, but the reverse is equally true. A peace by a treaty to-day may be repealed by a declaration of war to-morrow. Congress can not create the status of peace by repealing its declaration of war, because the former requires the concurrence of two wills, the latter but the action of one.

Let us see what happened to this report. You had a very distinguished leader of this House on the Republican side a few years ago by the name of Payne, of New York. His name is written on one of the great tariff bills of this country. He refers to this, and you will find his remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He says:

> I think, Mr. Speaker, that no committee of this House would ever present a report on this question which did not embody substantially the report of Randolph Tucker, made some years ago, from the reasoning of which I think any lawyer who will fairly read it will say that there is no escape. (57th Cong., 1st sess., RECORD, p. 1183.)

That is from one of the fathers of the Republican Party of 10 or 15 years ago. I cite here numerous authorities on that subject:

[From Tucker's Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power, p. 374, secs. 325 and 326.]

Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1502) says (sec. 325):

* * * "A power given by the Constitution can not be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and can not supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other."

Section 326, in Foster v. Neilson (2 Peters, 314 Marshall, C. J.), says:

"A treaty is, in its nature, a contract between two nations, not a legislative act, and does not generally effect of itself the object to be accomplished, but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respective parties to the instrument. In the United States the Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land."

[From Tucker's Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power, p. 356, secs. 311 and 312.]

Citing further from John Randolph's report to Forty-ninth Congress:

Section 311: "The argument may be thus stated: The Constitution has created diverse agencies for the different functions to be performed. The power of taxation is exclusive in the Congress. The power to make treaties is exclusive in the President and Senate. These two are independent of each other, with no direct control by either over the other.

Section 312: "The status of war created by Congress may be determined by a status of peace created by treaty—agreements as to mutual extradition, mutual expatriation, for the cession of territory to the United States, mutual intercourse by ambassadors, etc., and all proposals as to matters which may be consummated by statutory law.

"Some stress is laid upon the power of a treaty of peace to repeal a declaration of war. It is conceded that this may be true, but the reverse is equally true. A peace by treaty to-day may be repealed by a declaration of war to-morrow. Congress can not create the status of peace by repealing its declaration of war, because the former requires the concurrence of two wills, the latter but the action of one."

SEC. 310. The result from a true construction of the Constitution is this: Both powers are independent in their respective orbits. The law-making power must be heard in its full voice in all that operates on the people as statutory law. Their taxes must be collected and their money appropriated by the laws of Congress. Their commerce, their defense by Army and Navy, their coinage, their citizenship, and their internal administration must be under the control of the legislative department.

The Congress can not reach out to negotiate with other nations. It can not make compacts or agreements. It may condition its own legislation on that of foreign nations and thus make overtures of international policy. But the nexus of international faith must be bound by the treaty-making power, and Congress may pass the laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the stipulation of a treaty. The treaty is executory and tentative as to all which it can not do of and by itself, and which requires the perfecting and completing hand of the legislative power.

[From Tucker's Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power. Same report, continued, p. 357, sec. 313.]

SEC. 313. While the constitutional system of our great Republic differs very much from that of Great Britain, it is an historic fact that ours was framed upon the British model as to the distribution of the functions of the three departments of government, with a radical departure in respect to the sources of the powers of all of them. Annul the hereditary principle as the source of authority in the British constitution and substitute the popular will for it, and the likeness between the two in the distribution of powers is very striking.

By the British constitution the powers of peace and war—of treaty making—are in the Crown. The power over taxation is primarily in the Commons, as a consummate law, in the King, Lords, and Commons. All money bills, to levy taxes and to appropriate their proceeds, must originate with the Commons.

The treaty power in the Crown is as absolute as the money power in the Commons. The Crown can no more levy taxes or appropriate money than the Commons can make treaties. Independent in their spheres, these rival powers are conditioned for consummate effect upon the will of the other.

[From Tucker's Limitations on the Treaty-Making Power. Same report, continued, p. 363, sec. 316.]

SEC. 316. * * * In the meantime the power of making treaties was transferred from the Senate to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and a motion to add the House of Representatives was voted down by 10 States to 1 (Id., 1518, 1519), as it had been before. (Id., 1414, 1415.)

During this debate the necessity in Great Britain for action of Parliament in execution of treaties was referred to, but the treaty-making power was unquestionably left to the President and Senate, excluding the House of Representatives from any function in their negotiation.

Now, gentlemen, we have heard a great deal to-day about repealing the war legislation. My distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] made a great cry about the repeal of war legislation. I pause to ask if the gentleman from Alabama has ever introduced a bill to repeal a single one of these laws? If he has, it is sleeping to-day in the hands of a Republican committee under the direction of a Republican steering committee. I pause to ask also how many Republicans have introduced any bill to repeal any one of the war acts which are on the books and of which they now complain? If they have, where is the committee into whose custody it has gone and what have they done with it? Where is the steering committee that they do not bring it out and have it acted upon if the prosperity of this country depends upon it?

I want to call your attention to another thing. You are complaining that the President wants to keep from repealing war legislation. I want to read you what the President said not many months ago to this House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield me two minutes more?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. The President said on October 27:

> I object to and can not approve that part of this legislation with reference to war-time prohibition. It has to do with the enforcement of an act which was passed by reason of the emergencies of the war and whose objects have been satisfied in the demobilization of the Army and Navy, and whose repeal I have already sought at the hands of Congress.

Where the purposes of particular legislation arising out of war emergency have been satisfied, sound public policy makes clear the reason and necessity for repeal. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Oct. 27, 1919.)

And yet the Republican Party in this House, ever since the 19th of last May, with that before them, have refused to introduce and bring forth a single bill repealing a single one of the laws which they say now they must violate the Constitution in order to repeal. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And what did they do in response to that message? Why, they very promptly overruled the President in saying that it ought not to be kept in force, and 95 Republicans out of 120 that voted voted to overrule that doctrine and to keep on the people an emergency law that the President said should be repealed. And in that very distinguished assembly we find Mr. MONDELL and Mr. SNELL, who said a while ago we must loose the shackles of trade when he proposed by section 3 of this act an embargo on the part of America as bad as the embargo of 1808, which nearly drove New England out of the Union. And the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] also voted to override the President's views on that subject. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the proposition of section 3 is that if Germany fails to agree to our proposed legislative ultimatum we will put an embargo on our trade with her. How will that help trade? Will it not turn it all over to England? How will it help peace? Is not an embargo the first gun in war? I cite Henry Clay on that proposition on the embargo proposed April 1, 1812, by Madison. Henry Clay said, "He approved it because it was a direct precursor of war." Josiah Quincy said, referring to the Jefferson embargo while debating this proposed bill:

It is true that in those years the merchants did petition, not for embargo, not for commercial embarrassment and annihilation, but for protection. They at that time really thought that this National Government was formed for protection, and that it had at heart the prosperity of all the great interests of the country. If it was a grievous fault, grievously have the merchants answered it.

How aptly that describes the present proposition. If Germany does not tamely submit, then an embargo goes on except by license by the President. Thus, you bring in one of the most offensive forms of war—interference with business. Either the President will license all applicants, in which event the embargo is a mere bluff, or he will license some and refuse others, which would be manifestly unjust and would make "Rome howl," or he would in good faith apply the embargo to all and destroy our trade with Germany. [Applause.]

They asked you for relief, and you sent them embarrassment; they asked you for defense, and you imposed embargo; they asked bread, and you gave them a stone; they asked a fish, and you gave them a serpent.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, in the time allotted to me I will endeavor to discuss the provisions of H. J. Res. 325 as they appear to me. When I say that it seems to me this is a matter of political pretense and not of politiçal construction, I do not speak in any partisan spirit. There was no partisanship in the carrying on of the war; there should be no partisanship in so important a thing as the negotiation of peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Therefore I present my views of this resolution entirely without regard to partisanship, but based upon the legality and power of each of the three distinct elements in our governmental life.

I start with the assumption that the country wants to have the absolute knowledge that there is to continue to be an executive, a judicial, and a legislative body, all acting within their proper limits. Already we hear criticisms that the courts are going outside of the construction of laws, that they are making laws; we have heard, too, of the alleged encroachments of the executive; we are now facing a proposition of the encroachment of the legislative, and I think that the basis of our American prosperity in a governmental way is to make sure for all time the absolute separation of the executive, the judicial, and the legislative. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Therefore, in calling attention to what I do regarding this resolution, I beg your indulgence if I quote literally from the resolution, because I do not believe much in fighting windmills nor speaking in glittering generalities. I want to present to you the solid facts in this case, as I see them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], a very excellent student of international law, said that this was a mere declaration. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], an honored soldier of the Great War, said in his statement at the beginning, "We may as well sweep aside at first the question of the constitutionality of this measure."

Now, these are two very important premises. To them I add a third. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, said, in answer to an inquiry as to why Austria-Hungary was not included, "Why, we may only include that which the President has sent in his treaty as it was when sent to the Senate. We may only act upon what was sent to the Senate."

These are statements of responsible men, and I beg you for a moment to take consideration of them with me. In the first place, I challenge the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota that we are to sweep aside all questions of constitutionality. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because if we sweep aside all questions of constitutionality, then we sweep aside the basic law of government in the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I agree with the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is a declaration, and I need go no further with him than he states for himself that it is merely a declaration. Being a declaration, what does it amount to? How can it affect anybody? What good does it do? It can only be of effect when it attains the dignity of a treaty, and a treaty can only be of effect when it attains the dignity of a completed contract made in the way prescribed by our Constitution. These are the legal propositions that I want to make as strongly as I can before this body representing American citizens in this most important matter.

Now, the question has arisen, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] stated it, that it is a declaration of the end of the war. Well, it is all right if it stops there—a declaration of the end of the war. The President has said that the war is at an end. We know that, and everybody knows that. But there is a difference between the ending of a war and a treaty of peace, and the latest thing which this House has had and upon which it has acted has been the consideration of the bill H. R. 6810, in the report upon which the following appears as the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. He states "That war exists with both Germany and Austria-Hungary needs no argument. The armistice only suspends actual hostilities, and until treaties of peace have been ratified there is no peace."

That was stated in his report to accompany the bill H. R. 6810, and it was acted upon affirmatively by a great portion of the Members of this body, even over the veto of the President. It was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, so that we have this as the present law of the land, that until the Congress of the United States takes affirmative action in the matter of legislation which it has a right to pass by a repeal of that legislation, there is no repeal of such legislation, and until there be a treaty of peace and presidential proclamation there is no recognition and acknowledgment of the agreement of warring nations of the terms and conditions of that governmental contract which ends war and provides for peace.

These are the propositions I bring to you. I say the resolution provides terms for a treaty and goes further than the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] that it is a mere declaration, because in section 3 it states this:

The German Government shall duly notify the President of the United States that it has declared a termination of the war with the United States and that it waives and renounces on behalf of itself and its nationals any claim, demand, right, or benefit against the United States or its nationals that it or they would not have had the right to assert had the United States ratified the treaty of Versailles.

It does not refer to the end of the war and peace with the Austro-Hungarian Government, which is no part of this resolution, although it should be, if the resolution were open to amendment, because every man can see that it is necessary to make a number of amendments to clarify this resolution for even proper consideration in its acknowledged scope. But that is now foreclosed and I will not speak of it further.

There is in what I have quoted an absolute statement that we advance beyond that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls a declaration of the end of the war and invade the province of treaty making. There is absolutely no question about it. It has been established beyond a peradventure of a doubt by the very scholarly address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] and by the splendid speech, too, of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] that when it comes to the making of a treaty of peace there is constitutional warrant for only one way, and that way lies through the President of the United States, with the approval and consent of the Senate of the United States. We may act upon that which we have done. We may repeal that which we did in declaring war.

Let us do it. I stand with you. Let us sensibly enact the intent of section 2, and I will stand with you, because I say that the people of America to-day have the right to be relieved from oppressive war legislation. I stand with you and ask you to present on the majority side—and I will go as far as any one of you—the repeal of all laws that without warrant or necessity restrict the citizenship in this United States of America and continue it on a war basis a year and a half after the signing of the armistice.

Let us free the honest and law-abiding citizen from oppressive and unnecessarily restrictive legislation enacted only as incidents of the great emergency of a war which threatened our Nation's perpetuity. Let a competent committee of this House investigate and make report as to such of the war-time legislation as should be amended or repealed in the light of present-day conditions, and then let us act on this, as properly we may; but let us not pretend a vain thing nor seek to nullify our great charter of power, duties, and liberties, the Constitution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the chairman of the committee I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have been very much interested in listening to the discussions this afternoon, particularly those of my good friends on the Democratic side of the House. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], a distinguished member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, emphasized the fact that he was just as anxious for peace as any man in America. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], who just preceded me, made the same kind and type of an utterance. They even went further than that. They said they would stop at no limit in order to bring about peace if we would go about it in a sensible manner. They charged a lack of sincerity and good intention on the part of the Republicans in introducing the joint resolution. They prophesied all kinds of dire calamity to the country if it is passed.

Well, gentlemen on the Democratic side, I will submit the record of the Republican Party since its birth as to its sensibility when it comes to protecting the best interests of all things American. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It amounts to no excuse at all to have you say you are for peace if we will do it your way. That is a mere pretense for playing the political game as you have been told to play it by the other end of the Avenue. If you were sincere in your contention, you would support the resolution even though it were not exactly as you would have it. Do not be unmindful that the Constitution itself is the result of many compromises of extreme views. Scarcely if ever has a law passed this House that has suited every man in every particular who has voted for it. No, indeed, my friends, you are not opposed to this peace resolution because you do not like its form, but you are opposed to it because the gentleman who sits in the White House has ordered you to so be, and having been so long accustomed to do what you are told you are not now disappointing your master.

I want to direct your attention to another proposition. That proposition is this: Although I did not happen to be a Member of the preceding Congress, when war was declared, the records show that during all that time, in the prosecution of every single measure that looked toward a successful culmination of the war, there was never a straw laid in the way of progress by the Republican side of the House. Now look at the contrast. When we are making an honest effort to secure peace after 17 months of futile effort on the part of the President and the Senate, we find almost a solid front on the Democratic side of the House trying to block legislation. Can it be that the Democratic administration are loath to give up that unusual war power they have become accustomed to using? Is it possible they fear the repeal of the law limiting free speech, lest some one may tell something that would be embarrassing? Ah, my friends, either support this resolution or else let the public know that you enjoy war conditions.

I want to ask you men in all fairness if the Republican Party had supported the war as effectively and as forcefully and as unanimously as you are now trying to support an effort toward the attainment of peace, how rapidly and successfully would the prosecution of the war have gone on? Would Germany have been conquered yet? I will come right down to the proposition with you and say that perhaps this effort will not do all we claim it will; but in the name of all that is decent, is it not worth while to try it after the Senate and the Chief Executive have gotten themselves into a constitutional deadlock that seems to open no way to peace for the next 12 months? If you are sincere in your desire for peace, you will try any expedient that holds the promise of peace.

Is your patriotism being obliterated by your partisanship?

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BEGG. No; I will not.

Mr. UPSHAW. In all fairness.

Mr. BEGG. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but I have only a short time.

Most of this discussion this afternoon has been a discussion of the legal technicality of attorneys as to whether this instrument is a treaty. I want to say to you men—and I speak with respect—that the American people are not half so interested in the technicalities you may offer regarding the instrument as they are in the results of getting back to a normal condition. [Applause.]

I want to go further with you. I want to ask you since when did the executive department of the Government assume to itself the entire prerogative of traveling in the twilight zone of constitutionality? Of course, being constitutional lawyers, you know that every treaty that is made by any President is subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States, and if that treaty abrogates a single right of an American citizen that is guaranteed to him by virtue of that written instrument framed and known as the Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States stands as the savior of the rights of the individual as against a treaty made by any Executive or any Senate. [Applause.]

The Chief Executive does not have thrown around him a halo of protection from a review of his acts by the Supreme Court of the United States. The League of Nations in itself, my friends, has violated individual rights, if the Constitution of the United States means a thing in guaranteeing to me and to the citizens of this country our individual rights, and it can be reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The greatest act of sovereignty that any country—a republic, a democracy, or a monarchy—can exercise or perform is to summon its citizen from private life, clothe him in a uniform, put a gun or a sword in his hand, and send him forth to the battle field to die in the defense of that country if need be. No nation exercises any higher act of sovereignty than that. If the League of Nations means anything, it means a surrender of that right by America to a foreign body in which there sits only one American, and he not responsible to the American people directly, yet you object to the passage of a simple resolution declaring peace because you fear it to be unconstitutional. Would to God that Woodrow Wilson had had a little of your surplus respect for the Constitution when he drafted his league.

My friends, when you talk about our action to-day being unconstitutional do you know that you are setting yourselves up as judge and court not because you believe it, but because you are hunting for an excuse for your sins rather than a reason. [Applause.] You are not any surer that this is unconstitutional than any other attorney is sure that the League of Nations is unconstitutional; and if the Chief Executive can go through unscathed and hand that instrument to the American people without fear of unconstitutionality he shows more courage than you. He now holds over the confirming power a club in the laws that have been passed for him during the war time granting to him unusual power, unusual influence, unusual force, and he is using that unusual power as a club to compel the adoption of that instrument, which contains all the elements of unconstitutionality possible to imagine. I dare you to show that this resolution contains half the elements of unconstitutionality as the League of Nations and that we are overstepping our authority one-tenth as much as the President. It would seem to me your excuse for nonsupport falls pretty flat.

There is one other proposition that I would like to present for your consideration. When this Constitution was framed, and wisely framed, if those men in their wisdom saw fit to make any discrepancy in the powers of the three branches of government, that discrepancy was made against the Executive and in favor of the legislative. As an evidence of that fact I will cite you the specific provision in the Constitution which affords a means whereby the legislative branch of the Government can discipline the executive branch, even to the point of removal, while, on the contrary, you can not show a single line in the Constitution where the executive branch of this Government can do anything more than retard the legislative. The Executive can not discipline, he can not estop. Twice this Congress has passed laws over his veto. The only thing that he can do is to hinder or slow up through the veto power. That difference was unquestionably created in order to meet an emergency. An emergency certainly exists to-day in this country. When the general welfare of the American Government is threatened there must be some governmental agency to function. Well, what is it? It is the legislative branch of the Government. The Chief Executive does not yield, and the Senate does not ratify what he proposes, so what are we to do? Must we sit idly by and await the whim of a headstrong Executive? My friends on the Democratic side, suppose that we were beginning the term of a President at the conclusion of this war, that he had three or four years of office ahead of him. Suppose that that President were a dominating, headstrong man. Suppose he were self-willed. Suppose he should subscribe to certain things in his treaty-making power that no real American would subscribe to, and that the Senators would not give in to him, and they were in a deadlock head on.

Do you men mean to tell me that there would be no method whereby we could get relief from the burdens of war? Why, my friends, you may stand up here and tell me there is not, but I want to tell you that you can not tell that to the American people and get away with it. [Applause.] Every single branch of the American public is crying out, and has been for months, asking for peace and release from the burden of war laws. Every avenue and every type and kind of business is handicapped. Every single line of profession, even down to the individual, is right now suffering from their abuse. This very day there are standing indicted by the Federal grand jury 30 or 40 men in the State of Indiana for violating what? Not a peace-time law but a war prohibition, a war instrument, and yet the Chief Executive of the United States, with his Department of Justice, seeks to lay on the back of every man the burden as if we were in actual conflict. Why do we not repeal it, you ask? You vote for this measure and make a two-thirds majority, and if that man at the other end of the Avenue vetoes it, we will repeal it instanter.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. No; I will not yield to anybody. The highest and most valuable right in the possession of the American citizen is his personal right to live under the American form of Government as prescribed in the Constitution. No man will deny that it is a vested interest which can only be altered by the sovereign Government, the people, by way of amendment.

Our Government, consistent with the Anglo-Saxon principle, is a government of law and not of personal authority, in any other time than the time of war—and war, to my mind, means actual hostilities. War does not mean 18 months after the Army has been demobilized, 18 months after the Navy has been reduced to a minimum, 18 months after the war claims by the producers of ammunition have been settled to the extent of several million dollars. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] said we have over 5,000 American troops in Germany right now, and that if we adopted this resolution we would have to bring them home. He seemed to think that would be a calamity. Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, if I had my way I would bring back from Europe every American soldier right now. Bring back the living, that they might enjoy the blessings of living in a free country; bring back the dead, that their bodies might sleep in their native land beneath the flag for which they gave their lives and also that their graves might become a holy shrine of patriotism at which the internationalists of America could renew their spirit of loyalty to the United States.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have been little impressed, though somewhat amused, at the attempt to differentiate the three methods recognized by international law of bringing a war to a conclusion and restoring a status of peace by those who have defended this resolution.

It is contended that there are three ways by which peace may be restored between belligerent nations: First, by conquest of one nation by the other; second, by a cessation of hostilities so long continued that the world will take notice that a state of peace has been resumed; and, third, by the formation and ratification of a treaty between the warring nations setting forth the terms of the peace and the rights of the contracting parties. It is not material in what order the three methods may be set out.

It is obvious that the first method would not contemplate either negotiations or agreement. In that case one country conquers the other, obliterates its government, takes possession of the country, and proceeds to govern it. There would be no need of a treaty, because there is no government with which to make one. It has been destroyed and that of the conquering nation set up in its place.

That situation does not exist in the present posture of affairs between the United States and Germany. Therefore it is not worth while to consume time in discussing it.

The second method referred to is where there is a cessation of hostilities, without formal agreement, of such long standing that all men take notice of the fact that peace has been established, and the belligerent nations glide into a status of peace by lapse of time.

That method contemplates that the contending armies simply quit fighting, withdraw through weariness or other cause, and disperse without any particular agreement or understanding whatever, and that this condition shall continue for so long a time that it can be presumed that neither side intends to renew it. In such circumstances it may be said that peace comes by silent consent.

It is manifest that this is not the condition of affairs at present existing between Germany and the United States, for while hostilities ceased on November 11, 1918, there has not been such a lapse of time between that date and the present as would be presumptive notice to the world that peace had been resumed between the two countries.

Furthermore, the very act of ceasing these hostilities was brought about by the signing of the armistice, and under the terms of the armistice it was itself the preliminary step to the formation and ratification of a treaty between the United States and Germany. Therefore, in my opinion, this resolution pretends to seek the accomplishment of the next step following the armistice, to wit, the making and ratification of a treaty, which Congress, as such, has no power to do.

In the armistice the terms of the prospective treaty were set forth in outline, for when Germany and the other nations signed the armistice they recognized certain fundamental principles which had been set forth by the President of the United States as the basis upon which the treaty of peace should be made.

I do not deem it necessary to argue these points in detail. It is sufficient merely to suggest them. If we are not in a state of peace by reason of conquest, and if we are not at peace with Germany by reason of the long lapse of time following the cessation of hostilities, then the only other way to make peace is by the formation and ratification of a treaty between the United States and Germany. Congress is not the treaty-making power in this Government. We have no constitutional power to negotiate treaties, and this House has no voice even in their ratification after they have been negotiated.

Gentlemen in this debate have sneered at the constitutional reasons given by those of us who oppose this resolution. The last speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], proclaimed very loudly that we are not sincere in our belief that this resolution is unconstitutional and suggested that we are using the Constitution as an excuse for voting against it.

When I became a Member of this House seven years ago I took an oath to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. Three times since that I have repeated that oath. I can violate that oath by legislation for which I vote as well as I can by taking up arms against my country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] As a Member of this House I have never found it necessary to invent an excuse for respecting and defending that immortal document, the Constitution of the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Have we the power to pass this resolution, and what will be its effect? Prior to the declaration of war there was a proclamation issued by the President of the United States severing diplomatic relations between this country and Germany. If we have the constitutional power to declare peace by resolution between the German Government and our own, then we have the power by resolution to restore diplomatic relations between the United States and Germany. The same constitutional provision which confers upon the President exclusive power to negotiate all treaties between this and other Governments also authorizes him to carry on diplomatic relations and negotiations with other nations, either in war or in peace. If we can usurp the power in one case, we can do it in all cases; and by that process Congress could be converted into a sort of rump State Department, a thing not only not provided for but actually prohibited under the Constitution of the Government.

I deny that Congress has any such power. I deny that it was ever contemplated that Congress should have it. Nobody ever assumed that Congress possessed such power until it became necessary for this helpless and hopeless Republican Congress to extricate its humiliating record from impending disaster. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This resolution provides that unless within 45 days the German Government shall pass a similar resolution or issue a proclamation waiving all rights denied to her under the treaty of Versailles, then certain features of this mongrel resolution shall be null and void. That is nothing less than an effort to negotiate a treaty by long-distance resolution. It is a sort of legislative "Big Bertha" by which we announce to Germany, not through any recognized channels but by making a noise on this side of the Atlantic, that we have passed a resolution, and that unless Germany passes a resolution ratifying our resolution there will be no resolution.

In the next place, how is this resolution to be communicated to the German Government? When joint action of two bodies is necessary for the accomplishment of a certain thing, it is necessary that the action of each be officially communicated to the other. When the House passes a bill or resolution it officially notifies the Senate of that fact and asks its concurrence. When both Houses adopt a measure they officially notify the President, and when he either approves or disapproves it he officially notifies Congress of his action. In that way joint and concurrent action is obtained between the two coordinate branches of the Government.

This resolution, while a subterfuge, as everybody, including its sponsors, knows, pretends to contemplate joint action in some way between Congress and the German Government. But how can our action be officially communicated to Germany? We have no ambassador in Germany. We have no diplomatic representative there. We have no consular officers anywhere in the German domains. Is there a Member of this House so lacking in ordinary intelligence as to presume that the German Government will act upon hearsay or upon newspaper reports of the action contemplated here to-day, and undertake to bind itself by the adoption of any policy based upon an unofficial and current report that the American Congress has passed an international monstrosity like that over which we are now wasting valuable time?

Mr. JUUL rose.

Mr. BARKLEY. I can not yield to the gentleman. I only have a few moments.

After this resolution shall have been adopted, if it should be signed by the President, or if he vetoes it and it should pass over his veto, then do our Republican friends propose to adopt another resolution appointing a congressional messenger to journey to Berlin and knock on the door of the German Reichstag and announce to them in stentorian tones that the American Congress has passed this resolution restoring peace, and ask the German Government to concur in the same, and that they have only 45 days in which to do it? Do you intend to send the Sergeant at Arms over with it, or our genial and accommodating Doorkeeper, or will it be the Clerk of the House? Or, better still, will the steering committee accompany the precious document? I have waited in vain for some good and wise Republican to announce to us the procedure which will be adopted in order to get this thing officially before the German Government, which is asked to concur in it. No such announcement has been forthcoming. None will be. For there is no power now, and there has never been any power, by which Congress, as the legislative body of the Nation, can conduct any sort of diplomatic communication with the German Government, or any other Government, either in war or in peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If Congress can not conduct diplomatic communications with the German Government, it can not officially notify Germany of the passage of this or any other resolution, and it will have no effect whatever, and everybody on both sides of this House knows that if he has any intelligence whatever.

If I had gotten into an altercation or a feud with one of my friends on the Republican side, which was deep and of long standing, and then some bright day I should walk out into a field, lift my face up toward the heavens, and announce in solitude, "I am at peace," the effect would be about as noticeable in restoring friendly relations as this ex parte affair which has been dignified with the name of "peace resolution." The suggestion of such a thing seems to me to be so ridiculous that I am unable to comprehend how men presumed to have intelligence can defend it by pretending to substitute it for a real treaty of peace which the President has negotiated and the Senate has refused to ratify.

Therefore if we have the power to substitute this resolution for the treaty of peace, then we have the power by congressional resolution to restore diplomatic relations, and if we have that power, then Congress can appoint an ambassador and other diplomatic and consular officers, even over the objection of the President, and send them to the German Government, and thus restore all the relations which existed before we entered the war.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I have two additional minutes?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for two additional minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. To pretend that Congress can do anything similar to what I have suggested is so absurd as not to be entitled to consideration. Yet that must be the logical result if the resolution now before us has any meaning or is worth anything whatever.

One excuse for advocating this resolution is that it repeals all the war-time laws enacted during the war for the war emergency. But the Republican Party has been in power in both Houses of Congress since the 19th of May, 1919, nearly an entire year, and Congress has been in session practically the whole time. Yet no attempt has been made by the rank and file nor by the Republican leadership in this House to secure the repeal of any of those war acts whose repeal they now pretend to desire. Mr. Speaker, no man in this House is more anxious than I am to secure the repeal of these war-time laws that have hung over since the armistice was signed, but I am not willing to stultify myself by voting for a transparent fraud which pretends to accomplish by indirection what can be and ought to have been accomplished long ago if the Republican majority had been possessed of the intelligence to bring in a resolution or a bill repealing these various laws by name and by an act of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The fact that you have not done it indicates to me that you have been holding back such repeals in order that you might be afforded an excuse to justify your support of the ridiculous, unlawful, and unconstitutional proposal which we have before us now. If you will bring in a bill or resolution repealing these various laws, designating them by name and date and official title, I will join you in an effort to repeal them and relieve the people of those burdens of which you are now so hypocritically complaining. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But until you have done that, you have no moral or legislative right to indict or impugn our motives when we stand upon the Constitution of the United States and refuse to participate in an undertaking to usurp the powers of the Executive and the Senate, who constitute the treaty-making power of the Nation. I have only time to suggest that I hope some means may be invented or discovered that will enable the treaty of Versailles to be ratified. It would have been ratified long ago but for the humiliating partisanship which has governed every movement and maneuver of the ratifying body since the armistice itself was signed. But I would rather see the state of war now existing continue longer, with all its train of accompanying embarrassments, until a legal and proper way can be found to bring peace, than to undermine and break down the Constitution of this Republic, which has been the foundation of our prosperity, our greatness, and our world influence for nearly a century and a half. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, I desire in the brief time allotted to me to pay some attention to the argument and discussion by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. Both gentlemen are at least admitted to be constitutional lawyers. I could not help but wonder while the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was talking whether he seriously meant the statement that if a Member of Congress voted for an unconstitutional law that vote would amount to a violation of the Congressman's oath of office, inasmuch as it embodies the supporting of the Constitution——

Mr. BARKLEY. It would, if I knew it was unconstitutional.

Mr. TINCHER. That is the question. How is one to know? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] read during his remarks from a report made by Mr. VOLSTEAD, of the Judiciary Committee, last summer on the national prohibition bill. He is using this report to-day to prove that the war still exists; but I remember when this great constitutional lawyer said on the floor of this House that the Volstead bill was unconstitutional in so far as it applied to war-time prohibition. I remember trying to interrupt him one day to suggest to him that I doubted the unconstitutionality of the Volstead Act, but, in his profound way, he sat me down rather unceremoniously and informed me that he was trying to make an intelligent, learned discussion of that great constitutional question. Now, suppose I had been just slightly more impressed by his august manner than I was, and had followed the advice of this great constitutional lawyer, and had, for fear of violating my oath of office as Congressman, voted against the Volstead bill. The Supreme Court of the United States has since that date decided that the war-time prohibition feature of the Volstead Act is constitutional; that the distinguished jurist from Ohio was mistaken; and had I followed his advice at that time, and the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky were to be held good, I would perhaps to-day be in jail for violating my oath of office and voting against a perfectly constitutional law by reason of being advised that it was unconstitutional.

Sometimes I wonder if some of the profound constitutional lawyers do not overdo the thing a little. The gentleman from Ohio in his remarks is strong for the maintenance of the three separate branches of our Government, namely, the executive, legislative, and judicial. Still, most every day we on the floor of this House are asked to invade the prerogatives of the judiciary and vote against perfectly good-looking measures on the advice of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that these measures are not constitutional. I had 20 years' experience in the law before coming here, and I met many profound constitutional lawyers. In fact, all lawyers become constitutional lawyers when they can not find any other defense for their client; but these profound constitutional lawyers seldom cause the ordinary practitioner any serious trouble, unless, by accident, they are promoted to the bench. They are not much trouble to the ordinary practitioner that is willing to try his cases on their merits, so long as you can keep them on the other side of the counsel table.

It is amusing in a way to note the gentlemen that are going to vote against this resolution that give as their argument for so doing that they are afraid that the resolution violates the Constitution and that they would be violating their oaths of office to vote for it. It is interesting to know that these same gentlemen just a few weeks ago, by directions and orders from the same quarters that they have their directions and orders from to fight this peace resolution, were supporting, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," the so-called League of Nations covenant. This remarkable document not only transferred the power to declare war from the Congress of the United States, where it is now lodged in plain English language by the Constitution, to a supergovernmental agency, but this remarkable instrument enabled that other agency to decide which side of the war the United States would be on.

I have been wondering to-day how these great self-constituted constitutional lawyers could reconcile their attitude toward the Constitution with reference to that instrument and their present fears as to the constitutionality of this resolution. Some of us have only engaged in the practice of the law long enough to find out that we could not rely upon our own judgment to settle all these great questions. Ordinarily a lawyer is able to find some decisions or lines of reasoning that agree with his personal opinion or the opinion of his client or boss; but in the end we have a branch of our Government known as the judiciary that is supposed to pass upon these propositions.

The gentleman from Ohio makes another objection to the resolution. He says that the majority have made a great mistake in not bringing in a rule here that would permit the minority to offer a lot of amendments to the resolution. He uses his favorite word in this discussion; says he would like to "clarify" the resolution by some amendments. We all know the gentleman is an adept at "clarifying," and no doubt he was consulted by other constitutional lawyers concerning the language of this resolution; but I submit that if the Rules Committee had left this resolution subject to amendment that the distinguished gentleman would have spent as long as he did on the national prohibition law offering amendments trying to clarify it, as he calls it, and then, regardless of the number of clarifying amendments that were adopted, he would have voted against the resolution. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, the American people want peace declared. The American people are not for any League of Nations unless the rights of America are safeguarded; but they do know that they want the war-time laws repealed now in peace time. This measure is clarified to such an extent that it brings about that result. There is nothing in the Constitution that prevents us from passing this resolution. It is only those that want to treat the laws and Constitution as a sort of hidden mystery that find something to become alarmed about. I know a number of gentlemen on the minority side of this House that are going to vote for this resolution. Some of them have been regarded in the past as ranking among the best lawyers in the House. Some of them are too big to take orders when so vital a question as this is before the Congress.

I would not want to yield the floor without mentioning another matter. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], in his address, referred in a manner that I desire to resent to my colleague, ROYAL JOHNSON. He said that the ex-attorney general in one of the States had waived aside the constitutionality of this law. In the first place, the remarks of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] were made when the question pending was whether we should adopt the rule for the consideration of this resolution.

He said that Dr. FESS had covered the constitutionality of the proposition, or ably discussed it. He distinguished between technicalities and the Constitution in the consideration of the resolution—brushed aside technicalities—and said that he would not discuss the constitutionality of the resolution, as it had been discussed, but discussed on its merits the resolution and advocated the declaration of peace. Let me see who is my colleague, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. True, he is an ex-attorney general of his State; also, he is an ex-service man of the recent war. He left his seat in this body and a devoted wife and children and offered his life that we might have constitutional government in this Nation. Is it possible that men like ROYAL JOHNSON have to apologize to any man for casting a vote for a resolution declaring his country at peace with the world? He has, in the form of battle scars, that he will carry to his dying day, his proof of his love, devotion, and fidelity to the American flag and to the Constitution.

In my judgment you had better be honest and fair with the American people and tell them that you are voting against peace because the President of the United States has ordered you to vote against peace than to try to offer an excuse for your vote by saying that ROYAL JOHNSON wants to put the Constitution to one side. In his short address he advocated that personalities be not indulged in; that the wishes of the people of the United States be considered; and that the laws and our Constitution be upheld, and you attempt to answer that argument by the insinuation that he wants to brush the Constitution aside. The Constitution has ever been safe in the hands of the majority of the people of our fair land; it will always be safe so long as such men as ROYAL JOHNSON live, who are always willing to make the supreme sacrifice for our institutions.

You will need a better excuse than such insinuations with the American people for following the dictations of any one man upon this vital and most important question. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, three years ago the Congress declared a state of war to exist between the United States and the Empire of Germany. We did not enter this war for conquest. We sought no acquisition of territory or financial gains. We did not take up arms because of the compelling force of any league or treaty or alliance. It was not for any presidential 14 points or to establish a League of Nations that we thus went to war. It was a war to protect the lives of our people and the rights of our citizens on land and on sea. This was clearly expressed in the message of President Wilson to Congress on April 2, 1917, when he said:

> We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

Seventeen months ago the enemy laid down his arms. That this result was due in no inconsiderable part to the valor of American arms I can not doubt. While the race lives the story of our part in the World War shall remain one of our proud traditions.

We fought for the security of our people. That purpose is achieved. We went to war to defend ourselves. Remembering Chateau-Thierry and the Argonne, no one in the world for a hundred years to come will doubt either our ability or readiness to do this.

Having accomplished this, what remains to be done? Obviously the burden rests upon us to enforce upon our recent enemy a strict compliance with the principles for which we fought. That completes the task we undertook. If in addition to this we might provide a tribunal of international arbitration, based on agreed international law and not on secret diplomacy, a forum wherein great and small nations alike might seek and receive speedy justice, it would be a desirable thing.

But we are told by the President and by the minority here that there must be no declaration of peace without the inclusion of this league to which the President has sought to commit us. A league that intends an international equality of labor conditions, and hence a lowering of our own standards; a league that threatens to throw open the trade doors of the country to the unrestricted commerce of the world; a league that opens the Treasury to the financial demands of every bankrupt nation on the globe; a league that puts the brand of conscription upon every youth in the land of service—God knows when or where—when the league, not duty, calls.

With stubborn and exaggerated vanity of mind, the President rejects the counsel of his constitutional advisers and denies the right to question the decision he has made. He bids us quit the path our forbears have trod for 144 years—of national life and freedom and prosperity—and follow him in devious and uncertain ways. To do this I am not prepared. As for me, the principles our fathers announced—written unchangeably, I trust, in the organic law of our beloved country—shall continue to be the guide to my reason and action. We, the chosen representatives of the people, declared the existence of this war, and it is alike our right and our duty to declare the peace to exist which has, in fact, existed for almost a year and a half. Let us take from the business of the country those artificial restrictions that hamper and distort it and which make the problem of living such a serious one. Let us permit natural laws to be effective. Let us take less thought of the affairs of other people and more of our own. To do our utmost to accomplish these purposes is no less than our plain duty. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the United States is occupying a most anomalous position. We are both at peace and war. One day we are told by the President of the United States that the war is at end and that we are at peace. The next day he tells us that the war is on and that there can be no peace until a peace is arrived at entirely suitable to his own purposes.

We are occupying a further anomalous position. Of all the countries engaged in this World War, we are actually the only country that is at peace. France is at war, Great Britain is at war, Germany is at war, Russia is at war, Italy is at war, and there are 20 wars this day going on in the Balkans. Notwithstanding the fact that the league of peace and the treaty accompanying it has been signed and accepted by practically all of these nations, they are now at war.

Demonstrating, if you please, that the United States, following the course laid down by the fathers, is occupying to-day a position enviable in the life of the world. Now, as for 120 years prior to this war, by our precepts and examples, to-day we are doing more for the world and the world's peace and good than all the leagues of nations that have been organized since the beginning of time or will be organized hereafter, demonstrating, if you please, the wisdom of the people of the United States, through the patriotic gentlemen at the other end of this Capitol, in refusing to enter into this compact that has already proven itself to be but a rope of sand. If this League of Nations is what it is purported to be, why is it that France is to-day at war with Germany in violation of the very covenant of that contract, in violation of the law, in violation of the treaty? Why is it that Italy is engaged this day, in violation of the league and of the covenant of peace, in war? No, gentlemen, the world is looking now, as she looked before we entered this Great War, for the helping hand of the United States, and we can give it to her better when this announcement of peace, as an actuality instead of a fiction, is an accomplished thing. Gentlemen upon the other side seem to be raising up a straw man and then tearing it to pieces. No one has contended or will contend here that this is a treaty of peace. This resolution is for the announcement of a status, a policy, and the Congress is the only power in the United States that has the right to declare its policy. When we declared war we formed a policy; when we pass this resolution we will have declared another policy—the very antithesis of war—the policy of peace.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] declared that it would be a bad precedent to pass this resolution, for the reason that if it were established that the Congress of the United States has the right to declare peace after we had engaged in war, it might result in great disaster to this country of ours in years to come—that some time we might be in the very midst of war and the people would declare for peace through their chosen Representatives. I dare say that the Congress of the United States has that right. The people of the United States through the Congress declared war. The people of the United States furnished all the sinews of war—men and money. Why, then, should they not have the right to declare peace? There can be a case imagined of our country being engaged in war, where we have fought to the accomplishment of the thing that caused us to enter that war, when the commander of the Army and Navy still wishes to persist in war after the people are satisfied with the result of the conflict of arms and the cessation of warfare.

Is it not within the province of the Congress of the United States, representative of the people, to declare peace? We are not without eminent authority upon this proposition. From the beginning of the Civil War down to its close more than a hundred bills were introduced into this House declaring that it should be and was the policy of the Congress of the United States that the war between the North and South should cease. Nothing ever became of those bills, because the peace-at-any-price Representatives were in such a hopeless minority. One of the greatest lawyers that the State of Indiana ever produced, who graced and graced well the office of Vice President of the United States, Thomas A. Hendricks, in 1864 declared in the Chicago Democratic national convention that it was the bounden duty of the Congress of the United States to declare peace; that the war had proven itself a failure and should be ended. There were many eminent gentlemen who then were upon the other side of this House and upon the other side of this question. Vallandigham, who was recognized as one of the greatest legal lights that the State of Ohio ever produced, also took the position that it was not only the duty but the inherent right of Congress to provide a way for the establishment of peace between the North and the South, whether the President wished such a peace or not. This is a policy that we are seeking to establish by law, and time and time again the Supreme Court has declared the right of Congress to establish such a policy. In almost every revenue act has there been a policy enunciated whereby if certain things should be done by certain foreign countries we in turn would do certain things. Every bill for reciprocity that has been passed by this House has been dependent upon the accomplishment of some object by some other nation or some other power, and then we would do certain things. Fifty per cent of all the laws that are passed by the various States of the Union, as well as by the Congress of the United States, are in the alternative form, depending upon the happening of some event or the development of some condition.

That is all that is proposed by this resolution, that we declare that the war is ended; that we are at peace in fact as well as in fiction.

The other day while the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] was delivering his speech in opposition to this resolution, I asked him this question: If the Congress of the United States passes a resolution declaring the war at an end and the German Government passes a like resolution, will you say that this would not be a mutual understanding and agreement between the two Governments that a state of peace was established? And he replied, "Absolutely not, for the reason that under our Constitution the power to make international agreements is vested exclusively in the treaty-making functionary, and the Congress has not the right to speak." If the position of the gentleman be correct, if we had a mad Moloch in the White House and continued him there, and the German people had a mad Moloch at the head of their Government and continued him there, and these two mad Molochs persisted in carrying on war, there could be no peace, no matter if all the people in both countries were crying out for peace. Such a condition would be intolerable, and the declaration that such a thing could be is, to my mind, preposterous.

There is a demand coming from all over this land of ours for peace. Never since the Constitution of the United States was adopted—and four wars have cursed our country since then—has there been such a condition confronting the business world as confronts it to-day, due absolutely to the uncertainty with respect to our condition and our war status.

There is one thing certain that the Congress has a right to do under the Constitution, and which it is its bounden duty to do, and that is whenever and wherever it can to provide for the welfare of the country. That is a provision of the Constitution of the United States, and whatever Congress may do that is not prohibited by the Constitution itself, or delegated to the States, it is the duty of the Congress to do for the welfare of the country.

Can anyone here say that it would not be for the welfare of the country that the law with reference to trading with the enemy should be repealed? Is there anyone here who would contend that the espionage act should not be repealed? Is there anyone here who will for one moment deny that the burden that is resting upon the people of the United States by reason of the 63 war laws, enforced in time of peace, is most irksome and unbearable? Nations have gone to war in times past with far less excuse than the excuse which the people have now by reason of these intolerable conditions.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is opposed to this resolution because we will have no means of conveying its contents to the German Government, inasmuch as we have no existing diplomatic relations with that Government. While this fact may present some obstacles, I do not think it insurmountable. Some way or another the German Government heard of President Wilson's 14 points and accepted them as a basis for peace, and the armistice followed. We had no diplomatic relations existing then, and now to say that this fact is fatal to this resolution is to confess that our President has not only lost his ingenuity but his cunning as well.

Therefore, I hope that in carrying out that provision of the Constitution which provides that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to look after the welfare of this country of ours we shall forget the partisanship that seems to divide us, as we forgot partisanship during the days of the war, when our country's best interests were at stake, and that with practical unanimity we present to the world this expression of our desire for peace. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, Tuesday, April 6, speaking on the subject of House joint resolution 327, terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VENABLE] stated, among other things:

We, the House of Representatives, are to-day seeking to negotiate a treaty of peace with Germany, an interesting but tragic procedure; interesting as showing how far the passions of a time may obscure the vision of men, tragic as a commentary upon what had been the slow assassination of the hope of the world.

The hope of the world referred to, of course, means the League of Nations. I venture to say—and I am saying this after having discussed this matter with men both in the House and Senate—that all of us were eager to see a treaty of peace ratified, and it, no doubt, would have been ratified after a brief debate if the treaty had not been interwoven with articles containing matters which were such a radical departure from and destructive of the power of the American Congress to control the affairs of this Republic under the terms of the Constitution.

All through the gentleman's speech—and it is a very able one—he endeavors to show the helplessness of the Congress, and more particularly so that of the House. His claim is that the Congress, by declaring the war at an end, is making a treaty; that the Congress has not the power in this manner to make a treaty; that this resolution is a treaty; and that we can not have peace and live in amity and carry on commerce with another nation without a treaty; and that having no treaty necessarily means a state of war with that nation. I am reminded that in 1911 I introduced a joint resolution in the Senate of Illinois calling upon the Illinois representation in Congress to secure the immediate abrogation of our treaty with Russia, which had been in existence since December 18, 1832. That resolution was passed in Illinois April 27, 1911. The reason for its passage was Russia's refusal to recognize American passports when presented by our Jewish citizens.

The resolution was presented on May 8, 1911, in the United States Senate by Senator Cullom, who was then chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1st sess., 62d Cong., p. 1067.) Senator Cullom took a lively interest in the matter of the treaty, which was finally abrogated.

The date of the approval was December 21, 1911. I believe Representative Sulzer, of New York, introduced the final resolution in Congress. Since then we have lived in peace with Russia for many years, and the lack of a treaty did not mean war. So we can declare war at an end, transact business with Germany, and make a treaty when we can get around to it, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and a President who is willing.

Congress is not near as helpless as our Democratic friends would have us believe. War would not go on forever without affirmative action by the Congress.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides among other things:

The Congress shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

So you will note that the fathers who drafted the Constitution wanted no war to go on for more than two years, without the proposition to pay for the war had been submitted to a newly elected Congress coming direct from the people.

Some of the reasons, stripped of all embellishments, why the treaty was not ratified were simply these:

The treaty provided for 6 votes for the British Empire in matters of arbitration, and it generously gave us 1. I do not know how the average American feels on this subject; however, we will know in November, but I do know I would hate to try a lawsuit before a jury where the other side already had six jurors in the box and I could only place one. I do not know how the average American feels about article 10 of the league constitution, but we will probably know in November, but I think the language is so fraught with danger that it should make any American afraid of its possibility for evil. Listen!

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all the members of the league. In case of any such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled.

In other words, should the council decide that American boys were to be sent overseas to lay down their lives for a cause with which we have no concern and in which we are not interested, what has the American Congress to do with it?

The Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of mark and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water.

The treaty was not ratified because the Senate refused to turn that power over to a council sitting in Europe, and which had received its advice from a board in which one of the signatory powers to the treaty could offer 6 votes of advice to the 1 the United States could cast.

I am for this resolution! I am for it because I believe the time has come. I am for it because I believe the world is weary and sick at heart and tired of bloodshed. I am for it because I want to see the time return when all Americans, no matter from what race descended, may again dwell together like brethren in unity. I am for it because it is time for the doctrine of hate to cease. Let us all get behind this resolution. Let us all bend every effort to do all that is humanly possible for our brave boys who made victory possible. Let there be tears for our heroic dead who sleep far from home in "Flanders fields." Let there be immediate and liberal recognition, aid, and training for our wounded. Let there be substantial and immediate recognition of all who came when they heard their country calling. But let there be peace. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BAER].

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, peace is a food problem. Food is the problem of all problems, and until we find its intelligent solution no other problem can be settled. Basically, agriculture is the foundation of all industry, and if farming is not made attractive and profitable and the farmer's produce economically distributed, not only food production but all other production will become paralyzed.

As history slowly winds its way along the pathway of time records will invariably prove that following a period of agricultural depression the great centers of wealth and industry crumbled. When the cities have enriched themselves at the expense of the country whole nations have been destroyed. The decay of agriculture destroyed Greece, it destroyed Rome, Spain, and Portugal. The France of the eighteenth century was destroyed by the same cause. Contemporary history proves that the building of great industrial centers and the neglect of the peasantry has destroyed modern Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia. It is not the propaganda from without, but the poison of privilege from within, which has led to agricultural decay and finally to economic suicide. It seems unnecessary to prove to any intelligent thinking person that farmers have forever formed the basis of social stability in a nation. Therefore the greater the capacity of a nation to raise foodstuffs for its own maintenance, the greater is its immunity from world war and internal disturbances.

Among all the gigantic industrial problems there is none more important to my mind than the readjustment of our system of distribution in order that the farmer may get a greater share of that which he produces and that the consumers on the other hand may pay less for distribution.

This is not only a problem in the United States but it is a world problem. It is, furthermore, not a temporary problem, but one that continually demands the attention of legislators as well as patriotic citizens. Premier Nitti, of Italy, informs us that there are in Europe 300,000,000 men not producing the necessaries of life. Just think of it! Can not any normal mind immediately realize that this is the cause of unrest and revolution in Europe? Is it not the fact that the European countries have been compelled to import from 30 to 80 per cent of their foodstuffs that has led to all the great naval armaments of the world and the burden which they throw on the backs of the people? Nations which do not produce their full requirement of foodstuffs necessarily have to reach out for overseas trade. They have engaged in a fierce competition for world markets to unload their nonfood products in order to exchange them for food supplies, which inevitably leads to world war. When the population of a nation becomes overcrowded and can no longer obtain sufficient food from foreign nations, it becomes necessary for it to expand—thus a lack of food supply creates imperialistic designs and all the irritations which it implies. Take, for instance, Germany. Before the war we found there were 271 people there to the square mile. When compared to the United States, which has only 37 to the square mile, one immediately sees the purposes in the minds of the autocratic overlords who desire to extend their territory. I cite this as additional proof that peace is a food problem. Thus the lack of food production is the cause of war while a sufficient supply of food products means economic independence and insures peace.

Mr. Speaker, I recently read the astounding newspaper report taken from the census figures that several million farmers have left their farms since we reached the peak point of rural population. This in itself proves conclusively that there is little of attraction for the small farmer. The farmer's sons have also gone to the city where higher wages and the attraction of city advantages have held them since the war. Farm labor is very scarce. According to recent agricultural reports, winter wheat has fallen off over 25 per cent. There will probably be as great a decrease in the spring wheat acreage. An equal or greater percentage of decrease applies to all farm products. Every agricultural economist in the country has pointed with great alarm to this falling off of food producers and the increase of farm tenantry. I have several times called the attention of the House to the fact that in Illinois, for instance, 50 per cent of the farms were owned by absentee landlords, while in Kansas the same percentage will apply. In 1880, 84 per cent of the farmers owned their farms in Kansas. The average for the United States shows that 37 per cent of the farms are operated by tenants. I am proud to state that in North Dakota only 14 per cent of the farmers do not own their farms. With the wise legislation which has been recently passed and which will allow the returned soldiers and other citizens to buy farms on easy terms, I believe that even this small percentage will be reduced.

The problem of distribution is even greater than that of agricultural production. A close analysis of the character of the spread between the farmer and the ultimate consumer shows that decreases in the price of foodstuffs and wearing apparel find immediate reflection on the farmer, while increases in the cost of living result in the farmer receiving only a lagging increase while the vast proportion of the increase is absorbed by the trades between, namely, the buyers, the brokers, the manufacturers, the wholesalers, the jobbers, the retailers, and transportation. We must eliminate not only the useless parasites—the speculators and gamblers, which add no value to the products—but also the waste and extravagance of the legitimate members of our present system of distribution. I have introduced a bill which will absolutely prevent gambling in the necessaries of life by price manipulators who do not have any right, claim, or legitimate existence in our system; and, secondly, I have introduced another bill which would regulate the packers and all necessary and legitimate middlemen. I consider some legislation of this kind imperative and I regret that it was not passed long ago in order to meet the urgent conditions of readjustment.

In order to prove the statement that I have just made, namely, that the consumer does not receive the immediate benefit of the reduction of the price to the farmer, but that it is absorbed by the trades in between, let me call your attention to a book published by Armour & Co. under the head of "1919—A Year of Falling Markets," where I find the following:

> While wholesale meat prices remained high for some months after the signing of the armistice, a marked decline took place during the latter part of 1919. Wholesale beef prices, which stood at an average of $21.43 per hundredweight on the 1st of May, 1919, fell to $14.72 by the 1st of December. Hog prices, which were at a governmental guaranty of $17.50 during the war, rose to $23.60 in July, 1919, and then declined to $13 by December.

There are many significant facts which Armour's own figures disclose. First, when the farmers were not selling hogs they reached the peak point of $23.60, but in the late fall, when the farmers sold, the price fell as low as $13; and, secondly, while the wholesale price of beef fell 30 per cent from May to December and pork fell 45 per cent from July to December, consumers in the East enjoyed none of this decrease in 1919. It was about the 1st of August last year that Attorney General Palmer started his "campaign against profiteering." The price to the farmers fell 43 per cent during a three-month period, while, at the same time, I am reliably informed by a secretary of a consumers' league, that the price of pork was raised 15 per cent in eastern markets. I have talked to thousands of consumers at meetings, and after calling their attention to this great decline in the price of cattle and hogs to the farmers I have asked if any of them had noticed any falling off in the cost of beef and pork. I found none.

If we take the Swift dollar, which has become so popular through advertisements which cost the packers a million dollars a month, according to a Senate report, we find the claim that the packers receive less than 2 cents out of a consumer's dollar. When the farmer receives 45 cents less out of the consumer's dollar and the consumer is compelled to add 15 cents more to his dollar, as the market fluctuations in 1919 showed, then "somebody" gouged the consumer out of 60 cents when he spent a dollar and fifteen cents in the local market.

In other words, every time a fluctuation occurs in the hog market the farmer has to bear almost the entire burden of the fall in the price, and the middlemen enjoy the benefit of the decline by refusing to lower prices to the consumer. Furthermore, when there has been an increase in prices the tradesmen have absorbed the whole increase, and the profit has not been equitably reflected in the price to the producer. Neither the producer nor the consumer enjoys the benefits of the market fluctuation.

Five-sixths of the marketable live stock of the country is raised west of the Mississippi River, and the producer wants to see the consumer in the East enjoy a proportional decline in prices when he receives lower prices for his hogs and cattle.

The southern producer is likewise discriminated against. An inquiry into the reasons for the enormous advances in the price of cotton goods would reveal that the cotton goods manufacturers are profiteers of the worst sort. Representative TILSON, of Connecticut, a New Englander, made the statement recently that "the prices for cotton goods had advanced 600 per cent since 1914," although the cost of raw cotton and mill labor had not advanced more than 100 per cent during that time. Both the New England and southern mills have reaped enormous profits, and the producers of cotton are not able to get even the cost of production for their products. It is interesting in this connection to note that the railroad brotherhoods have bought several factories and are manufacturing overalls for the workers from 30 per cent to 40 per cent less than they cost in the open market.

In southwest Texas the Government encouraged the farmers to raise beans during the war. The farmers are now receiving 2½ cents per quart for their beans, and there is an enormous supply. The freight on beans to Boston, where they are popularly known as an article of food, is 1½ cents per quart, while in Boston they sell for 18 cents per quart. The farmer gets less than 3 cents for raising the beans, and it costs more than 15 cents to handle them.

Somebody is making huge profits in woolen goods, and it is not the woolgrower. Mr. Figg, an attorney employed by the United States Department of Justice, boldly declared that the retailers in eastern cities are making a profit of from $30 to $60 per suit on men's clothes. He does not refer to the other profit all along the line before the suit comes to the retailer; but I have already placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD statistics showing the enormous profits of the woolen goods manufacturers. They are well organized; even better to-day than when the National Association of Wool Manufacturers was able to place its own agent as clerk of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, and by so doing lifted clothing prices by writing schedule K into the Taft tariff bill. As in all other industries, a great speculative combine has grown up, and huge profits are being made. The flying squadron of the Department of Justice brought out the fact before a Federal grand jury that concerns in Philadelphia had made 175 per cent profit in their iniquitous gouging of the public on clothes.

Mayor Shank, of Indianapolis, some time ago, as you all know, bought several carloads of potatoes at Grand Rapids for 50 cents per bushel from the jobbers, the farmers receiving 40 cents, and he sold them in his city for 75 cents, while they were costing the consumer at the same time $2 per bushel. He handled potatoes for 35 cents, which the profiteers got $1.50 a bushel for handling.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger in a scathing editorial revealed an instance of profiteering by a Providence, R. I., shoe firm to the extent of 800 per cent. "We have no defense to offer" was the firm's reply to the charges preferred by the United States district attorney. In showing up the methods of this firm, the editorial states:

> The officers of the company designedly and with cool premeditation subsidized their salesmen to "gouge" their customers out of just as much money as they could manage to get. There was no pretense of fair and honorable trade—the selling of an article for its honest worth, with a fair profit and a fixed price. The salesman was apparently told to size up each customer and charge him all he would stand for each variety of shoe. There was no notion of sticking to the assigned price, but only the bandit rule of collecting "all the traffic will bear." And to make sure that the salesman would follow out this nefarious policy they were actually paid commissions on all money obtained from customers above the sale price of shoes as fixed by the company.

The Baltimore News states that shoes which cost $2.26 to manufacture are sold to the retailer for $10.98.

Financial America declares that light coats which cost $7 before the war now bring $40, an advance of 470 per cent. At the same time the secretary of the National Wool Growers' Association, speaking of clothing, points his finger at those who handle the product from the time it is sheared until it is handed the customer in the form of a suit by emphatically stating that there can not possibly be more than $7 worth of the finest wool in a $75 suit.

The report of the California Fruit Growers' Association shows that the grower received on an average for the past four years $1.60 per crate for oranges, while during the same period the consumer paid an average of $4.80. In New York City people paid 14 cents a quart for milk for which the farmer received 5½ cents. In South Bend, Ind., tomatoes were selling for $3 per bushel, while the farmers, 135 miles away, received 60 cents per bushel. A farmer gets 25 cents a pound for cotton. We must pay $4.50 for that pound of cotton when woven.

All these illustrations that I have given tend to show that there is too great a margin between the producers and the consumer. Mr. H. W. Collingwood, editor of the Rural New Yorker, has made a lifelong study of the subject of marketing. He states that 35 cents out of the consumer's dollar is all that the farmer receives. I could cite numerous instances where the tradesmen in between take two, five, and even ten times the cost of production for handling. Through these wasteful methods of handling it costs from $2 to $5 to deliver $1 worth of food. Stated in terms of man power, it takes from two to five men to handle a one-man power product.

These figures all show that we need a new and scientific method of marketing. Every plan, whether it be through co-operative movements, the municipality, or the State, requires the earnest consideration of every patriotic citizen. The question of municipal and State ownership always raises the cry from the wealthy profiteers of "socialism." Twenty years ago the man who advocated municipal ownership of public utilities was dubbed an "extremist" and a "socialist." But the people in the cities found that when certain private corporations had monopolized the public utilities and charged exorbitant rates for gas, water, and electricity they were compelled to take over these public institutions and run them for the benefit of all the citizens instead of for the aggrandizement of a few.

Take, for instance, my own State. The cities had bonded themselves for over $17,000,000 for streets, waterworks, sewerage, lighting plants, and other public utilities. In two cities they had even issued bonds for a municipal auditorium and a theater. These things were essential for the public welfare and convenience. They were, however, "luxuries" to the farmer who plodded through a foot of mud in the early morn with a lantern when he went to the barn to do his early morning chores. The farmer felt, and rightly so, owing to the fact that there was no other great industry in North Dakota except farming, the credit for the issuance of all these municipal bonds was based directly on the prosperity of the rural districts. If a pest or other calamity had wiped out the farming communities the cities could not have sold one cent's worth of their bonds. If the reverse has happened, however—that is, the cities had been wiped out by a fire or other misfortune and there was a rich and prosperous farming community surrounding them—they could immediately issue bonds and rebuild their cities overnight. This was right and the farmers had no complaint; but when the farmers advocated a State bond issue for $5,000,000, which for each farmer was only one-tenth the amount that each person in the cities was bonded for, the reactionary elements in the cities raised the cry that such an effort on the part of the farmer was "socialistic." Furthermore, the farmer wanted to issue these bonds on his own credit for economic necessities to market his grain. In other words, it seemed very inconsistent to the farmer for his urban friend to stand on a municipally owned curbstone built by bonds, with his foot on a hydrant built by bonds, leaning against a municipally owned electric-light post built by bonds, and with all the other city conveniences, even to a theater and auditorium, built by bonds, and say to his farmer friend who stood on a bonded pavement, "You are a socialist because you want to bond on your own credit to build an elevator and a flour mill."

I recollect an incident when a publicly hired policeman once walked across a publicly owned pavement, over a publicly owned electric-car line, and then over a publicly owned sidewalk into a publicly owned park, and up into a publicly owned bandstand, and arrested a public speaker and took him to a publicly owned court, where he was tried, and then to a publicly owned jail, where he was imprisoned for talking on "public ownership."

A hundred years ago the man who advocated the public school was a "Socialist," according to the wealthy tories, but it was not until men advocated public ownership of utilities which could be monopolized and yield exorbitant profits that the vicious fight was made. For instance, we all recall the fight made against parcel post by the express companies and the railroads, which called it "paternalism" and "socialism." One can advocate public ownership and the issuance of bonds for public schools, jails, fire houses, and hospitals, and any other institution in which there is no profit and he will not be subject to criticism to-day. But let anyone advocate the public ownership of a natural monopoly through which all the great fortunes in this country have been built up and that man is immediately called a "radical" and a "dangerous citizen."

Many progressive cities and States, however, are endeavoring to solve the marketing problem by taking the matter into their own hands, as Cleveland has tried to do, as Seattle has done when it invested $7,000,000 in wharves and storage, as Detroit recently did when it vote $15,000,000 for municipal railways, and as the State of Louisiana did when it built its State-owned cotton warehouses and grain elevators at the cost of about $20,000,000. Other cities, too numerous to mention here, are accepting the principles of public ownership. Australia, New Zealand, Norway, and even conservative England are doing it. Public ownership has passed the experimental stage.

This recalls to my mind the benefits of the Australian system during the war. The system of distribution was so efficient that it cost only 1 cent to take a pound of butter from Australia to the heart of London. The farmer in Australia takes his produce to a local depot, where the agent of the railway controlled by the Government gives him a check. The railway carries the produce to seaboard, and in turn is paid by the Commonwealth Government Merchant Marine, which is owned by the producers of Australia, and by which it is delivered to the Government in England or elsewhere. The result of this great system is that it costs less to handle a product raised in the central part of Australia from the time it leaves the local terminal until it arrives in the heart of London than it does to get the same product from outside an American city to the table of the ultimate consumer. If America had such a system the cost of living would not be a problem; there would be no industrial strife, strikes, and other disturbances.

But we need not go to far-off Australia to find prominent men, in addition to Gov. Frazier, of North Dakota, and other Nonpartisan League leaders, advocating a similar program. In his annual message to the New York Legislature, Gov. Smith recommends the following:

1. A minimum-wage law.
2. The eight-hour day for women workers.
3. Maternity insurance for expectant mothers.
4. Extension of workmen's compensation to cover occupational illness and accidents.
5. Appointment of State physicians and nurses for rural communities now destitute of medical aid.
6. Ownership, development, and operation of all water powers by the State.
7. State owned and operated grain elevators after the manner of the Nonpartisan League experiments in North Dakota.
8. Recognition of the production and distribution of milk as a public utility, subject to control in all details.
9. Municipal operation of public utilities.

Curiously enough, the big New York papers like the Times and the Tribune do not attack the propounder of this platform, which is similar to and even goes farther than the program of the North Dakota Legislature. They do not cry "bolshevism" and "un-American" methods when the governor of New York advocates a progressive platform, but they reserve their epithets and false statements for the splendid governor of North Dakota, Lynn J. Frazier. Perhaps they know that the New York Legislature is sufficiently reactionary to kill all popular legislation, and they are willing to let the Tammany governor gather a little harmless popularity.

Even as conservative a weekly as Collier's had a splendid editorial recently in which it advocated a "plank for our backbone." I have permission from the editor, whom I complimented on this editorial, to insert the same in the RECORD, and it will be placed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks at this point:

You, Mr. Will Hays, chairman of the Republican National Committee, and you, Mr. Homer Cummings, chairman of the Democrats, if you seek big work for parties to do, here is something for your attention. And you, Gov. Lowden, Mr. McAdoo, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Hoover, Gen. Wood, and Senator Johnson, and all those other aspirants who seek vital issues, here is one. It is one for you, Mr. Meredith, new Secretary of Agriculture. And it is one for you, the industrial laborer, and you, the banker and the clerk, the manufacturer and the sailor, the miner and the city dweller. It is one for you, the town man, walking on pavements, toiling in offices, living in apartments, and confused a little by the complexities of the material civilization around you, forgetting the thing by which you live. It is one for you, whoever you may be; it is one for your political party, whatever may be your political party. It is even more fundamental than many of these other issues that have made the veins of foreheads stand out with the strain of thinking about faraway foreign entanglements, and destructive quarrels between capital and labor, and tariffs, and taxes, and universal military training. And it is just as pressing. The reason we all forget the most vital thing in a nation's life is that we often forget the same most vital thing in our own lives because we accept it as we accept the morning and the evening.

The most vital thing in our lives is three meals a day.

The most vital thing in a nation's life is food.

The producer of food is the soil.

And it is none too soon for political parties and all of us voters, and those of us who make any pretense of thinking clearly, no matter how humble we may be, to turn our attention to the farmer of the United States.

We are facing an agricultural problem in the United States just as sure as sunrise.

That's a disease in the backbone of the country!

NEGLECT.

The New York Tribune has been offering prizes for planks for a political platform. Good service! Because it interests the voters in the job of making the country. But in three weeks, yielding 2,225 suggested planks, the order of subjects was this: Foreign Relations, Americanization, Labor and Capital, Social Legislation, Constitutional Rights, Bolshevism, Cost of Living, Budget, Free Speech, Taxation, Army and Navy, Mexico, the Woman Voter, Tariff, Railroads, Conservation of Resources, Aid for Soldiers, Immigration, Merchant Marine, Control of Big Business, Prohibition, Island Possessions, Control of Public Utilities, the Negro Problem. That is largely a yield of urban thinking, but it is a fair sample of the country's immediate interest.

Among these planks, where is the soil? Where is the farmer? Where is the future of American agriculture?

The other day one of the most astute political observers returned to Washington from a tour of the country. He told us that the people of the United States were interested in three things: First, having the treaty fight out of the way, they are for a league of nations, but with bombproof reservations; second, to get back to realities from an idealism that doesn't ideal; third, to have a Government that is thrifty, businesslike, with a good administrator at its head. We asked whether there was interest in the basic, the ground-floor, basic industry of America—the tilling of the soil. He said: "No."

If Roosevelt had been alive, there would have been interest in this, the agricultural, question. We used to hear him talk about it informally over and over again, doing as he always used to do—feeling his way into big things for big ends.

BIG THINGS AND BIG ENDS.

America has done not only the big job of feeding herself; when Europe became intensive and industrial and overpopulated she fed Europe. She had the only unexhausted soil of great area in the whole world, except one, Russia. She worked it to a frazzle. She exploited her soil in her big, resourceful, wholesale way, and it became the same old story. America's population grew like mad; she exploited her soil like mad. Population will always catch up with an exploited soil, and this point will soon be reached in America. She can not go on feeding Europe long. Anyone can sense it. Anyone who has learned that it was Germany who was topnotch record holder in making the fewest acres feed the greatest number of persons, while foolish Great Britain allowed her "tight little island" to turn everything into grass to feed meat animals, knows that when we begin to talk about intensive agriculture it is not only a sign of intelligence, but a sign that the old day of the virgin soil and the big crop surplus for Europe is coming to an end. As it came to an end a shrewd nation would be straining every effort to make farming a paying, satisfied, intelligent, permanent, soil-conserving business. It is bound to be the basic industry, certainly while we export food and certainly even later, when we stop exporting food and begin the struggle to feed ourselves. It is the industry that gives us our three meals a day; when we can get along without anything else we shall still be yowling for those three meals. The soil and the farmer are the foundation of our national life, and yet we are neglecting our soil and our farmer.

ASLEEP.

What an extraordinary thing it is that the big political parties are blind to the great dangers creeping up our agricultural backbone. Anyone would think that the mere expediency of selfish political strategy would direct a strong attention upon the welfare of an industry that furnished us with 25 per cent of the draft men; with an industry that probably in terms of man, woman, and child still engages and supports a third of our population; with a national industry that works more acres of land than Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Portugal, and all the European allies, excepting Russia, combined, and Canada thrown in for good measure; with a national industry employing more workers of the soil than in any other country in the word except British India, China, and Russia. How extraordinary that there should be failure to look back upon history and realize that no fundamental revolution ever takes place unless it involves the soil and the workers on the soil! In the absence of serfdom it is bound to take place when the tillers of the soil are unable to endure the results of two leeches that will suck the life blood of agricultural industry everywhere and anywhere that sane government does not step in and say "Off!" We go on, however, applying no effective check upon these two encroachments on the welfare of our farmers. Are we sound asleep?

THE LEECHES.

The two parasites on agriculture have always appeared and probably always will appear. They have appeared in America. The first is a parasite on the land; the other a parasite on the distribution of the product. The first is the land hog; the second, the middleman or profiteer, who always squeezes in between the farmer and the consumer. The first is responsible for replacing the landowning farmer by the tenant farmer; the second is responsible for sucking away the farmer's profits and the consumer's welfare.

When the Post Office Department sent out recently a questionnaire to the farmers of the country it received replies that would make an American's hair stand on end. Here was a chorus of dissatisfaction. Some of it can be discounted, because no interrogated class would ever return a verdict of "satisfied." But the replies left no doubt that the farmer of America knows that between the little price that he gets and the big price the consumer pays is the profit of the leech; and it makes no difference whether this leech is a slippery, antiquated system of food distribution or a scheming class of profiteers.

The first leech, not half seen by us fellows in cities, is infinitely more dangerous and difficult to dislodge. The land hog in the end will do more harm to the future of American agriculture than all the rest of the difficulties that may beset it. The land hog begins to develop his activity at the exact period that anyone could foresee—when we have begun to come to the end of our cultivatable land and are nearing the point where our soil production is being chased by an increasing population. Get a little land hunger and you have the land hog. Then comes this capitalist who sees that farm lands are going up. He is not a farmer. He is a speculator, holding land for a rise. He is a mere landlord. He is the creator of the tenant farmer. By having more capital to work with, he takes away the land of the farm-owning farmer and leases it to the poor devil who, compared to the homestead farmer or the big-production landowner, is a fly-by-night.

Does the tenant farmer enrich the land? No. Does he attach his family to a community? No. Does he build good, permanent farm buildings or keep up the roads? No. Can he keep his son and daughter on the farm with no future to offer them? No. Is he immune to bolshevism, as the French farmers, 80 per cent of whom own their land, are immune to bolshevism? No.

With the landowning permanent farmer, who has to use fertilizer and pay interest on invested capital, does he compete on an unfair basis? Yes. Does he lower the standard of living for farmers? Yes. Does he create an undependable, shifting type of farm labor? Yes. Is the tenant farmer on the increase in the United States? Astonishingly, yes.

The tenant farmer is increasing faster than any of us have begun to realize. In Illinois, Kansas, Iowa, Nebraska, Ohio, Indiana, and Oklahoma the situation is serious already. In Illinois 50 per cent of the farming is done under absentee landlords. Gov. Henry J. Allen, of Kansas, who has done more than anyone to sound a warning and provide a remedy, found that in his State, in 1880, the owner farmers were 84 per cent, the tenant farmers 16 per cent; in 1918 the owner farmers were about 50 per cent and the tenant farmers about 50 per cent. Henry Allen says: "Farm tenantry will ruin a country unless halted." In Kansas there has been an increase in population, but a decrease in farm population. At one time the inroads of land hogs and tenant farming actually decreased the population of Iowa. Absentee landlordism drives the American off the soil.

REMEDY.

These are the two reasons—the menacing, increasing power of the two leeches—that make Collier's call upon the political parties to give attention to the farmers of the country. Some of the relief may be by national action; some of it will be by State action stimulated and driven by the party with the power to see far enough ahead toward a crisis in our basic industry. So long as our national parties are paralleled in State organizations it will always be open to them to exercise a powerful influence, not to dictate State legislation but to thrust the need for it under the nose of the voters.

We want the distribution leech removed from the farmer by:

1. Wise regulation of freight rates on farm products.
2. Close supervision of commission houses and middlemen.
3. State aid or actual State distribution through public agencies if necessary.
4. Encouragement rather than adverse legislation for cooperative distribution by farmers and for cooperative buying by consumers.

We want to remove the land hog—this absentee landlord leech—and put the land-owning, permanent, contented American back on the land by:

1. Extending much more widely, by Federal and State action, the use of capital, not only to the farmer who already owns a farm, as in the present Federal plan, but to the man who wants to buy a farm and go on the land.
2. Adjusting taxes so that the burden falls on the land hog and his land rather than upon the buildings or improvements or the product of farm labor.

Mark it well. Read it in history. When the rich absentee landlords get the land, it is taken away from them. If it is not taken away by wise laws and given to those who work it, it will always in the end be taken away by revolution.

Our political parties may well take heed of it in time, for the remedies should be devised by all the people. Farmers are not a class organized for political action around a special, selfish, sovietized interest.

I want to make a brief analysis of the remedy suggested by this able editor and the program of the Nonpartisan League. The program of the Nonpartisan League contains five simple planks, which are as follows:

1. State ownership of terminal elevators, flour mills, packing houses, and cold-storage plants.
2. State inspection of grain and grain dockage.
3. Exemption of farm improvements from taxation.
4. State hail insurance on the acreage-tax basis.
5. Rural banks operated at cost.

In No. 3 of the suggested remedies Collier's advocates "State aid or actual State distribution through public agencies, if necessary." No. 1 of the Nonpartisan League program means just this: State ownership of the terminal facilities of distribution. There can be no question in an unbiased mind that the governor of New York, as well as Collier's Weekly, advocates this same plank, if necessary.

In No. 2 of this popular magazine's remedy we find "Close supervision of commission houses and middlemen." In No. 2 of the league program we have "State inspection of grain and grain dockage." As the grain dealers are our principal commission men or middlemen, this plank also closely conforms to that of the National Weekly.

In No. 1, namely, "Wise regulation of freight rates on farm products," Collier's has advocated exactly what the new railway commission elected by the Nonpartisan League is endeavoring to carry out in North Dakota.

Collier's editorial goes on to say:

We want to remove the land hog—this absentee landlord leech—and put the land-owning, permanent, contented American back on the land by (1) extending much more widely by Federal and State action the use of capital not only to the farmer who already owns the farm, as in the present Federal plan, but to the man who wants to buy a farm and go on the land.

This is the intent and purpose of plank 5 of the league program, which is "Rural credit banks operated at cost." The Bank of North Dakota is now in operation, and it extends the use of capital to the farm owner on first-mortgage security at a lower rate of interest than that which has prevailed in North Dakota for years. Since the league legislators came into power in North Dakota they have passed a home-building act which has made it possible for the man who wants to buy a farm and go on the land to obtain it on a small payment, with deferred payments for a long term of years and at a low rate of interest. I shall treat in detail this splendid law a little later on in my remarks.

In No. 2 of Collier's remedy the editor suggests "adjusting taxes so that the burden falls on the land hog and his land rather than upon the building or improvements or the products of farm labor." In No. 3 of the league program we find the exemption of farm improvements from taxation, which, of course, means the same thing.

It is strange that the many presidential candidates, with but one exception, have not advocated a definite program for agricultural readjustment. Is it not strange also that in more than 2,200 suggested planks submitted to the New York Tribune for a prize there was none for the "backbone of the nation"? I want to take this occasion to compliment highly the progressive and forward looking attitude of Collier's, one of the greatest of our American weeklies.

Mr. Herbert Hoover, in the Saturday Evening Post, recently wrote a splendid article entitled "Some notes on agricultural readjustment and the high cost of living." While I am not boosting Mr. Hoover for the Presidency, I recommend that Members of the House who are interested in this problem read his article. Mr. Hoover handled this great problem during the war, and I do not know of any other economist in public life who has a better understanding and a more comprehensive plan for solving this problem. Every line of his article is worthy of consideration; but in connection with my argument I desire to quote the following excerpt:

> Another factor in transportation bearing upon the problem of marketing is the control by food manufacturing and marketing concerns of refrigeration and other special types of cars. This special control has grown up largely because, owing to seasonal changes in regional occupation for these cars over different parts of the country, no one railway wished to provide special cars and service for use that may come its way only part of the year. The result has been to force the building up of a domination by certain concerns which control many of the cars and stifle free competition. Much the same results have been obtained by special groups in control of stock yards and, in some cases, of elevators. Where such formal or informal monopolies grow up they are public utilities, and if the farmer is to have a free market they must be replaced by constructive public service.

I could go on and state numerous parallel cases where the article of Mr. Hoover is similar to the program of the Nonpartisan League, and I believe that this is a compliment to the economic foresight and intelligent leadership of the farmers of the Northwest. I do not want to even suggest by these remarks, however, that the editor of Collier's, the governor of New York, or Mr. Herbert Hoover are potential members of the Nonpartisan League, nor do I know whether or not they have the slightest sympathy for the movement. If they read certain newspapers in the East they would probably be shocked at such mention in this speech, but I am sure if they, as well as other citizens, would go to the source for the facts concerning the Nonpartisan League movement they would find that it has much in common with their views.

The State Legislature of North Dakota passed the industrial commission act—the parent bill of the Nonpartisan League program—but in addition to this it passed many other beneficial laws for both the people in the cities and the laboring men as well as the farmers. For the information of the House I shall insert a list of the most important features of the program.

Bank deposits guaranteed.
Better grain grades, based on milling and baking values.
Pay for dockage or its return to the farmer to be used as feed for his animals.
The milling of wheat in the State, thereby preventing a double haul, and saving the by-products for use in the State, increasing business and industry and conserving soil fertility.
The State-owned bank, whereby the funds that belong to all the people are made available to finance the activities that belong to all the people.
A State-owned coal mine, to supply at least the State's own buildings.
An industrial commission charged with the management of the State's industrial activities, elected by and responsible to the people.
Hail insurance at cost.
Fire insurance on public buildings at cost.
State bonding of public officials at cost.
State aid to drought sufferers.
State aid to dairy associations.
Rural credits.
Reduction of the spread between the prices paid to producers and the prices charged to consumers.
A State of home owners (as the homestead act was the most beneficent piece of legislation ever enacted by the Federal Congress, so may the home building association act prove to be the most beneficent piece of legislation ever enacted by a State legislature).
Exemption of farm improvements from taxation.
Exemption of the small city home from taxation.
The redistribution of taxes more in accordance with privileges enjoyed and ability to pay.
Uniform warehouse receipts and a uniform sales act.
Encouragement of improvements and discouragement of speculation.
Simplified court procedure.
Equitable assessment of property for taxation.
Thirty days' notice before mortgage foreclosure.
A soldier's compensation law, the first and the most liberal enacted by any State.
A moratorium act, effective until one year after peace is declared.
The lowest draft cost per soldier of any State in the Union.
Workmen's compensation, the most liberal in existence.
Benefits to dependents of employees killed.
Beneficial and just labor laws.
Woman suffrage, with provisions enabling all women entitled to the ballot to cast their votes.
An eight-hour day and a minimum wage for women.
Stringent regulations as to employment of minors.
Pure drugs and sanitation legislation.
Night schools and enlargement of school facilities.
Stringent and effective morality laws.
Rural school betterment.
Recall of public officials.
A full line of repairs to be carried by dealers for machinery sold in the State.
Loyalty to the State and obedience to its laws.
Patriotism and love of country.
Free speech and free assemblage.
Fairer railroad rates.
Flood control.
Encouragement of cooperation.
The realization of democracy as written into our constitutions and preserved in our traditions.

The North Dakota Legislature is the first legislature in the world, to my knowledge, which has carried out its preelection promises. The majority of the members of the house and the senate were elected by the farmers who belonged to the Nonpartisan League and the progressive citizens who lived in the cities. The president of the Nonpartisan League is A. C. Townley, and great credit must be given to him for his splendid organizing ability and leadership. The opposition to the league has not attempted to attack these splendid laws, but has confined their attacks to personal abuse, catcalls, and slander. Their campaign of vilification is naturally directed at the leader, and therefore they attempt to belittle this beneficent program by calling it "Townleyism." They have at least failed in the Northwest, where the league is growing stronger every day, and the present prospects assure a victory in many States at the coming elections.

There is one measure that I should like to call to the attention of the House in greater detail, and that is a law known as the home-building act. I would heartily recommend this plan to the Federal Government to carry out the soldier's bonus legislation. This act is under the administration of the industrial commission, and on account of my limited time I can not point out the benefits of each law in detail, so choose this one.

This law allows any citizen of North Dakota to buy a home up to the amount of $5,000 or farm up to the amount of $10,000. In the case of a city home or dwelling the law requires a group of 10, who form a home-buyers' league. This league then elects its officers, and upon the deposit of one-fifth of the cost of the proposed home by any one member the State of North Dakota proceeds to erect the dwelling. The balance is paid by means of deferred payments covering a period of from 10 to 20 years. The results of this plan are that the worker can build a home, and the payment, including the principal and interest, is less than half the usual charge for rent for a like home. This law would solve the rent problem in this country and do away with the discontent and unrest which is caused by high rentals in the cities. Regarding the farm features of this law for homemakers will say that one-fifth the amount of the cost of the proposed farm and the same plan of payment is adopted.

The soldiers in North Dakota are given extra compensation of $25 for each month they served, provided they use such compensation for buying a farm or city home or in furtherance of their education. A soldier who served two years has $600 to his credit and will be allowed under this act to buy a $3,000 home or farm.

I challenge anyone to point out where such legislation does not make for more loyal citizenship and a truer Americanism. Is there any better way to make a law-abiding and patriotic citizen than to encourage him to own his own little home or farmstead? This is only a sample of the numerous laws which have been passed by the legislature in North Dakota.

Our country has always been an inspiration to all the nations of the earth. The first Republic now finds its counterparts increasing so rapidly that within your lifetime and mine we shall see the nations of the world all republics. The passing of autocratic rulers followed the firing of the shot "heard round the world" when a little group of embattled farmers stood at Concord and defied an empire. There has been no halting of progress since that sacred day. No one who loves America will want that progress to halt now. The problems of agriculture and distribution demand immediate consideration. Until we solve them national progress can not be made.

Mr. PORTER. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ].

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I feel that the business men and the business interests of this country have been kicked around and cuffed about and trod upon long enough. They feel that they are entitled to freedom from the exactions of military laws that were passed during the period of hostilities between this country and Germany.

The eighth section of Article I of the Constitution says that the Congress shall have power "to declare war." The second section of Article II provides inter alia that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur."

The eighth section of Article I also tells us that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations."

The Constitution does not contain any express language authorizing any department of the Government to declare peace. A condition of war exists when a nation is vindicating its rights by force of arms; when pacific relations have ceased; when reprisals and embargoes exist; when armed invasions, accompanied by the destruction of life and property, are taking place; when hostile and belligerent attitudes are maintained—these are some of the circumstances or indicia of war. They are the definitions of war.

As we have seen, the treaty-making power is lodged in the Executive and the Senate.

The minority Members present seem to be laboring under a misapprehension, or to be laboring with a confusion of thought, in respect to the question before us. With a good deal of boldness and an ill-concealed effort to hold a straight face, they insist that there can be no peace in the absence of a treaty.

A treaty is a contract, "a written agreement between two sovereign nations," and "a compact between two or more nations having the right of self-government." These are the definitions. The right of Congress to declare peace comes as the natural sequence to the express power to declare war. The former is the necessary complement of the latter. The one is the corollary of the other.

The war having been declared and prosecuted and long since successfully terminated by the conflict of arms and the terms of the armistice of November 11, 1918, now nearly 17 months ago; the Germans having withdrawn their invading armies and surrendered their ships and arms; and our people being now engaged in some little trade and commerce with them, and nearly all of our armed forces having been brought home and mustered out of the service, we are now actually, if not technically, at peace with the Germans. While it may be that it would be advisable to enter into a treaty—a contract in writing—with Germany, providing for trading relations, the surrender of fugitives from justice, and the like, yet this is a matter for the President and the Senate to look after. We are at peace with Germany, but the President declines to admit it—and refuses to proclaim the fact to the world.

Several years ago Congress, by joint resolution, abrogated the treaty with Russia on account of her mistreatment of the Jewish people. And we managed to get along for years without a treaty with Russia—but we were at peace with her. Just because two neighbors do not happen to have contractual relations with each other is no sign that they are not at peace. There was incorporated in the treaty of Versailles the League of Nations. The President made good his threat that the two—the treaty and the league—would be so entwined that they could not be separated. The majority of the Senate, standing firm for American rights, refused to be browbeaten into an acceptance of a treaty that involved the surrender of the rights won by the revolutionary fathers to a board of nine directors, eight of them foreigners, of whom England should have four to our one. All hail to the splendid statesmen of the Senate who defended the dearly bought rights gained for us at Bunker Hill, Valley Forge, and Brandywine, and from Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown.

Already the British are buying from the Germans, right and left, and in their merchant vessels, of which there are many thousand, transporting her manufactured products to our shores and selling the same to our people at a rich profit—all to the detriment of our workingmen and our manufacturers.

Already the British pound sterling, by reason of the importation of the German-made goods, dumped into our markets, has jumped from something over $3 to above $4, as the price of exchange. Yet imperious and vindictive, egotistical and visionary, partisan and persistent, the President tells us, there can be no declaration of peace until he gets ready to make it. In the meanwhile our trade abroad is suffering and in our domestic affairs the people, sorely tried, are being taxed to death.

Under the President's war powers he is maintaining almost innumerable boards and commissions, bureaus and departments, councils and committees, employing thousands upon top of thousands of employees, eating up the substance of the people, and being paid with the proceeds of Treasury bills now bearing 4¾ per cent interest and in regional bank currency, the printing presses of which banks are running night and day, causing an enormous inflation of the currency and the tremendously abnormal high cost of living.

Under the second section of the resolution must go to the discard the Lever Act and the other measures, necessary, I suppose, when we were in a state of war, but no longer to be desired. Business men and business interests want to be released from autocratic control and domination. They want, and the country wants, a return to constitutional government. For these reasons, and for many others that I might mention, I am for the resolution, and to vote for it will be one of the greatest pleasures of my life.

The people are war worn and weary. In conclusion I quote the memorable words of Gen. Grant, "Let us have peace." [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I am not even a lawyer, much less a constitutional lawyer; therefore I shall not attempt to deal with the constitutionality of this resolution. I try to be a plain business man, and I hope I understand something about the difficulties under which the country has been suffering due to the 61 restrictive measures which are in existence because peace has not been declared. I favor this resolution for that reason if for no other, as it will immediately, if it becomes law, remove restrictions which are making it almost impossible for the business of this country to be regularly conducted.

It is the belief of the business men of this country that we can not begin to return toward normal until peace is finally declared and becomes effective. We have a form of peace now, of course, but technically we are still at war, and until such time as we are able to realize that we are in a state of actual peace, business from one end of this country to the other will be in a disturbed condition, as it is to-day. All one needs to do is to read the newspapers and realize the condition which the country is experiencing at the various railroad junctions throughout the United States, due very largely to the present frame of mind of the people, who can not forecast what is to happen to-morrow. Unless we enact some resolution of this kind and bring some people to their senses, whether it be the gentlemen at the other end of this Capitol or the gentleman down at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue, if they can not be brought together by their own efforts some force should be exerted to accomplish it, and if that fails to bring them together some other force must do the thing these people are supposed to do under the Constitution of the United States.

As I said, I am not a constitutional lawyer and I do not know whether this resolution is properly worded to attain this result, but I am willing to pin my faith on the judgment of the lawyers on this side who say it is the right and proper measure and live in the hope that they are correct. I would have been willing that the President and the Senate should have gotten together upon an agreement which would permit us, with proper restrictions, to become a part of the League of Nations, simply to try it out and not with any conviction on my part that it would be a success. I am firmly of the belief that even though we had gone into the League of Nations with or without restrictions it would have amounted to nothing more than a mutual admiration society, out of which there would have come as many opportunities for war as for preventing it.

So if this resolution goes through and we finally find ourselves at peace with Germany, we will be in the same position that we were before we went into the war. We will be able to determine with whom we want to fight, and when, and whether we shall send our boys across the ocean. We will let our ambassadors get together and make a final accounting and, with our business men, we will go to work again as we did before war was declared.

So I do not see anything to fear with regard to the future of this great country, even though we may not become a member of this League of Nations. If we have made peace with Germany we will be able immediately to do business with the whole world as we did before war was declared.

I sincerely hope that the good judgment of two-thirds at least of the membership of this House will support this resolution and that the President and the Senate will see to it that it finally becomes a law, so that we can once more get the country back into a normal state. [Applause.]
